Secondly. The destruction of Jerusalem's enemies is foretold, for the comfort of all that were her friends and well-wishers in this distress; ver. 5, 7, "Thou shalt be brought down," (ver. 4,) "to speak out of the dust," so low thou shalt be reduced. 'But' (so it may be rendered) 'the multitude of thy strangers and thy terrible ones,' the numerous armies of the enemy, shall themselves be like small dust, not able to speak at all, or so much as whisper, but as chaff that passeth away. Thou shalt be abased, but they shall be quite dispersed. smitten, and slain, after another manner, ch. xxvii. 7. They shall pass away, yea, it shall be at an instant, suddenly; the enemy shall be surprised with the destruction, and you with the salvation. The army of the Assyrians was by an angel laid dead upon the spot at an instant, suddenly. Such will be the destruction of the enemies of the gospel Jerusalem, "In one hour is their judgment come," Rev. xviii. 10. Again, ver. 6, "Thou shalt be visited;" or, as it used to be rendered, 'She shall be visited with thunder and a great noise.' Thou shalt be put into a fright, which thou shalt soon recover. But, ver. 7, the multitude of the nations that fight against her shall be "as a dream of a night vision;" they and their prosperity and success shall soon vanish past recall. "The multitude of the nations that fight against Zion" shall be as a hungry man, that dreams he eats, but still is hungry; that is, 1. Whereas they hoped to make a prey of Jerusalem, and to enrich themselves with the plunder of that opulent city, their hopes shall prove vain dreams, with which their fancies may please and sport themselves for a while, but they shall be disappointed; they fancied themselves masters of Jerusalem, but shall never be so. 2. They themselves, and all their pomp, and power, and prosperity, shall vanish "like a dream when one awakes," shall be of as little value and as short continuance, Ps. lxxiii. 20, he shall fly away as a dream, Job xx. 8. The army of Sennacherib vanished, and was gone presently; though it had filled the country, as a dream fills a man's head, especially as a dream of meat fills the head of him that went to bed hungry.

Many understand these verses as part of the threatening of wrath, when God comes to distress Jerusalem, and lay siege to her. 1st. The multitude of her friends, whom she relies upon for help, shall do her no good; for, though they are terrible ones, they shall be like the small dust, and shall pass away. 2nd. The multitude of her enemies shall never think they can do her mischief enough; but, when they have devoured her much, still they shall be but like a man that dreams he eats, hungry and greedy, to devour her more.

9 Stay yourselves, and wonder;
Cry ye out, and cry:
They are drunken, but not with wine;
They stagger, but not with strong drink.
10 For the LORD hath poured out upon you the spirit of deep sleep,
And hath closed your eyes:
The prophets and your rulers, the seers hath he covered.
11 And the vision of all is become unto you
As the words of a book that is sealed,
Which men deliver to one that is learned,
Saying, Read this, I pray thee:
And he saith, I cannot; for it is sealed:
12 And the book is delivered to him that is not learned,
Saying, Read this, I pray thee:
And he saith, I am not learned.
13 Wherefore the Lord said,
Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth,
And with their lips do honour me,
But have removed their heart far from me,
And their fear toward me is taught by the precept of men;
14 Therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvellous work among this people,
Even a marvellous work and a wonder:
For the wisdom of their wise men shall perish,
And the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid.
15 Woe unto them that seek deep to hide their counsel from the LORD,
And their works are in the dark,
And they say, Who seeth us? and who knoweth us?
16 Surely your turning of things upside down
Shall be esteemed as the potter's clay:
For shall the work say of him that made it, He made me not?
Or shall the thing framed say of him that framed it, He had no understanding?

Here, First. The prophet stands amazed at the stupidity of the greatest part of the Jewish nation. They had Levites, who taught the good knowledge of the Lord, and had encouragement from Hezekiah in doing so, 2 Chr. xxx. 22. They had prophets, who brought them messages immediately from God, and signified to them what were the causes, and what should be the effects, of God's displeasure against them. Now one would think, "Surely this great nation," that has all the advantages of Divine revelation, "is a wise and understanding people," Deu. iv. 6; but, alas, it was quite otherwise, ver. 9. The prophet directs himself to the sober, thinking part of them, calling upon them to be affected with the general carelessness of their neighbours. It may be read, 'They delay, they put off, their repentance, but wonder ye that they should be so sottish. They sport themselves with their own deceivings; they riot and revel; but do ye cry out, lament their folly, cry to God by prayer for them. The more senseless they are of the hand of God gone out against them, the more do you lay to heart these things.' Note, The security of sinners in their sinful ways is just matter of lamentation and wonder to all serious people, who should think themselves concerned to pray for those that do not pray for themselves. But what is the matter? what are we thus to wonder at?

1. We may well wonder that the generality of the people is so sottish and brutish, and so infatuated, as if they were intoxicated. "They are drunken, but not with wine;" not with wine only, otherwise with that they were often drunk, and they erred through wine, ch. xxviii. 7. They were drunk with the love of pleasures, with prejudices against religion, and with the corrupt principles they had imbibed. Like drunken men, they know not what they do or say, or whither they go. They are not sensible of the Divine rebukes they are under; "They have beaten me, and I felt it not," saith the drunkard, Pr. xxiii. 35. God speaks to them once, yea, twice; but, like men drunk, they perceive it not, they understand it not, but forget the law. They stagger in their counsels, are unstable and unsteady, and stumble at every thing that lies in their way. There is such a thing as spiritual drunkenness.

2. It is yet more strange that God himself hath "poured out upon them a spirit of deep sleep, and hath closed their eyes," ver. 10, that he who bids them awake and open their eyes should yet lay them to sleep and shut their eyes; but it is in a way of righteous judgment, to punish them for their loving darkness rather than light, their loving sleep. When God, by his prophets, called them, they said, "Yet a little sleep, a little slumber;" and therefore he gave them up to strong delusions, and said, "Sleep on now." This is applied to the unbelieving Jews that rejected the Gospel of Christ, and were justly hardened in their infidelity, till wrath came upon them to the uttermost; Rom. xi. 8, "God hath given them the spirit of slumber;" and we have reason to fear it is the woful case of many who live in the midst of Gospel light.

3. It is very sad that this should be the case of those that were their prophets, and rulers, and seers; that they who should be their guides are themselves blindfolded; and it is easy to tell what the fatal consequences will be when the blind lead the blind. This was fulfilled when, in the latter days of the Jewish church, the chief priests and the scribes and the elders of the people, were the great opposers of Christ and his Gospel and brought themselves under a judicial infatuation.

4. The sad effect of this was, that all the means of conviction, knowledge, and grace, which they enjoyed, were ineffectual, and did not answer the end; ver. 11, 12, "The vision of all" the prophets, true and false, "is become to you as the words of a book," or letter, "that is sealed up;" you cannot discern the truth of the real visions, and the falsehood of the pretended ones. Or, every vision, particularly that this prophet had seen for them, and published to them, was become unintelligible; they had it among them, but were never the wiser for it, no more than a man (though a scholar good enough) is for a book delivered to him sealed up, and which he must not open the seals of. He sees it is a book, and that is all, he knows nothing of what is in it; so they knew what Isaiah said was a vision and prophecy, but the meaning of it was hid from them; it was only a sound of words to them, which they were not at all alarmed by, or affected with. It answered not the intention, for it made no impression at all upon them. Neither the learned nor the unlearned were the better for all the messages God sent them by his servants the prophets, nor desired to be so. The ordinary sort of people excused themselves from regarding what the prophets said, with their want of learning and a liberal education. As if they were not concerned to know and do the will of God, because they were not bred scholars; "It is nothing to me, I am not learned." Those of better rank pretended that the prophet had a way of speaking by himself, which was obscure to them; and what, though they were men of letters, they had not been used to; and, Si non vis intelligi debes negligi,—'If you wish not to be understood, you deserve to be neglected.' Both these are groundless pretences; for God's prophets have been no unfaithful debtors, either to the wise or to the unwise, Rom. i. 14. Or we may take it thus: The book of prophecy was given to them sealed, so that they could not read it, as a just judgment upon them; because it had often been delivered to them unsealed, and they would not take pains to learn the language of it, and then made excuse for their not reading it, because they were not learned. But observe, the vision is become thus to you whose minds the god of this world hath blinded; but it is not so in itself, it is not so to all. The same vision which to you is a savour of death unto death to others is and shall be a savour of life unto life. Knowledge is easy to him that understandeth.

Secondly. The prophet, in God's name, threatens those that were formal and hypocritical in their exercises of devotion, ver. 13, 14. Observe here,

1. The sin that is here charged upon them; dissembling with God in their religious performances, ver. 13. He that knows the heart, and cannot be imposed upon with shows and pretences, chargeth it upon them, whether their hearts condemn them for it or no; he that is greater than the heart, and knows all things, knows that though they draw nigh to him with their mouth, and honour him with their lips, yet they are not sincere in it. To worship God is to make our approaches to him, and to present our adorations of him; it is to draw nigh to him, as those that have business with him, with an intention therein to honour him. This we are to do with our mouth, and with our lips; in speaking of him, and in speaking to him, we must render to him the calves of our lips, Hos. xiv. 2. And if the heart be full of his love and fear, out of the abundance of that the mouth will speak. But there are many whose religion is intimation is given that they would be swept away like an accumulation of chaff. The sudden destruction of many thousands of the Assyrian army, and the immediate retreat of the remainder, are referred to in this verse and those which follow, down to the eighth.

xxix. 6. Some think "thou" is addressed to the Assyrian, but others would render the words, "It shall be visited of the Lord," or "There shall be from the Lord of hosts a visitation of thunder," &c.

xxix. 7. The "munition" of Jerusalem was her fortifications or defences. The besiegers would suddenly awaken to a consciousness of their delusions, like men roused from a dream.

xxix. 9. Here begins the appeal of the prophet to his own countrymen, whose sins and follies have brought them into such imminent peril. The first words mean "stop and wonder," or "pause in astonishment." The next words, "cry ye out, and cry," are represented in the margin by "take your pleasure, and riot." Barnes lip labour only. They say that which expresseth an approach to God, and adoration of him, but it is only from the teeth outward. For, 1st. They do not apply their minds to the service. When they pretend to be speaking to God, they are thinking of a thousand impertinencies; "They have removed their hearts far from me," that they might not be employed in prayer, nor come within reach of the word. When work was to be done for God which required the heart, that was sent out of the way on purpose, with the fool's eyes, into the ends of the earth. 2nd. They do not make the word of God the rule of their worship, nor his will their reason: "Their fear towards me is taught by the precept of men." They worshipped the God of Israel not according to his appointment, but their own inventions; the directions of their false prophets, or their idolatrous kings, or the usages of the nations that were round about them. The tradition of the elders was of more value and validity with them than the laws which God commanded Moses. Or, if they did worship God in a way conformable to his institution in the days of Hezekiah, a great reformer, they had more an eye to the precept of the king than to God's command. This our Saviour applies to the Jews in his time, who were formal in their devotions, and wedded to their own inventions, and pronounceth concerning them, that in vain they did worship God, Mat. xv. 8, 9

2. It is a spiritual judgment with which God threatens to punish them for their spiritual wickedness; ver. 14, "I will add to do a marvellous work." They did one strange thing, they removed all sincerity from their hearts. Now God will go on and do another, he will remove all sagacity from their heads; "The wisdom of their wise men shall perish." They played the hypocrite, and thought to put a cheat upon God, and now they are left to themselves to play the fool; and not only to put a cheat upon themselves, but to be easily cheated by all about them. Those that make religion no more than a pretence, to serve a turn, are out in their politics; and those that part with their uprightness, it is just with God to deprive them of their understanding. This was fulfilled in the wretched infatuation which the Jewish nation was manifestly under after they had rejected the Gospel of Christ. They removed their hearts far from God, and therefore God justly removed wisdom far from them, and hid from their eyes the things that belonged even to their temporal peace. This is a marvellous work; it is surprising, it is astonishing, that wise men should of a sudden lose their wisdom, and be given up to strong delusions. Judgments on the mind, though least taken notice of, are to be most admired.

Thirdly. He shews the folly of those that thought to act separately and secretly from God, and were carrying on designs independent upon God, and which they projected to conceal from his all-seeing eye. Here is,

1. Their politics described; ver. 15, "They seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord," that he may not know either what they do or what they design; "they say, Who sees us?" No man, and therefore not God himself. The consultations they had about their own safety they kept to themselves, and never asked God's advice concerning them. Nay, they knew they were displeasing to him, but thought they could conceal them from him; and if he did not know them he could not baffle and defeat them. See what foolish, fruitless pains sinners take in their sinful ways; they seek deep, they sink deep, to hide their counsel from the Lord, who sits in heaven and laughs at them. Note, A practical disbelief of God's omniscience is at the bottom both of the carnal worships and carnal confidences of the hypocrites, Ps. xciv. 7; Eze. viii. 12; ix. 9.

2. The absurdity of their politics demonstrated; ver. 16, "Surely your turning of things upside down" thus, your various projects, turning your affairs this and that way, to make them shape as you would have them; or rather your inverting the order of things, and thinking to make God's providence give attendance to your projects, and that God must know no more than you think fit, which is perfectly "turning things upside down," and beginning at the wrong end, "it shall be esteemed as the potter's clay;" that is, God will turn and manage you, and all your counsels, with as much ease, and as absolute a power, as the potter forms and fashions his clay. See how God despiseth, and therefore what little reason we have to dread, those contrivances of men that are carried on without God, much less against him. They that think to hide their counsels from God, 1st. They do in effect deny him to be their Creator. "It is as if the work should say of him that made it, He made me not," I made myself. If God made us, he certainly knows us, as the psalmist shews, Ps. cxxxix. 1, 13—15. So that they who say he doth not see them, had as good say he did not make them. Much of the wickedness of the wicked ariseth from this, they forget that God formed them, Deu. xxxii. 18. Or, 2nd. Which comes all to one, they deny him to be a wise Creator. "The thing framed saith of him that framed it, He had no understanding;" for if he had understanding to make us so curiously, especially to make us intelligent beings, and to put understanding into the inward part, Job xxxviii. 36, no doubt he hath understanding to know us, and all we say and do. As they that quarrel with God, so they that think to conceal themselves from him, do in effect charge him with folly. But "he that formed the eye, shall he not see?" Ps. xciv. 9.

17 Is it not yet a very little while,
And Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field,
And the fruitful field shall be esteemed as a forest?
18 And in that day shall the deaf hear the words of the book,
And the eyes of the blind shall see out of obscurity, and out of darkness.
19 The meek also shall increase their joy in the LORD,
And the poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel.
20 For the terrible one is brought to nought, and the scorner is consumed,
And all that watch for iniquity are cut off:
21 That make a man an offender for a word,
And lay a snare for him that reproveth in the gate,
And turn aside the just for a thing of nought.
22 Therefore thus saith the LORD, who redeemed Abraham, concerning the house of Jacob,
Jacob shall not now be ashamed,
Neither shall his face now wax pale.
23 But when he seeth his children, the work of mine hands,
In the midst of him, they shall sanctify my name,
And sanctify the Holy One of Jacob,
And shall fear the God of Israel.
24 They also that erred in spirit shall come to understanding,
And they that murmured shall learn doctrine.

They that sought to hide their counsels from the Lord were said to turn things upside down, ver. 16; and they intended to do it unknown to God. But God here tells them that he will turn things upside down his way; and let us see whose word shall stand, his or theirs. They disbelieve Providence; Wait a while, saith God, and you shall be convinced by ocular demonstration, that there is a God that governs the world; and that he governs it, and orders all the changes that are in it for the good of his church. The wonderful revolution here foretold may refer primarily to the happy settlement of the affairs of Judah and Jerusalem, after the defeat of Sennacherib's attempt, and the repose which good people then enjoyed, when they were delivered from the alarms of the sword, both of war and persecution. But it may look farther, to the rejection of the Jews at the first planting of the Gospel, (for their hypocrisy and infidelity were here foretold, ver. 13,) and the admission of the Gentiles into the church. In general, it is a great and surprising change that is here foretold, ver. 17. Lebanon, that was a forest, is turned into a fruitful field; and Carmel, that was a fruitful field, shall become a forest. It is a counterchange. Note, Great changes, both for the better and for the worse, are often made in a very little while. It was a sign given them of the defeat of Sennacherib, that the ground should be more than ordinary fruitful, ch. xxxvii. 30, "Ye shall eat this year such as grows of itself." Food for man shall be as food for beasts useth to be, the spontaneous product of the soil. Then Lebanon became a fruitful field; so fruitful, that that which used to be reckoned a fruitful field in comparison with it shall be looked upon but as a forest. When a great harvest of souls was gathered in to Christ from among the Gentiles, then the wilderness was turned into a fruitful field; and the Jewish church, that had long been a fruitful field, become a desolate and deserted forest, ch. liv. 1. In particular,

First. Those that were ignorant shall become intelligent, ver. 18. Those that understood not this prophecy, but it was to them as a sealed book, ver. 11, when it is accomplished shall understand it, and shall acknowledge not only the hand of God in the event, but the voice of God in the prediction of it. "The deaf shall then hear the words of the book." The fulfilling of prophecy is the best exposition of it. The poor Gentiles shall then have Divine revelation brought among them; and those that sat in darkness shall see a great light; that were blind, shall see out of obscurity, for the Gospel was sent to them to open their eyes, Acts xxvi. 18. Observe, In order to the making of men fruitful in good affections and actions, the course God's grace takes with them is, to open their understandings, and make them hear the words of God's book.

Secondly. Those that were erroneous shall become orthodox; ver. 24, "They that erred in spirit," that were under mistakes and misapprehensions concerning the words of the book, and the meaning of them, they shall come to understanding, to a right understanding of things; the Spirit of truth shall rectify their mistakes, and lead them into all truth. This should encourage us to pray for those that have erred and are deceived, that God can, and often doth, bring such to understanding. They that murmured at the truths of God, as hard sayings, and loved to pick quarrels with them, shall learn the true meaning of these doctrines, and then they will be better reconciled to them. They that erred concerning the providence of God, as to public affairs, and murmured at the disposals of it, when they shall see the issue of things, shall better understand them, and be aware what God was driving at in all, Hos. iv. 9.

Thirdly. Those that were melancholy shall become cheerful and pleasant; ver. 19, "The meek also shall increase their joy in the Lord." Those that are poor in the world, and poor in spirit, that being in affliction accommodate themselves to their afflictions, are purely passive, and not passionate; when they see God appearing for them, they shall add, or repeat, joy in the Lord. This intimates that even in their distress they kept up their joy in the Lord, but now they increased it. Note, They that when they are in trouble can truly rejoice in God shall soon have cause given them greatly to rejoice in him. When joy in the world is decreasing and fading, joy in God is increasing and getting ground. This shining light shall shine more and more; for that which is aimed at is, that this joy may be full. Even the poor among men may rejoice in the Holy One of Israel, and their poverty need not deprive them of that joy, Hab. iii. 17, 18. And the meek, the humble, the patient and dispassionate, shall grow in this joy. Note, The grace of meekness will contribute very much to the increase of our holy joy.

Fourthly. The enemies that were formidable shall become despicable. Sennacherib, that terrible one, and his great army, that put the country into such a consternation, shall be brought to nought, ver. 20; shall be quite disabled to do any farther mischief. The power of Satan, that terrible one indeed, shall be broken by the prevalency of Christ's Gospel; and they that were subject to bondage, through fear of him that had the power of death, shall be delivered, Heb. ii. 14, 15.

Fifthly. The persecutors that were vexatious shall be quieted; and so those they were troublesome to shall be quiet from the fear of them. To complete the repose of God's people, not only the terrible one from abroad shall be brought to nought, but the scorners at home too shall be consumed and cut off by Hezekiah's reformation. Those are a happy people, and likely to be so, who, when God gives them victory and success against their terrible enemies abroad, take care to suppress vice and profaneness, and the spirit of persecution, those more dangerous enemies, at home. Or, they shall be consumed and cut off by the judgments of God, shall be singled out to be made examples of. Or, they shall insensibly waste away, being put to confusion by the fulfilling of those predictions which they made a jest of.

Observe what had been the wickedness of these scorners, for which they should be cut off. They had been persecutors of God's people and prophets, probably of the prophet Isaiah particularly, and therefore he complains thus feelingly of them, and of their subtle malice. Some as informers and prosecutors, others as judges, did all they could to take away his life; or, at least, his liberty. And this is very applicable to the chief priests and Pharisees, that persecuted Christ and his apostles, and for that sin they and their nation of scorners were cut off and consumed. 1. They ridiculed the prophets, and the serious professors of religion. They despised them, and did their utmost to bring them into contempt; they were scorners, and sat in the seat of the scornful. 2. They lay at catch for an occasion against them. By their spies they watch for iniquity, to see if they can lay hold on any thing that is said or done, that may be called an iniquity. Or, they themselves watch for an opportunity to do mischief, as Judas did to betray our Lord Jesus. 3. They took advantage against them for the least slip of the tongue; and if a thing were never so little said amiss it served them to ground an indictment upon. They made a man, gives "stare, and be blinded with amazement." Delitzsch has "blind yourselves, and grow blind" (Clark's English Edition). Professor Alexander: "be merry and blind." Boothroyd: "they look on themselves, and are agitated." There are still other renderings, but they cannot all be correct, and we prefer the idea suggested by Delitzsch, which accords with the following verse.

xxix. 11. "A book that is sealed"—i.e., sealed up, or fastened with a seal.

xxix. 13. "Their fear toward me is taught by the precept of men"—i.e., their worship is founded upon human precepts, and not upon Divine laws. Our Saviour referred to this passage in Matt. xv. 8, 9, where the sense rather than the exact rendering is given.

xxix. 15. The meaning is, "Woe unto them that seek to hide though he were never so wise and good a man, though he were a man of God, an offender for a word, a word mischosen, or misplaced, when they could not but know that it was well meant. They cavilled at every word that the prophets spoke to them by way of admonition, though never so innocently spoken, and without any design to affront them. They put the worst construction upon what was said, and made it criminal by strained innuendos. Those who consider how apt we all are to speak unadvisedly, and to mistake what we hear, will think it very unjust and unfair to make a man an offender for a word. 4. They did all they could to bring those into trouble that dealt faithfully with them, and told them of their faults. Those that reprove in the gates, that is, reprovers by office, that were bound by the duty of their place as prophets, as judges, and magistrates, to shew people their transgressions, they hated these, and laid snares for them; as the Pharisees' emissaries, who were sent to watch our Saviour, that they might entangle him in his talk, Mat. xxii. 15, that they might have something to lay to his charge which might render him odious to the people, or obnoxious to the government. "So persecuted they the prophets;" and it is next to impossible for the most cautious to place their words so warily as to escape such snares. See how base wicked people are, who bear ill-will to those who, out of good-will to them, seek to save their souls from death; and see what need reprovers have both of courage to do their duty and prudence to avoid the snare. 5. They pervert judgment, and will never let an honest man carry an honest cause; they "turn aside the just for a thing of nought," that is, they condemn him, or give the cause against him upon no evidence, no colour or pretence whatsoever. They run a man down, and misrepresent him by all the little arts and tricks they can devise, as they did our Saviour. We must not think it strange if we see the best of men thus treated; "the disciple is not greater than his master." But wait a while, and God will not only bring forth their righteousness, but cut off and consume these scorners.

Sixthly. Jacob, that was made to blush by the reproaches, and made to tremble by the threatenings, of his enemies, shall now be relieved, both against his shame, and against his fear, by the rolling away of those reproaches, and the defeating of those threatenings; ver. 22, "Thus the Lord saith, who redeemed Abraham," that is, called him out of Ur of the Chaldees, and so rescued him from the idolatry of his fathers, and plucked him as a brand out of the fire. He that redeemed Abraham out of his snares and troubles will redeem all that are by faith his genuine seed out of theirs. He that began his care of his church in the redemption of Abraham, when it and its Redeemer were in his loins, will not now cast off the care of it. Because the enemies of his people are so industrious, both to blacken them and to frighten them, therefore he will appear for the house of Jacob, and they shall not be ashamed as they have been, but shall have wherewith to answer those that reproach them; nor shall their faces now wax pale, but they shall gather courage, and look their enemies in the face without change of countenance; as they have reason to do who have the God of Abraham on their side.

Seventhly. Jacob, that thought his family would be extinct, and the entail of religion quite cut off, shall have the satisfaction of seeing a numerous progeny devoted to God for a generation, ver. 23. 1. He shall see his children; multitudes of believers, and praying people; the spiritual seed of faithful Abraham, and wrestling Jacob. Having his quiver full of these arrows, he shall not be ashamed, ver. 22, but shall speak with his enemy in the gate, Ps. cxxvii. 5. Christ shall not be ashamed, ch. l. 7, for he shall see his seed, ch. liii. 10. He sees some, and foresees more, "in the midst of him," flocking to the church, and residing there. 2. His children are the work of God's hands; being formed by him they are formed for him; his workmanship, created unto good works. It is some comfort to parents to think that their children are God's creatures, the work of the hands of his providence. But it will be much more a comfort to them to see their children his new creatures, the work of the hands of his grace. 3. He and his children shall sanctify the name of God, as their God, as the Holy One of Jacob, and shall fear and worship the God of Israel. This is opposed to his being ashamed and waxing pale; when he is delivered from his contempts and dangers he shall not magnify himself, but sanctify the Holy One of Jacob. If God make our condition easy, we must endeavour to make his name glorious. Parents and children are then ornaments and comforts indeed to each other, when they join in sanctifying the name of God. When parents give up their children, and children give up themselves to God, to be to him for a name and a praise, then the forest will soon become a fruitful field.

CHAPTER XXX.

The prophecy of this chapter seems to relate (as that in the chapter before) to the approaching danger of Jerusalem, and desolations of Judah, by Sennacherib's invasion. Here is, I. A just reproof to those who, in that distress, trusted to the Egyptians for help, and were all in a hurry to fetch succour from thence, ver. 1—7. II. A terrible threatening against those that slighted the good advice which God. by his prophets, gave them for the repose of their minds in that distress, assuring them that, whatever became of others, the judgment would certainly overtake them, ver. 8—17. III. A gracious promise to those who trusted in God, that they should not only see through the trouble, but should see happy days after it, times of joy and reformation, and plenty of the means of grace, and therewith plenty of outward good things, and increasing joys and triumphs, ver. 18—26; and these promises are, many of them, very applicable to gospel grace. IV. A prophecy of the total rout and ruin of the Assyrian army, which should be an occasion of great joy, and an introduction to those happy times, ver. 27—33.

WOE to the rebellious children, saith the LORD,
That take counsel, but not of me;
And that cover with a covering, but not of my spirit,
That they may add sin to sin:
2 That walk to go down into Egypt,
And have not asked at my mouth;
To strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh,
And to trust in the shadow of Egypt.
3 Therefore shall the strength of Pharaoh be your shame,
And the trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion.
4 For his princes were at Zoan,
And his ambassadors came to Hanes.
5 They were all ashamed of a people that could not profit
Nor be an help nor profit, [them,
But a shame, and also a reproach.
6 The burden of the beasts of the south:
Into the land of trouble and anguish,
From whence come the young and old lion,
The viper and fiery flying serpent, [asses,
They will carry their riches upon the shoulders of young
And their treasures upon the bunches of camels,
To a people that shall not profit them.
7 For the Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose:
Therefore have I cried concerning this,
Their strength is to sit still.

It was often the fault and folly of the people of the Jews, that when they were insulted by their neighbours on one side, they sought for succour from their neighbours on the other side, instead of looking up to God, and putting their confidence in him. Against the Israelites they sought to the Syrians, 2 Chr. xvi. 2, 3; against the Syrians they sought to the Assyrians, 2 Kin. xvi. 7; against the Assyrians they here sought to the Egyptians, and Rabshakeh upbraided them with it, 2 Kin. xviii. 21. Now observe here,

First. How this sin of theirs is described, and what there was in it that was provoking to God. When they saw themselves in danger and distress, 1. They would not consult with God. They would do things of their own heads, and not advise with God, though they had a ready and certain way of doing it by Urim, or prophets. They were so confident of the prudence of their own measures, that they thought it needless to consult the oracle; nay, they were not willing to put it to that issue; they take counsel among themselves, and one from another, but they do not ask counsel, much less will they take counsel of me. "They cover with a covering," that is, they think to secure themselves with one shelter or other, which may serve to cover them from the violence of the storm; "but not of my Spirit," not such as God by his Spirit in the mouth of his prophets directed them to; and therefore it will prove too short a covering, and a refuge of lies. 2. They could not confide in God. They did not think it enough to have God on their side, nor were they at all solicitous to make him their friend, but they "strengthened themselves in the strength of Pharaoh." They thought him a powerful ally, and doubted not but to be able to cope with the Assyrian while they had him for them. The shadow of Egypt (and it was but a shadow) was the covering in which they wrapped themselves.

Secondly. What was the evil of this sin. 1. It bespoke them rebellious children, and a woe is here denounced against them under that character, ver. 1. They were in profession God's children, but not trusting in him they were justly stigmatized as rebellious; for if we distrust God's providence we do in effect withdraw ourselves from our allegiance. 2. They added sin to sin. It was sin that brought them into distress; and then, instead of repenting, they trespassed yet more against the Lord, 2 Chr. xxviii. 22. And they that had abused God's mercies to them, in making them the fuel of their lusts, abused their afflictions too, in making them an excuse for their distrust of God. And so they make ill worse, and add sin to sin; and they that do so, as they make their own chain heavy, so it is just with God to make their plagues wonderful. Now that which aggravated it was, 1st. That they took so much pains to secure the Egyptians for them. They walk or go down to Egypt, travel up and down to find an advantageous road thither, but they "have not asked at my mouth," never considered whether God would allow and approve of it or no. 2nd. That they were at such a vast expence to do it, ver. 6. 'They load the beasts of the south' (horses fetched from Egypt, which lay south from Judæa) with their riches; fancying, as it is common with people in a fright, that they were safer anywhere than where they were. Or, they sent their riches thither as bribes to Pharaoh's courtiers, to engage them in their interest, or as pay for their army. God would have helped them gratis; but if they will have it from the Egyptians they must pay dear for it, and they seem willing to do so. The riches that are so spent will turn to an ill account. They carried their effects to Egypt through 'a land' (so it may be read) 'of trouble and anguish;' that vast howling wilderness which lay between Canaan and Egypt, from "whence come the lion, and fiery serpent," Deu. viii. 15. They would venture through that dangerous wilderness to bring what they had to Egypt. Or, it may be meant of Egypt itself, which had been to Israel a house of bondage, and therefore a land of trouble and anguish, and which abounded in ravenous and venomous creatures. See what dangers men run into that forsake God, and what dangers they will run into in pursuance of their carnal confidences, and their expectations from the creature.

Thirdly. What would be the consequence of it. 1. The Egyptians would receive their ambassadors, would speak them fair, and be willing to treat with them; ver. 4, "His princes were at Zoan," at Pharaoh's court there, and had their audience of the king, who encouraged them to depend upon his friendship, and the succours he would send them. But, 2. They would not answer their expectation, they could not profit them, ver. 5. For God saith, they shall not profit them, ver. 6; and every creature is that to us, and no more, that he makes it be. Either the forces they were to furnish them with could not be raised in time, or when they were raised they were not fit for service, and they would not venture any of their veteran troops in the expedition; or the march was so long that they could not come up when they had occasion for them; or the Egyptians would not be cordial to Israel, but would secretly incline to the Assyrians, upon some account or other; "The Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose," ver. 7; they shall hinder and hurt instead of helping. And therefore, 3. These people, that were now so fond of the Egyptians, would at length be ashamed of them, and of all their expectations from them, and confidence in them; ver. 3, "The strength of Pharaoh," which was your pride, "shall be your shame;" all your neighbours will upbraid you, and you will upbraid yourselves with your folly in trusting to it. And "the shadow of Egypt," that land shadowing with wings, (ch. xviii. 1,) that was your confidence, shall be "your confusion;" it will not only disappoint you, and be the matter of your shame, but it will weaken all your other supports, and be an occasion of mischief to you. God afterwards threatens the ruin of Egypt for this very thing, because they had dealt treacherously with Israel, and been a staff of a reed to them, Eze. xxix. 6, 7. The princes and ambassadors of Israel, that were so forward to court an alliance with them, when they come among them, shall see so much of their weakness, or rather of their baseness, that "they shall all be ashamed of a people that could not be a help or profit to them," but a shame and reproach, ver. 5. Those that trust in God, and in his power, providence, and promise, are never made ashamed of their hope; but they that put confidence in any creature will sooner or later find it a reproach to them. God is true, and may be trusted, but every man a liar, and must be

xxix. 16. This may be translated, "In your perverseness is the potter to be reckoned as clay, that the work should say to its maker, He made me not? and the thing framed say to its fashioner, He hath no understanding?"

xxix. 19. "The meek" here may either be the humble or the afflicted.

xxix. 21. "Him that reproveth" is "him that pleads a cause." The gate was the place where cases were heard and decided by the judges. "Turn aside the just for a thing of nought" means "put aside a just man by a worthless plea" or pretence.

xxix. 24. "Doctrine" here means "instruction."

xxx. 1. To "cover with a covering" is variously explained, but probably means to form an alliance or frame a secret treaty.

xxx. 4. Zoan was a city of Egypt, a royal residence, and called suspected. The Creator is a rock of ages, the creature a broken reed. We cannot expect too little from man, or too much from God.

Fourthly. The use and application of all this; ver. 7, "Therefore have I cried concerning this" matter, this project of theirs; I have published it, that all might take notice of it; I have pressed it as one in earnest; "Their strength is to sit still," in an humble dependence upon God and his goodness, and a quiet submission to his will, and not to vary about, and put themselves into a toss, to seek for help from this and the other creature. If we sit still in a day of distress, hoping and quietly waiting for the salvation of the Lord, and using only lawful, regular methods for our own preservation, this will be the strength of our souls, both for services and sufferings, and it will engage Divine strength for us. We weaken ourselves, and provoke God to withdraw from us, when we make flesh our arm; for then our heart departeth from the Lord. When we have tired ourselves by seeking for help from creatures, we shall find it the best way of recruiting ourselves to repose in the Creator. Here I am, let him do with me as he pleaseth.

8 Now go, write it before them in a table,
And note it in a book,
That it may be for the time to come for ever and ever:
9 That this is a rebellious people, lying children,
Children that will not hear the law of the LORD:
10 Which say to the seers,
See not;
And to the prophets,
Prophesy not unto us right things,
Speak unto us smooth things,
Prophesy deceits:
11 Get you out of the way,
Turn aside out of the path,
Cause the Holy One of Israel to cease from before us.
12 Wherefore thus saith the Holy One of Israel,
Because ye despise this word,
And trust in oppression and perverseness,
And stay thereon:
13 Therefore this iniquity shall be to you
As a breach ready to fall,
Swelling out in a high wall,
Whose breaking cometh suddenly at an instant.
14 And he shall break it [pieces;
As the breaking of the potters' vessel that is broken in
He shall not spare: [sherd
So that there shall not be found in the bursting of it a
To take fire from the hearth,
Or to take water withal out of the pit.
15 For thus saith the Lord GOD, the Holy One of Israel;
In returning and rest shall ye be saved;
In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength:
and ye would not.
16 But ye said, No; for we will flee upon horses;
Therefore shall ye flee:
And, We will ride upon the swift;
Therefore shall they that pursue you be swift.
17 One thousand shall flee at the rebuke of one;
At the rebuke of five shall ye flee:
Till ye be left as a beacon upon the top of a mountain,
And as an ensign on an hill.

Here, First. The preface is very awful. The prophet must not only preach this, but he must write it, ver. 8,—write it in a table to be hung up and exposed to public view. He must carefully note it, not in loose papers, which might be lost or torn, but in a book, to be preserved for posterity, in perpetuam rei memoriam; let it remain for the time to come 'a standing testimony' against this wicked generation; let it remain not only to the next succeeding ages, but for ever and ever, while the world stands. And so it shall; for the book of the Scriptures no doubt shall continue, and be read to the end of time. Let it be written, 1. To shame the men of the present age, that would not hear and heed it when it was spoken; let it be written, that it may not be lost; their children may profit by it, though they will not. 2. To justify God in the judgments he was about to bring upon them. People will be tempted to think he was too hard upon them, and over severe, unless they know how very bad they were, how very provoking, and what fair means God tried with them before he brought it to this extremity. 3. For warning to others, not to do as they did, lest they fare as they fared. It is designed for admonition to those of the remotest place and age, even those "upon whom the ends of the world are come," 1 Cor. x. 11. It may be of use for God's ministers not only to preach but to write; for that which is written remains.

Secondly. The character given of the profane and wicked Jews is very sad. He must, if he will draw them in their own colours, write this concerning them, and we are sure he doth not bear false witness against them, nor make them worse than they were; for the judgment of God is according to truth, "That this is a rebellious people," ver. 9. The Jews were, for aught we know, the only professing people God had then in the world, and yet many of them were a rebellious people. 1. They rebelled against their own convictions and covenants, for they are lying children that will not stand to what they say; that promise fair, but perform nothing. When he took them into covenant with him he said of them, "Surely they are my people, children that will not lie," ch. lxiii. 8; but they proved otherwise. 2. They rebelled against the Divine authority. They are "children that will not hear the law of the Lord," nor heed it, but will do as they have a mind, let God himself say what he will to the contrary.

Thirdly. The charge drawn up against them is very high, and the sentence passed upon them very dreadful. Two things they here stand charged with, and their doom is ready for both,—a fearful doom.

1. They forbade the prophets to speak to them in God's name, and to deal faithfully with them. This their sin is described, ver. 10, 11. They did set themselves so violently against the prophets, to hinder them from preaching, or at least from dealing plainly with them in their preaching, did so banter them, and browbeat them, that they did in effect "say to the seers, See not." They had the light, but they loved darkness rather. It was their privilege that they had seers among them, but they did what they could to put out their eyes; that they had prophets among them, but they did what they could to stop their mouths; for they tormented them in their wicked ways. Rev. xi. 10. Those that silence good ministers, and discountenance good preaching, are justly counted and called rebels against God. See what it was in the prophet's preaching with which they found themselves aggrieved: 1st. The prophets told them of their faults, and warned them of their misery and danger by reason of sin, and they could not bear that. They must speak to them smooth things; must flatter them in their sins, and say they did well, and there was no harm, no peril, in the course of life they lived. Let a thing be never so right and true, if it be not smooth, they will not hear it; but if it be agreeable to the good opinion they have of themselves, and will confirm them in that, though it be never so false, and never so great a cheat upon them, they will have it prophesied to them. Those deserve to be deceived that desire to be so. 2nd. The prophets stopped them in their sinful pursuits, and stood in their way, like the angels in Balaam's road, with the sword of God's wrath drawn in their hand, so that they could not proceed without terror. And this they took heinously; and, when they went on frowardly in the way of their hearts, they said to the prophets, "Get you out of the way, turn aside out of the paths." What do ye do in our way? Cannot you let us alone to do as we please? Those have "their hearts fully set in them to do evil," that bid their faithful monitors to stand out of their way; "Forbear, why shouldst thou be smitten?" 2 Chr. xxv. 16. 3rd. The prophets were continually telling them of the Holy One of Israel; what an enemy he is to sin, and how severely he will reckon with sinners; and this they could not endure to hear of. Both the thing itself and the expression of it was too serious for them; and therefore, if the prophets will speak to them, they will make it their bargain that they shall not call God the Holy One of Israel; for God's holiness is that attribute which of all other wicked people most dread. Let us no more be troubled with that state preface (as Mr. White calls it) to your impertinent harangues. Those have reason to fear perishing in their sins that cannot bear to be frightened out of them.

Now what is the doom passed upon them for this? We have it ver. 12, 13. Observe, First. Who it is that gives judgment upon them; "Thus saith the Holy One of Israel." That title of God which they particularly excepted against, the prophet makes use of. Faithful ministers will not be driven from using such expressions as are proper to awaken sinners, though they be displeasing. We must tell men that God is the Holy One of Israel, and so they shall find him, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear. Secondly. What the ground of the judgment is. Because they despise this word, either in general, every word that the prophets said to them, or this word in particular, which speaks God the Holy One of Israel. They despise this, and will neither make it their fear, to stand in awe of it, nor make it their hope, to put any confidence in it; but, rather than they will be beholden to the Holy One of Israel, will trust in oppression and perverseness; in the wealth they have got, and the interest they have made, by fraud and violence; or in those sinful methods they have taken for their own security, in contradiction to God and his will. On these they stay, and therefore it is just they fall. Thirdly. What the judgment is that is passed upon them. This iniquity shall be to you as a breach ready to fall; this confidence of yours will be like a house built upon the sand, which will fall in the storm, and bury the builder in the ruins of it. Your contempt of that word of God which you might build upon, will make every thing else you trust to like a wall that bulgeth and bellieth out, which, if any weight be laid upon it, comes down; nay, which often sinks with its own weight. The ruin they would hereby bring upon themselves should be, 1st. A surprising ruin. The breaking shall come suddenly, in an instant, when they do not expect it, which will make it the more frightful; and when they are not prepared or provided for it, which will make it the more fatal. 2nd. An utter ruin, universal and irreparable. You and all your confidences shall be not only weak as the potter's clay, ch xxix. 16, but broken to pieces as the potter's vessel. He that hath the rod of iron shall break it, Ps. ii. 9; and he shall not spare, nor have any regard to it, nor be in care to preserve or keep whole any part of it. But when once it is broken, so as to be unfit for use, let it be dashed, let it be crushed, all to pieces, so that there may not remain one sherd big enough to take up a little fire or water, two things we have daily need of, and which poor people commonly fetch in a piece of a broken pitcher. They shall not only be as a bowing wall, Ps. lxii. 3, but as a broken mug, or glass, which is good for nothing, nor can ever be made whole again.

2. They slighted the gracious directions God gave them; not only how to secure themselves, and make themselves safe, but how to compose themselves, and make themselves easy; and would take their own way, ver. 15—17. Observe here,

1st. The method God put them into for salvation and strength. The God that knew them, and knew what was proper for them, and desired their welfare, gave them this prescription. And it is recommended to us all. First Would we be saved from the evil of every calamity, guarded against the temptation of it, and secured from the curse of it, which are the only evil things in it, it must be in returning and rest; in returning to God, and reposing in him as our rest. Let us return from our evil ways, into which we have gone aside, and rest and settle in the way of God and duty; and that is the way to be saved. Return from this project of going down to Egypt, and rest satisfied in the will of God; and then you may trust him with your safety. In returning, that is, in the thorough reformation of your hearts and lives; and in rest, that is, in an entire submission of your souls to God, and a complacency in him, you shall be saved. Secondly. Would we be strengthened to do what is required of us, and to bear what is laid upon us, it must be in quietness, and in confidence; that is, we must keep our spirits calm and sedate by a continual dependence upon God, and his power and goodness. We must retire into ourselves with a holy quietness, suppressing all turbulent and tumultuous passions, and keeping the peace in our own minds. And we must rely upon God with a holy confidence that he can do what he will, and will do what is best for his people. And this will be our strength; it will inspire us with such a holy fortitude

Tanis by the Greeks. Hanes was also an Egyptian city, but whether Tahpanhes or the place called Heracleopolis by the Greeks is undecided. The Chaldee gives the name of Tahpanhes. The objection to Heracleopolis or Anusis is that it was in Central Egypt, far from Judea.

xxx. 6. "The burden of the beasts of the south" may mean "the oracle concerning the beasts of burden in the south." The word for "south" often signifies the Negeb, or country between Judea and Egypt, and it may do so here. The wealth of Israel was carried on asses and camels through this arid and dangerous region, as a present to the Egyptians, or to purchase a useless alliance.

xxx. 7. The second clause is otherwise explained by some. We think the true sense is that "their striving is in vain"—it is useless for them to urge on a treaty with Egypt. This idea naturally follows from the first part of the verse.

xxx. 8. "In a table"—i.e., "on a tablet."

as will carry us with ease and courage through all the difficulties we may meet with.

2nd. The contempt they put upon this prescription. They would not take God's counsel, though it was so much for their own good. And justly will they die of their disease that will not take God for their physician. We are certainly enemies to ourselves if we will not be subjects to him. They would not so much as try the method prescribed; "But ye said, No," ver. 16, we will not compose ourselves, for "we will flee upon horses, and we will ride upon the swift;" we will hurry hither and thither to fetch in foreign aids. They think themselves wiser than God, and that they know what is good for themselves better than he doth. When Sennacherib took all the fenced cities of Judah, those rebellious children would not be persuaded to sit still and patiently to expect God's appearing for them, as he did wonderfully at last; but they would shift for their own safety, and thereby they exposed themselves to so much the more danger.

3rd. The sentence passed upon them for this. Their sin shall be their punishment. You will flee, and therefore ye shall flee; you will be upon the full speed, and therefore so shall those be that pursue you. The dogs are most apt to run barking after him that rides fast. The conquerors protected those that sat still, but pursued those that made their escape. And so that very project, by which they hoped to save themselves, was justly their ruin; and the most guilty suffered most. It is foretold, ver. 17, First. That they should be easily cut off. They should be so dispirited with their own fears, increased by their flight, that one of the enemy should defeat a thousand of them, and five put an army to flight; which could never be unless "their Rock had sold them," Deu. xxxii. 30. Secondly. That they should be generally cut off, and only here and there one should escape, alone in a solitary place, and left for a spectacle too, as a "beacon upon the top of a mountain;" a warning to others to avoid the like sinful courses and confidences.

18 And therefore will the LORD wait, that he may be gracious unto you,
And therefore will he be exalted, that he may have mercy upon you:
For the LORD is a God of judgment:
Blessed are all they that wait for him.
19 For the people shall dwell in Zion at Jerusalem:
Thou shalt weep no more:
He will be very gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry;
When he shall hear it, he will answer thee.
20 And though the Lord give you
The bread of adversity, and the water of affliction,
Yet shall not thy teachers be removed into a corner any more,
But thine eyes shall see thy teachers:
21 And thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying,
This is the way, walk ye in it,
When ye turn to the right hand, and when ye turn to the left.
22 Ye shall defile also the covering of thy graven images of silver,
And the ornament of thy molten images of gold:
Thou shalt cast them away as a menstruous cloth;
Thou shalt say unto it, Get thee hence.
23 Then shall he give the rain of thy seed,
That thou shalt sow the ground withal;
And bread of the increase of the earth,
And it shall be fat and plenteous:
In that day shall thy cattle feed in large pastures.
24 The oxen likewise and the young asses that ear the ground
Shall eat clean provender,
Which hath been winnowed with the shovel and with the fan.
25 And there shall be upon every high mountain,
And upon every high hill,
Rivers and streams of waters
In the day of the great slaughter,
When the towers fall.
26 Moreover the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun,
And the light of the sun shall be sevenfold,
As the light of seven days,
In the day that the LORD bindeth up the breach of his people,
And healeth the stroke of their wound.

The closing words of the foregoing paragraph, "Ye shall be left as a beacon upon a mountain," some understand as a promise, that a remnant of them should be reserved as monuments of mercy. And here the prophet tells them what good times should succeed these calamities. Or, the first words of this paragraph may be read by way of antithesis: 'Notwithstanding this, yet will the Lord wait that he may be gracious.' The prophet, having shewed that those who made Egypt their confidence would be ashamed of it, here shews that they who sat still, and made God alone their confidence, would have the comfort of it. It is matter of comfort to the people of God, when the times are very bad, that all will be well yet. Well with them that fear God when we say to the wicked, It shall be ill with them.

First. God will be gracious to them, and will have mercy on them. That is the foundation of all good. If we find favour with God, and he have mercy upon us, we shall have comfort according to the time that we have been afflicted. 1. He will "wait to be gracious," ver. 18. He will wait till you return to him, and seek his face, and then he will be ready to meet you with mercy. He will wait that he may do it in the best and fittest time, when it will be most for his glory; when it will come to you with the most pleasing surprise. He will continually follow you with his favours, and not let slip any opportunity of being gracious to you. 2. He will stir up himself to deliver you, will be exalted, will be raised up out of his holy habitation, Zec. ii. 13, that he may appear for you in more than ordinary instances of power and goodness. And thus he will be exalted; that is, he will glorify his own name; that is it he aims at, in having mercy on his people. 3. He will be very gracious, ver. 19. And this in answer to prayer; which makes his kindness doubly kind. "He will be gracious to thee, at the voice of thy cry;" the cry of thy necessity, when that is most urgent; the cry of thy prayer, when that is most fervent. "When he shall hear it," there needs no more; at the first word "he will answer thee," and say, "Here I am." Herein he is very gracious indeed.

In particular, 1. Those that were disturbed in the possession of their estates shall again enjoy them quietly. When the danger is over, "the people shall dwell in Zion at Jerusalem," as they used to do; they shall dwell safely, free from the fear of evil. 2. Those that were all in tears shall have cause to rejoice, and shall weep no more; and those who dwell in Zion, the holy city, will find enough there to wipe away tears from their eyes. Now this is grounded upon two great truths: 1st. That the Lord is a God of judgment; that is, he is both wise and just in all the disposals of his providence; true to his word, and tender of his people. If he correct his children it is with judgment, Jer. x. 24, with moderation, and discretion, considering their frame. We think we may safely refer ourselves to a man of judgment; and shall we not commit our way to a God of judgment? 2nd. That therefore all those are blessed that wait for him; that not only wait on him with their prayers, but wait for him with their hopes; that will not take any indirect course to extricate themselves out of their straits, or anticipate their deliverance, but patiently expect God's appearances for them in his own way and time. Because God is infinitely wise, those are truly happy that refer themselves to him.

Secondly. They shall not again know the want of the means of grace, ver. 20, 21. Here, 1. It is supposed that they might be brought into straits and troubles after this deliverance was wrought for them. It was promised, ver. 19, that they should weep no more, and that God would be gracious to them; and yet here it is taken for granted that God may give them the bread of adversity and the water of affliction; prisoners' fare, 1 Kin. xxii. 27, coarse and sorry food, such as the poor use. When one trouble is over we know not how soon another may succeed; and we may have an interest in the favour of God, and such consolations as are sufficient to prohibit weeping, and yet may have bread of adversity given us to eat, and water of affliction to drink. Let us, therefore, not judge of love or hatred by what is before us. 2. It is promised that their eyes should see their teachers; that is, that they should have faithful teachers among them, and should have hearts to regard them, and not slight them as they had done; and then they might the better be reconciled to the bread of adversity and the water of affliction. It was a common saying among the old Puritans, 'Brown bread and the Gospel is good fare.' A famine of bread is nothing so great a judgment as a famine of the word of God, Am. viii. 11, 12. It seems that teachers had been removed into corners, probably being forced to shift for their safety, in the reign of Ahaz; but it shall be so no more. 'Truth seeks no corners for concealment,'—Veritas non quærit angulos; but the teachers of truth may sometimes be driven into corners for shelter; and it goes ill with the church when it is so; when the woman with her crown of twelve stars is forced to flee into the wilderness, Rev. xii. 6, when the prophets are hid by fifty in a cave, 1 Kin. xviii. 4. But God will find a time to call the teachers out of their corners again, and to replace them in their solemn assemblies, which shall see their own teachers, the eyes of all the synagogue being fastened on them, Lu. iv. 20; and it will be the more pleasing because of the restraint they have been for some time under, as light out of darkness, as life from the dead. To all that love God and their own souls, this return of faithful teachers out of their corners, especially with a promise that they "shall not be removed into corners any more," is the most acceptable part of any deliverance, and has comfort enough in it to sweeten even "the bread of adversity and the water of affliction." But this is not all; it is promised that they shall have the benefit not only of a public ministry, but of private and particular admonition and advice; ver. 21, "Thine ears shall hear a word behind thee," calling after thee, as a man calls after a traveller that he sees going out of his road. Observe, 1st. Whence this word shall come; from behind thee, from some one that thou dost not see, but sees thee. Thine eyes see thy teachers, but this is a teacher out of sight, it is thy own conscience, which shall now, by the grace of God, be awakened to do its office. 2nd. What the word shall be: "This is the way, walk ye in it." When thou art doubting, conscience shall direct thee to the way of duty; when thou art dull and trifling, conscience shall quicken thee in that way. As God hath not left himself without witness, so he has not left us without guides to shew us our way. 3rd. The seasonableness of this word. It shall come "when ye turn to the right hand or to the left." We are very apt to miss our way, there are turnings on both hands, and those so tracked and seemingly straight, as that they may easily be mistaken for the right way. There are right-hand and left-hand errors, extremes on each side virtue. The tempter is busy courting us into the bypaths. It is happy then, if, by the particular counsels of a faithful minister or friend, or the checks of conscience and the strivings of God's Spirit, we be set right, and prevented from going wrong. 4th. The success of this word. It shall not only be spoken, but thine ears shall hear it; whereas God has formerly spoken once, yea twice, and thou hast not perceived it, Job xxxiii. 14; now thou shalt listen attentively to those secret whispers, and hear them with an obedient ear. If God give us not only the word, but the hearing ear, not only the means of grace, but a heart to make a good use of those means, we have reason to say he is very gracious to us, and reason to hope he has yet farther mercy in store for us.

Thirdly. They shall be cured of their idolatry, shall fall out with their idols, and never be reconciled to them again, ver. 22. The deliverance God shall work for them shall convince them that it is their interest, as well as duty, to serve him only; and they shall own that, as their trouble was brought upon them for their idolatries, so it was removed upon condition they should not return to them. This is also the good effect of their seeing their teachers, and hearing the word behind them; by this it shall appear they are the better for the means of grace they enjoy; they shall break off from their best beloved sin. Observe, 1. How foolishly mad they had formerly been upon their idols in the day of their apostacy. Idolaters are said to be mad upon their idols, Jer. l. 38, doating fond of them. They had graven images of silver, and molten images of gold; and, though gold needs no painting, they had coverings and ornaments on these; they spared no cost in doing honour to their idols. 2. How wisely mad, if I may so speak, they now were at their idols, what a holy indignation they conceived against them in the day of their repentance. They not only degraded their images, but defaced them; not only defaced them, but defiled them; they

xxx. 11. "Cause the Holy One," &c., means "remove the Holy One of Israel from before us."

xxx. 13. "Your iniquity will be to you like the force which causes a wall to bulge out before it falls. Your sin is the plain cause of your ruin."

xxx. 14. "Your ruin will be as complete as that of a potter's vessel dashed to atoms." For carrying fire, and for lading out water, a mere piece of an earthen vessel would suffice.

xxx. 15. Their duty was to go back and quietly trust, but they refused.

xxx. 17. The beacon here is properly a tall pole, a mast, or flag-staff. They would be deserted like a solitary flag-staff on a mountain-top, or a signal upon the top of a hill.

xxx. 22. "Even gold and silver, with which the images that were either carved or cast in inferior metal were overlaid, would be made unclean; that is to say, no use would be made of them" (Delitzsch).

not only spoiled the shape of them, but, in a pious fury, threw away the gold and silver they were made of, though otherwise valuable and convertible to a good use. They could not find in their hearts to make any vessels of honour of it. The rich clothes, wherewith their images were dressed up, they cast away as filthy cloth, which those that touched must be unclean until the even, Lev. xv. 23. Note, To all true penitents sin is become very odious; they loathe it, and loathe themselves because of it. They cast it away to the dunghill, the fittest place for it; nay, to the cross, for they crucify the flesh; their cry against it is, Crucify it, crucify it. They say unto it, "Get thee hence;" Abi hinc in malem rem. They are resolved never to harbour it any more. They put as far from them as they can all the occasions of sin, and temptations to it, though they are as a right eye or a right hand, and protest against it as Ephraim did, Hos. xiv. 8, "What have I to do any more with idols?" Probably this was fulfilled in the many particular persons, who, by the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib's army, were convinced of the folly of their idolatry and forsook it. It was fulfilled in the body of the Jewish nation, at their return from their captivity in Babylon, for they abhorred idols ever after; and it is accomplished daily in the conversion of souls, by the power of Divine grace, from spiritual idolatry to the fear and love of God. Those that join themselves to the Lord must abandon every sin, and say unto it, Get thee hence.

Fourthly. God will then give them plenty of all good things. When he gives them their teachers, and they give him their hearts, so that they begin to seek the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, then all other things shall be added to them, Mat. vi. 33. And when the people are brought to praise God, "then shall the earth yield her increase, and with it God, even our own God, shall bless us," Ps. lxvii. 5, 6. So it follows here; When ye shall have abandoned your idols, "then shall God give the rain of your seed," ver. 23. When we return to God in a way of duty, he will meet us with his favours. 1. God will give you rain of your seed; that is, rain to water the seed you sow, just at the time that it calls for it, as much as it needs, and no more. Observe, How man's industry and God's blessing concur to the good things we enjoy relating to the life that now is. "Thou shalt sow the ground," that is thy part, and then "God will give the rain of thy seed," that is his part. It is so in spiritual fruit; we must take pains with our hearts, and then wait on God for his grace. 2. The increase of the earth shall be rich and good, and every thing the best of the kind; it shall be fat and fat, very fat and very good; fat and plenteous, so we read it; good, and enough of it; your land shall be Canaan indeed. It was remarkably so after the defeat of Sennacherib, by the special blessing of God, ch. xxxvii. 30. God would thus repair the losses they sustained by that devastation. 3. Not only the tillage, but the pasture-ground should be remarkably fruitful. "The cattle shall feed in large pastures;" those that are at grass shall have room enough, and the oxen and asses that are kept up for use, to ear the ground, which must be the better fed for their being worked, they shall eat clean provender; the corn shall not be given them in the chaff, as usual, to make it go the farther, but good clean corn, fit for man's use, being winnowed with the fan. The brute creatures shall share in the abundance; it is fit they should, for they groan under the burthen of the curse which man's sin has brought upon the earth. 4. Even the tops of the mountains, that used to be barren, shall be so well watered with the rain of heaven, that there shall be rivers and streams there, and running down thence to the valleys, ver. 25; and this in the day of the great slaughter that should be made by the angel in the camp of the Assyrians; when the towers and batteries they had erected for the carrying on of the siege of Jerusalem, the army being slain, should fall of course. Probably this was fulfilled in the letter of it, and that about the same time that that army was cut off there were extraordinary rains, in mercy to the land.

Fifthly. The effect of all this should be extraordinary comfort and joy to the people of God, ver. 26. Light shall increase; that is, knowledge shall; when the prophecies are accomplished they shall be fully understood. Or rather, triumph shall; the light of the joy that is sown for the righteous shall now come up with a great increase; the light of the moon shall become as bright and as strong as that of the sun, and that of the sun shall increase proportionably, and be as the light of seven days; every one shall be much more cheerful, and appear much more pleasant than usual. There shall be a high springtide of joy in Judah and Jerusalem upon occasion of the ruin of the Assyrian army. "When the Lord binds up the breach of his people," he not only saves them from being farther wounded, but heals the wounds that have been given them by this invasion, and makes up all their losses. The great distress they were reduced to, their despair of relief, and the suddenness of their deliverance, would much augment their joy. This is not unfitly applied by many to the light which the Gospel brought into the world to them that sat in darkness, which as far exceeds the Old Testament light as that of the sun doth that of the moon, and which proclaims healing to the broken-hearted, and the binding up of their wounds.

27 Behold, the name of the LORD cometh from far,
Burning with his anger, and the burden thereof is heavy:
His lips are full of indignation,
And his tongue as a devouring fire:
28 And his breath, as an overflowing stream,
Shall reach to the midst of the neck,
To sift the nations with the sieve of vanity:
And there shall be a bridle in the jaws of the people, causing them to err.
29 Ye shall have a song, as in the night when a holy solemnity is kept;
And gladness of heart, as when one goeth with a pipe
To come into the mountain of the LORD, to the mighty One of Israel.
30 And the LORD shall cause his glorious voice to be heard,
And shall shew the lighting down of his arm,
With the indignation of his anger, and with the flame of a devouring fire,
With scattering, and tempest, and hailstones.
31 For through the voice of the LORD shall the Assyrian be beaten down,
Which smote with a rod.
32 And in every place where the grounded staff shall pass
Which the LORD shall lay upon him,
It shall be with tabrets and harps:
And in battles of shaking will he fight with it.
33 For Tophet is ordained of old;
Yea, for the king it is prepared;
He hath made it deep and large:
The pile thereof is fire and much wood;
The breath of the LORD, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it.

This terrible prediction of the ruin of the Assyrian army, though it is a threatening to them, is part of the promise to the Israel of God, that God would not only punish the Assyrians for the mischief they had done to the Israel of God, but would disable and deter them from attempting the like again. And this prediction, which would now shortly be accomplished, would ratify and confirm the foregoing promises, which should be accomplished in the latter days. Here is,

First. God Almighty angry, and coming forth in anger against the Assyrians. He is here introduced in all the power and all the terror of his wrath; ver. 27, "The name of Jehovah," which the Assyrians disdain, and set at a distance from them, as if they were out of its reach, and it could do them no harm, "Behold, it cometh from far." A messenger, in the name of the Lord, cometh from as far off as heaven itself. He is a messenger of wrath, "burning with his anger." God's "lips are full of indignation" at the blasphemy of Rabshakeh, who compared the God of Israel with the gods of the heathen. "His tongue is as a devouring fire," for he can speak his proud enemies to ruin. "His" very "breath" comes with as much force "as an overflowing stream," and with it he shall slay the wicked, ch. xi. 4. He doth not stifle or smother his resentments, as men do theirs, when they are either causeless or impotent; but "he shall cause his glorious voice to be heard," when he proclaims war with an enemy that sets him at defiance, ver. 30. He shall display "the indignation of his anger," anger in the highest degree; it shall be as "the flame of a devouring fire," which carries and consumes all before it, with lightning or dissipation, and with tempests and hailstones, all which are the formidable phenomena of nature, and therefore expressive of the terror of the almighty God of nature.

Secondly. The execution done by this anger of the Lord. Men are often angry when they can only threaten and talk big; but when God causeth "his glorious voice to be heard," that shall not be all; he will "shew the lighting down of his arm" too, ver. 30. The operations of his providence shall accomplish the menaces of his word. They that would not see the lifting up of his arm, ch. xxvi. 11, shall feel the lighting down of it, and find to their cost, that "the burden thereof is heavy," ver. 27, so heavy as that they cannot bear it, nor bear up against it, but must unavoidably sink and be crushed under it. "Who knows the power of his anger," or imagines what an offended God can do? Five things are here prepared for the execution:

1. Here is "an overflowing stream," that "shall reach to the midst of the neck," shall quite overwhelm the whole body of the army; and Sennacherib only, the head of it, shall keep above water, and escape this stroke, while yet he is reserved for another in the house of Nisroch his god. The Assyrian army had been to Judah as an overflowing stream, reaching even to the neck, ch. viii. 7, 8, and now the breath of God's wrath will be so to it.

2. Here is a sieve of vanity with which God would sift the nations of which the Assyrian army was composed, ver. 28. The great God can sift nations, for they are all before him as the small dust of the balance. He will sift them; not to gather out of them any that should be preserved, but so as to shake them one against another; put them into a mighty consternation, and shake them all away at last; for it is a sieve of vanity, which retains nothing, that they are shaken with; and they are found all chaff.

3. Here is a bridle which God has in their jaws, to curb and restrain them from doing the mischief they would do, and to force and constrain them to serve his purposes against their own will, ch. x. 7. God particularly saith of Sennacherib, ch. xxxvii. 29, that he will put a hook in his nose, and a bridle in his lips. It is a bridle causing them to err, that is, forcing them to such methods as will certainly be destructive to themselves and their interest, and in which they will be infatuated. God with a word guides his people into the right way, ver. 21, but with a bridle he turns his enemies headlong upon their own ruin.

4. Here is a rod and a staff, even the voice of the Lord, his word giving orders concerning it, with which the Assyrian shall be beaten down, ver. 31. The Assyrian had been himself a rod in God's hand for the chastising of his people, and had smitten them, ch. x. 5. That was a transient rod; but against the Assyrian shall go forth a grounded staff, that shall give a steady blow, shall stick close to him, and strike home, so as to leave an impression upon him. It is a staff with a foundation, founded upon the enemy's deserts, and God's determinate counsel. It is a consumption determined, ch. x. 23, and therefore there is no escaping it, no getting out of the reach of it; it shall pass in every place where an Assyrian is found, and the Lord shall lay it upon him, and cause it to rest, ver. 32. Such is the woful case of those that persist in enmity to God; "the wrath of God abideth on them."

5. Here is Tophet ordained and prepared for them, ver. 33. The valley of the son of Hinnom, adjoining to Jerusalem, was called Tophet. In that valley it is supposed many of the Assyrian regiments lay encamped, and were there slain by the destroying angel; or, there the bodies of those that were so slain were burned. Hezekiah had lately, and from yesterday, (so the word is,) ordained it; that is, say some, he had ridded it of the images that were set up in it, to which they there burnt their children, and so prepared it to be a receptacle for the dead bodies of their enemies. For the king of Assyria, that is, for his army, it is prepared, and there is fuel enough ready to burn them all; and they shall be consumed as suddenly and effectually as if the fire were kept burning by a continual stream of brimstone; for such the breath of the Lord, his word, and his wrath, will be to it. Now, as the prophet in the foregoing promises slides insensibly into the promises of gospel graces and comforts, so here, in the threatening of the ruin of Sennacherib's army, he points at the final and everlasting destruction of all impenitent sinners. Our Saviour calls the future misery of the damned, Gehenna, in allusion to the valley of Hinnom, which gives some countenance to the applying of this to that misery; as also that in the Apocalypse, it is so often called, "the lake that burns with fire and brimstone." This is said to be prepared of old for the devil and his angels, for the greatest of sinners, the proudest, and that think themselves not accountable to any for what they say or do; even for kings it is prepared. "It is deep and large," sufficient to receive the world of the ungodly; "the pile thereof is fire and much wood." God's wrath is the fire, and sinners make themselves fuel

These things would no longer be honoured, but would be accounted profane and abominable.

XXX. 23. The seed sown should have the necessary rain, to make it productive.

XXX. 24. To "ear" is to till or cultivate the ground. By "clean provender" some understand "fodder mixed with salt," and others "fodder which has fermented." In either case it is provender which has been rendered savoury by some process.

XXX. 25. The time referred to in the words, "the day of the great slaughter, when the towers fall," is very uncertain. Some understand it of the fall of the Assyrians, others of the overthrow of anti-Christian powers, &c.

XXX. 26. The words, "as the light of seven days," are usually omitted by copies of the Greek version. The Targum has "three hundred and forty-three days;" but there is no good reason for rejecting the words, with Lowth, as a gloss.

to it; and the breath of the Lord, the power of his anger, kindles it, and will keep it ever burning: see ch. lxvi. 24. Wherefore, "stand in awe, and sin not."

Thirdly. The great joy which this should occasion to the people of God. The Assyrians' fall is Jerusalem's triumph; ver. 29, "Ye shall have a song as in the night," a psalm of praise, such as they sing who by night stand in the house of the Lord, and sing to his glory who giveth songs in the night. It shall not be a song of vain mirth, but a sacred song, such as was sung when a holy solemnity was kept, in a grave and religious manner. Our joy in the fall of the church's enemies must be a holy joy, "gladness of heart, as when one goes with a pipe," such as the sons of the prophets used when they prophesied, 1 Sam. x. 5, to come to the mountain of the Lord, there to celebrate the praises of the mighty One of Israel. Nay, in every place where the Divine vengeance shall pursue the Assyrians, they shall not only fall unlamented, but all their neighbours shall attend their fall with tabrets and harps, pleased to see how God, in battles of shaking, such as shake them out of the world, fights with them, ver. 32; for "when the wicked perish, there is shouting." And it is with a particular satisfaction that wise and good men see the ruin of those who, like the Assyrians, have insolently bid defiance to God, and trampled upon all mankind.

CHAPTER XXXI.

This chapter is an abridgment of the foregoing chapter; the heads of it are much the same. Here is, I. A woe to those that, when the Assyrian army invaded them, trusted to the Egyptians, and not to God, for succour, ver. 1—3. II. Assurance given of the care God would take of Jerusalem in that time of danger and distress, ver. 4, 5. III. A call to repentance and reformation, ver. 6, 7. IV. A prediction of the fall of the Assyrian army, and the fright which the Assyrian king should thereby be put into, ver. 8, 9.

WOE to them that go down to Egypt for help;
And stay on horses,
And trust in chariots, because they are many;
And in horsemen, because they are very strong;
But they look not unto the Holy One of Israel,
Neither seek the LORD!

2 Yet he also is wise,
And will bring evil, and will not call back his words:
But will arise against the house of the evildoers,
And against the help of them that work iniquity.

3 Now the Egyptians are men, and not God;
And their horses flesh, and not spirit.
When the LORD shall stretch out his hand,
Both he that helpeth shall fall, and he that is holpen shall fall down,
And they all shall fail together.

4 For thus hath the LORD spoken unto me,
Like as the lion and the young lion roaring on his prey,
When a multitude of shepherds is called forth against him,
He will not be afraid of their voice,
Nor abase himself for the noise of them:
So shall the LORD of hosts come down to fight for mount Zion,
And for the hill thereof.

5 As birds flying, so will the LORD of hosts defend Jerusalem;
Defending also he will deliver it;
And passing over he will preserve it.

This is the last of four chapters together that begin with, Woe; and they are all woes to the sinners that were found among the professing people of God. To the drunkards of Ephraim, ch. xxviii. 1; to Ariel, ch. xxix. 1; to the rebellious children, ch. xxx. 1; and here, to them that go down to Egypt for help; for men's relation to the church will not secure them from Divine woes, if they live in contempt of Divine laws. Observe,

First. What the sin was that is here reproved, ver. 1. 1. Idolizing the Egyptians, and making court to them; as if happy were the people that had the Egyptians for their friends and allies. They go down to Egypt for help in every exigence; as if the worshippers of false gods had a better interest in heaven, and were more likely to have success on earth, than the servants of the living and true God. That which invites them to Egypt is, that the Egyptians have many chariots to accommodate them with, and horses and horsemen that were very strong; and if they could get a good body of forces from thence into their service, they would think themselves able to deal with the king of Assyria, and his numerous army. Their kings were forbidden to multiply horses and chariots, and were told of the folly of trusting to them, Ps. xx. 7; but they think themselves wiser than their Bible. 2. Slighting the God of Israel. They look not to the Holy One of Israel, as if he were not worth taking notice of in this distress. They advise not with him, seek not his favour, nor are in any care to make him their friend.

Secondly. The gross absurdity and folly of this sin.

1. They neglected one whom, if they would not hope in, yet they had reason to fear. They "do not seek the Lord," nor make their application to him; "yet he also is wise," ver. 2. They are solicitous to get the Egyptians into an alliance with them, because they have the reputation of a politic people; and is not God wise too? And would not Infinite Wisdom, engaged on their side, stand them in more stead than all the policies of Egypt? They are at the pains of going down to Egypt, a tedious journey, when they might have had better advice and better help by looking up to Heaven, and would not. But if they will not court God's wisdom to act for them, they shall find it act against them. He is wise, too wise for them to outwit; and he will bring evil upon those who thus affront him. He will not call back his words, as men do, because they are fickle and foolish; but "he will arise against the house of the evil-doers," this cabal of them that go down to Egypt. God will appear to their confusion, according to the word that he hath spoken; and will oppose the help they think to bring in from the workers of iniquity. Some think the Egyptians made it one condition of their coming into an alliance with them, that they should worship the gods of Egypt; and they consented to it, and therefore they are both called evil-doers, and workers of iniquity.

2. They trusted to those who were unable to help them, and would soon appear to be so, ver. 3. Let them know that the Egyptians, whom they depend so much upon, are men, and not God. As it is good for men to know themselves to be but men, Ps. ix. 20, so it is good for us to consider that those we love and trust to are but men; they therefore can do nothing without God, nothing against him, nothing in comparison with him. They are men, and therefore fickle and foolish, mutable and mortal; here to-day, and gone to-morrow. They are men, and therefore let us not make gods of them, by making them our hope and confidence, and expecting that in them which is to be found in God only. They are not God, they cannot do that for us which God can do, and will, if we trust in him. Let us not then neglect him, to seek to them; let us not forsake the Rock of ages for broken reeds, nor the Fountain of living waters, for broken cisterns. The Egyptians indeed have horses that are very strong, but they are flesh, and not spirit; and therefore, as strong as they are, they may be wearied with a long march, and become unserviceable, or wounded and slain in battle, and leave their riders to be ridden over. Every one knows this, that the Egyptians are not God, and their horses are not spirit; but they that seek to them for help do not consider it, else they would not put such confidence in them. Sinners may be convicted of folly by the plainest and most self-evident truths, which they cannot deny, but will not believe.

3. They would certainly be ruined with the Egyptians they trusted in, ver. 3. When the Lord doth but stretch out his hand, how easily, how effectually will he make them ashamed of their confidence in Egypt, and the Egyptians ashamed of the encouragement they gave them to trust in them; for "he that helpeth, and he that is holpen, shall fall together," and their mutual alliance shall prove their joint ruin. The Egyptians were shortly to be reckoned with, as appears by the burthen of Egypt, ch. xix., and then those who fled to them for shelter and succour should fall with them; for there is no outrunning the judgments of God. Evil pursues sinners, and it is just with God to make that creature a scourge to us which we make an idol of.

4. They took God's work out of his hands. They pretended a great deal of care to preserve Jerusalem, in advising to an alliance with Egypt; and when others would not fall in with their measures they pleaded self-preservation, and went to Egypt themselves. Now the prophet here tells them that Jerusalem should be preserved without aid from Egypt; and those that tarried there should be safe, when those that fled to Egypt should be ruined. Jerusalem was under God's protection, and therefore there was no occasion to put it under the protection of Egypt; but a practical distrust of God's all-sufficiency is at the bottom of all our sinful departures from him to the creature.

The prophet tells them he had it from God's own mouth, "Thus hath the Lord spoken to me." We may depend upon it, 1. That God would appear against Jerusalem's enemies with the boldness of a lion over his prey, ver. 4. When the lion comes out to seize his prey, a multitude of shepherds come out against him; for it becomes neighbours to help one another, when persons or goods are in danger. These shepherds dare not come near the lion; all they can do is to make a noise, and with that they think to fright him off. But doth he regard it? No; "he will not be afraid of their voice," nor abase himself so far as to be in the least moved by it, either to quit his prey, or to make any more haste than otherwise he would do in seizing it. "Thus will the Lord of hosts come down to fight for mount Zion," with such an unshaken, undaunted resolution not to be moved by any opposition; and he will as easily and irresistibly destroy the Assyrian army as a lion tears a lamb in pieces. Whoever appear against God, they are but like a multitude of poor simple shepherds shouting at a lion, who scorns to take notice of them, or so much as to alter his pace for them. Sure they that have such a protector need not go to Egypt for help. 2. That God would appear for Jerusalem's friends with the tenderness of a bird over her young, ver. 5. God was ready to gather Jerusalem, "as a hen gathers her brood under her wings," Mat. xxiii. 37; but they that trusted to the Egyptians would not. "As birds flying" to their nests with all possible speed, when they see them attacked, and fluttering about their nests with all possible concern, hovering over their young ones to protect them, and drive away the assailants, with such compassion and affection "will the Lord of hosts defend Jerusalem." As an eagle stirs up her young when they are in danger, takes them and bears them on her wings, so the Lord led Israel out of Egypt, Deu. xxxii. 11, 12. And he has now the same tender concern for them that he had then, so that they need not flee into Egypt again for shelter. Defending, he will deliver it; that is, he will so defend it, as to secure the continuance of its safety; not defend it for a while, and abandon it at last, but defend it so as it shall not fall into the enemies' hand; "I will defend this city, to save it," ch. xxxvii. 35; "Passing over, he will preserve it." The word for passing over is used in that sense only here, and Ex. xii. 12, 22, 26, concerning the destroying angel's passing over the houses of the Israelites, when he slew all the firstborn of the Egyptians; to which story this refers here. The Assyrian army was to be routed by a destroying angel, who should pass over Jerusalem, though that deserved to be destroyed, and draw his sword only against the besiegers. They shall be slain by the pestilence; but none of the besieged shall take the infection. Thus he will again pass over the houses of his people, and secure them.

6 Turn ye unto him
From whom the children of Israel have deeply revolted

7 For in that day every man shall cast away
His idols of silver, and his idols of gold,
Which your own hands have made unto you for a sin.

8 Then shall the Assyrian fall with the sword, not of a mighty man;
And the sword, not of a mean man, shall devour him:
But he shall flee from the sword,
And his young men shall be discomfited.

9 And he shall pass over to his strong hold for fear,
And his princes shall be afraid of the ensign,
Saith the LORD, whose fire is in Zion,
And his furnace in Jerusalem.

This explains the foregoing promise of the deliverance of Jerusalem; she shall

xxx. 27. "The name of Jehovah" may be a periphrasis for "Jehovah," or may signify his glorious manifestation.

xxx. 28. The Hebrew for "people" here is plural, "peoples," and should be so translated, because the reference is to the "nations" just mentioned.

xxx. 29. The first clause seems to refer to the passover, which was eaten at night. "The Mighty One of Israel" is "Rock of Israel" in the Hebrew, but the Lord is meant.

xxx. 32. This verse is as obscure in the original as in the translation. The word "grounded" must mean settled or determined on, as elsewhere the rod is "appointed." The sense then is, "And wherever the rod that is determined on shall pass over, which the Lord shall cause to descend upon him (perhaps Assyria), there shall be tabrets and harps (rejoicing), and with battle tumult will he fight with it." For "with it" there is a various reading "with them;" the first meaning the country, and the second the people.

be fitted for deliverance, and then it shall be wrought for her, for in that method God delivers.

First. Jerusalem shall be reformed, and so she shall be delivered from her enemies within her walls, ver. 6, 7. Here is, 1. A gracious call to repentance. This was the Lord's voice crying in the city, the voice of the rod, the voice of the sword, and the voice of the prophets interpreting the judgment; "Turn ye," O turn ye now from your evil ways "unto God;" return to your allegiance to him, "from whom the children of Israel have deeply revolted;" from whom you, O children of Israel, have revolted. He minds them of their birth and parentage; that they were children of Israel, and therefore under the highest obligations imaginable to the God of Israel, as an aggravation of their revolt from him, and as an encouragement to them to return to him. They have been backsliding children, yet children; therefore let them return, and their backslidings shall be healed. They have deeply revolted, they thought politicly, (the revolters are profound, Hos. v. 2,) but it will prove dangerously. The stain of their sins is gone deep into their nature, not to be easily got out; like the blackness of the Ethiopian, they have deeply corrupted themselves, Hos. ix. 9. They have sunk deep into misery, and cannot easily recover themselves; therefore you have need both to hasten and quicken your return to God. 2. A gracious promise of the good success of this call; ver. 7, "In that day every man shall cast away his idols," in obedience to Hezekiah's orders; which, till they were alarmed by the Assyrian invasion, many refused to do. That is a happy fright which frightens us from our sins. It shall be a general reformation, every man shall cast away his own idols; shall begin with them, before he undertakes to demolish other people's idols, which there will be no need of, when every man reforms himself. It shall be a thorough reformation, for they shall part with their idolatry, their beloved sin, with their idols of silver and gold, their idols that they are most fond of. Many make an idol of their silver and gold, and by the love of that are drawn to revolt from God; but those that turn to God cast that away out of their hearts, and will be ready to part with it when God calls. It shall be a reformation upon a right principle, a principle of piety, not of politics; they shall cast away their idols, because they have been unto them for a sin, an occasion of sin; therefore they will have nothing to do with them, though they had been the work of their own hands, and upon that account they had a particular fondness for them. Sin is the work of our own hands, but in working it we have been working our own ruin, and therefore we must cast it away; and those are strangely wedded to it who will not be prevailed with to cast it away, when they see that otherwise they themselves will be castaways. Some make this to be only a prediction that those who trust in idols, when they find they stand them in no stead, will cast them away in indignation; but it agrees so exactly with ch. xxx. 22, that I rather take it as a promise of a sincere reformation.

Secondly. Jerusalem's besiegers shall be routed, and so she shall be delivered from the enemies about her walls; the former makes way for this. If a people return to God, they may leave it to him to plead their cause against their enemies. Then when they have cast away their idols, "then shall the Assyrian fall," ver. 8, 9. 1. The army of the Assyrians shall be laid dead upon the spot, "by the sword, not of a mighty man, nor of a mean man;" not of any man at all, either Israelite or Egyptian; not forcibly by the sword of a mighty man, nor surreptitiously by the sword of a mean man; but by the sword of an angel, who strikes more strongly than a mighty man, and yet more secretly than a mean man,—by the sword of the Lord, and his power and wrath in the hand of the angel. Thus the young men of the army shall melt and be discomfited, and become tributaries to death. When God hath a work to do against the enemies of his church, we expect it must be done by mighty men and mean men, officers and common soldiers, whereas God can, if he pleaseth, do it without either. He needs not armies of men that hath legions of angels at command, Mat. xxvi. 53. 2. The king of Assyria shall flee from the same,—shall flee from that invisible sword, hoping to get out of the reach of it. And he shall make the best of his way to his own dominions; shall pass over to some stronghold of his own for fear lest the Jews should pursue him, now his army was routed. Sennacherib had been very confident that he should make himself master of Jerusalem, and in the most insolent manner had set both God and Hezekiah at defiance; yet now he is made to tremble for fear of both. God can strike a terror into the proudest of men, and make the stoutest heart to tremble: see Job xviii. 11; xx. 24. His princes that accompany him "shall be afraid of the ensign;" shall be in a continual fright at the remembrance of the ensign in the air, which perhaps the destroying angel displayed before he gave the fatal blow; or, they shall be afraid of every ensign they see, suspecting it is a party of the Jews pursuing them. The banner that God displays for the encouragement of his people, Ps. lx. 4, will be a terror to his and their enemies. Thus he "cuts off the spirit of princes, and is terrible to the kings of the earth." But who will do this? It is the Lord, "whose fire is in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem," that is, 1st. Whose residence is there, and who there keeps house, as a man doth where his fire and his oven are; it is the city of the great King, and let not the Assyrians think to turn him out of the possession of his own house. 2nd. Who is there a consuming fire to all his enemies, and will make them as a fiery oven in the day of his wrath, Ps. xxi. 9. He is himself "a wall of fire round about Jerusalem," so that whoever assault her it is at their peril, Zec. ii. 5; Rev. xi. 5. 3rd. Who has his altar there, on which the holy fire is continually kept burning, and sacrifices daily offered to his honour, and with which he is well pleased. And therefore he will defend this city, especially having an eye to the great sacrifice which was there also to be offered, of which all the sacrifices were types. If we keep up the fire of holy love and devotion in our hearts and houses, we may depend upon God to be a protection to us and them.

CHAPTER XXXII.

This chapter seems to be such a prophecy of the reign of Hezekiah as amounts to an abridgment of the history of it, and this with an eye to the kingdom of the Messiah, whose government was typified by the thrones of the house of David, for which reason he is so often called the Son of David. Here is, I. A prophecy of that good work of reformation with which he should begin his reign, and the happy influence it should have upon the people, who had been wretchedly corrupted and debauched in the reign of his predecessor, ver. 1—8. II. A prophecy of the great disturbance that would be given to the kingdom in the middle of his reign by the Assyrian invasion, ver. 9—14. III. A promise of better times afterwards, towards the latter end of his reign, in respect both of piety and peace, ver. 15—20; which promise may be supposed to look as far forward as the days of the Messiah.

BEHOLD, a king shall reign in righteousness,
And princes shall rule in judgment.
2 And a man shall be as an hiding place from the wind,
And a covert from the tempest;
As rivers of water in a dry place,
As the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.
3 And the eyes of them that see shall not be dim,
And the ears of them that hear shall hearken.
4 The heart also of the rash shall understand knowledge,
And the tongue of the stammerers shall be ready to speak plainly.
5 The vile person shall be no more called liberal,
Nor the churl said to be bountiful.
6 For the vile person will speak villany,
And his heart will work iniquity,
To practise hypocrisy, and to utter error against the LORD,
To make empty the soul of the hungry,
And he will cause the drink of the thirsty to fail.
7 The instruments also of the churl are evil:
He deviseth wicked devices
To destroy the poor with lying words,
Even when the needy speaketh right.
8 But the liberal deviseth liberal things;
And by liberal things shall he stand.

We have here the description of a flourishing kingdom; "Blessed art thou, O land," when it is thus with thee, when kings, princes, and people are in their places such as they should be. It may be taken as a directory both to magistrates and subjects what both ought to do; or as a panegyric to Hezekiah, who ruled well, and saw something of the happy effects of his good government. And it was designed to make the people sensible how happy they were under his administration, and how careful they should be to improve the advantages of it, and withal to direct them to look for the kingdom of Christ, and the times of reformation which that kingdom should introduce. It is here promised and prescribed for the comfort of the church,

First. That magistrates should do their duty in their places, and the powers answer the great ends for which they were ordained of God, ver. 1, 2. 1. There shall be a king and princes that shall reign and rule; for it cannot go well when there is no king in Israel. The princes must have a king, a monarch, over them as supreme, in whom they may unite. And the king must have princes under him, as officers, by whom he may act, 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14. They both shall know their place and fill it up; the king shall reign, and yet without any diminution to his just prerogative; the princes shall rule in a lower sphere, and all for the public good. 2. They shall use their power according to law, and not against it; they shall reign in righteousness and in judgment, with wisdom and equity, protecting the good, and punishing the bad. And those kings and princes Christ owns as reigning by him who decree justice, Pr. viii. 15. Such a king, such a prince, Christ himself is; he reigns by rule, and in righteousness will he judge the world, ch. ix. 7; xi. 4. 3. Thus they shall be great blessings to the people; ver. 2, "A man," that man, that king that reigns in righteousness, "shall be as a hiding-place." When princes are as they should be people are as they would be. 1st. They are sheltered and protected from many mischiefs. This good magistrate is a covert to the subject from the tempest of injury and violence, defends the poor and fatherless, that they be not made a prey of by the mighty. Whither should oppressed innocency flee, when blasted by reproach, or borne down by violence, but to the magistrate, as its hiding-place? To him it appeals, and by him it is righted. 2nd. They are refreshed and comforted with many blessings. This good magistrate gives such countenance to those that are poor and in distress, and such encouragement to every thing that is praiseworthy, that he is "as rivers of water in a dry place," cooling and cherishing, and making the earth fruitful; and "as the shadow of a great rock," under which a poor traveller may shelter himself from the scorching heat of the sun, "in a weary land." It is a great reviving to a good man, that makes conscience of doing his duty, in the midst of contempt and contradiction, at length to be backed, and favoured, and smiled upon in it by a good magistrate. All this, and much more, the man Christ Jesus is to all the willing, faithful subjects of his kingdom. When the greatest evils befall us, not only the wind, but the tempest,—when storms of guilt and wrath beset us, and beat upon us, they drive us to Christ; and in him we are not only safe but satisfied that we are so. In him we find rivers of waters for them that hunger and thirst after righteousness; all the refreshment and comfort that a needy soul can desire. And the shadow, not of a tree, which sun and rain may beat through, but of a rock, of a great rock, which reacheth a great way, for the shelter of the traveller. And some observe here, that as the covert and the hiding-place, and the rock, do themselves receive the battering of the wind and storm, to save those from them that take shelter in them, so Christ bore the storm himself, to keep it off from us.

Secondly. That subjects shall do their duty in their places.

1. They shall be willing to be taught, and to understand things aright; shall lay aside their prejudices against their rulers and teachers, and submit to the light and power of truth, ver. 3. When this blessed work of reformation is set on foot, and men do their parts towards it, God will not be wanting to do his. Then "the eyes of them that see," of the prophets, the seers, "shall not be dim;" but God will bless them with visions, to be by them communicated to the people. And those that read the word written shall no longer have a veil upon their hearts, but shall see things clearly. Then "the ears of them that hear" the word preached "shall hearken" diligently, and readily receive what they hear, and not be so dull of hearing as they have been. This shall be done by the grace of God, especially gospel grace; for "the hearing ear, and the seeing eye, the Lord hath made," hath new made, "even both of them."

2. There shall be a wonderful change wrought in them, by that which is taught them, ver. 4. 1st. They shall have a clear head, and be able to discern things that differ, and distinguish concerning them. The heart of those that were hasty and rash, and could not take time to digest and consider things, shall now be cured of their precipitation, and shall understand knowledge; for the Spirit of God will open their understanding, which blessed work Christ wrought in his disciples after his resurrection, Lu. xxiv. 45, as a specimen of what he would do for all his, in giving them an understanding, 1 Jno. v. 20. The pious designs of good princes are then likely to take effect, when their subjects allow themselves liberty to consider, and to think so freely as to take things aright. 2nd. They shall have a ready utterance. "The tongue of the stammerers," that used

xxx. 33. Tophet was a name of the Valley of Hinnom, the Gehenna of the New Testament. It was, we are told, the place where the filth and refuse of Jerusalem were burnt, and as such became a symbol of that which is repulsive and horrible, and especially of the place of future punishment. The idea of the verse appears to be that a Tophet had been prepared for the destroyed enemies, and specially for their king, where they would be eventually burned up. Barnes thinks it was by order of the king Hezekiah, and not for the hostile king, that Tophet was prepared, but such a view is altogether untenable.

xxxi. 4. Instead of "for Mount Zion, and for the hill thereof," some translate, "upon Mount Zion, and upon her hill;" and others "against Mount Zion, and against their hill." The second explanation is the best; the third is not consistent with the next verse.

to blunder whenever they spoke of the things of God, shall now "be ready to speak plainly," as those that understand what they speak of, that believe, and therefore speak. There shall be a great increase of such clear, distinct, and methodical knowledge in the things of God, that those from whom one would not have expected it shall speak intelligently of those things, very much to the honour of God, and the edification of others. Their hearts being full of this good matter, their tongues shall be as the pen of a ready writer, Ps. xlv. 1.

3. The differences between good and evil, virtue and vice, shall be kept up, and no more confounded by those who put darkness for light, and light for darkness; ver. 5, "The vile shall no more be called liberal," that is, 1st. Ill men shall no more be preferred by the prince. When a king reigns in justice he will not put those in places of honour and power that are ill-natured, and of base and sordid spirits, and care not what injury or mischief they do, so they may but compass their own ends. Such are vile persons, as Antiochus is called, Dan. xi. 21. When they are advanced, they are called liberal and bountiful,—are called benefactors, Lu. xxii. 25. But it shall not always be thus; when the world grows wiser men shall be preferred according to their merit; and honour, which was never thought seemly for a fool, (Pr. xxvi. 1,) shall no longer be thrown away upon such. 2nd. Ill men shall be no more had in reputation among the people, nor vice disguised with the colours of virtue. 'It shall no more be said to Nabal, Thou art Nadib,' so the words are; such a covetous muckworm as Nabal was; a fool, but for his money, shall not be complimented with the title of a gentleman, or a prince; neither shall they call a churl, that minds none but himself, doth no good with what he has, but is an unprofitable burthen of the earth, they shall not call him, My lord; or rather, they shall not say of him, 'He is rich,' for so the word signifies. Those only are reckoned to be rich that are rich in good works; not that have abundance, but that use it well. In short, it is well with a people when men are generally valued by their virtue, and usefulness, and beneficence to mankind, and not by their wealth or titles of honour. Whether this was fulfilled in the reign of Hezekiah, and how far it refers to the kingdom of Christ, in which we are sure men are judged of by what they are, not by what they have, nor is any man's character mistaken, we will not say, but it prescribes an excellent rule both to princes and people, to respect men according to their personal merit. And to enforce this rule, here is a description both of the vile person and of the liberal; and by it we shall see such a vast difference between them, that we must quite forget ourselves if we pay that respect to the vile person and the churl which is due only to the liberal.

First. A vile person and a churl will do mischief; and the more if he be preferred, and have power in his hand. His honours will make him worse, and not better, ver. 6, 7. See the character of these base, ill-conditioned men. 1st. They are always plotting some unjust thing or other; designing ill either to particular persons or to the public, and contriving how to bring it about; and so many silly piques they have to gratify, and mean revenges, that there appears not in them the least spark of generosity. Their hearts will be still working some iniquity or other. Observe, There is the work of the heart as well as the work of the hands. As thoughts are words to God, so designs are works in his account. See what pains sinners take in sin; they labour it, their hearts are intent upon it, and with a great deal of art and application they work iniquity. They devise wicked devices with all the subtlety of the old serpent, and a great deal of deliberation, which makes the sin exceeding sinful; for the more there is of plot and management in a sin the more there is of Satan in it. 2nd. They carry on their plots by trick and dissimulation. When they are meditating iniquity, they practise hypocrisy, feign themselves just men, Lu. xx. 20. The most abominable mischiefs shall be disguised with the most plausible pretences of devotion to God, regard to man, and concern for some common good. Those are the vilest of men that intend the worst mischief when they speak fair. 3rd. They speak villany. When they are in a passion, you will see what they are by the base ill language they give to those about them, which no way becomes men of rank and honour. Or, in giving verdict or judgment they villanously put false colours upon things to pervert justice. 4th. They affront God, who is a righteous God and loveth righteousness. They utter error against the Lord, and therein they practise profaneness; for so the word signifies, which we translate hypocrisy. They give an unjust sentence, and then profanely make use of the name of God for the ratification of it, as if because the judgment is God's (Deu. i. 17) therefore their false and unjust judgment was his. This is uttering error against the Lord, under pretence of uttering truth and justice for him. And nothing can be more impudently done against God than to patronize wickedness with his name. 5th. They abuse mankind, those particularly whom they are bound to protect and relieve. (1.) Instead of supplying the wants of the poor, they impoverish them; they "make empty the soul of the hungry;" either taking away the food they have, or, which is almost equivalent, denying the supply they want, and which they have to give. And they "cause the drink of the thirsty to fail," that is, they cut off the relief they used to have, though they need it as much as ever. Those are vile persons indeed that rob the spital. (2.) Instead of righting the poor when they appeal to their judgment, they contrive to destroy the poor; to ruin them in their courts of judicature, with lying words, in favour of the rich, to whom they are plainly partial,—yea, though the needy speak right, though the evidence be never so full for them, to make out the equity of their cause. It is the bribe that governs them, not the right. Lastly, These churls and vile persons have always ill instruments about them, that are ready to serve their villanous purposes; "all their servants are wicked." There is no design so palpably unjust but there may be found those that will be employed as tools to put it in execution; "The instruments of the churl are evil," and one cannot expect otherwise; but this is our comfort, that they can do no more mischief than God permits them.

Secondly. One that is truly liberal, and deserves the honour of being called so, makes it his business to do good to everybody, according as his sphere is, ver. 8. Observe, 1st. The care he takes, and the contrivances he hath to do good. He "deviseth liberal things," as much as the churl or niggard projects how to save and lay up what he hath for himself only, so much the good charitable man projects how to use and lay out what he has in the best manner for the good of others. Charity must be directed by wisdom, and liberal things done prudently, and with device, that the good intention of them may be answered, and it may not be charity misplaced. The liberal man, when he has done all the liberal things that are in his own power, deviseth liberal things for others to do according to their power, and puts them upon doing them. 2nd. The comfort he takes, and the advantage he hath, in doing good; "By liberal things he shall stand," or be established. The providence of God will reward him for his liberality with a settled prosperity, and an established reputation. The grace of God will give him abundance of satisfaction, and confirmed peace in his own bosom. What tosseth others shall not disturb him,—his heart is fixed. This is the recompence of charity, Ps. cxii. 5, 6. Some read it, 'The prince, or honourable man, will take honourable courses, and by such honourable or ingenuous courses he shall stand,' or be established. It is well with a land when the honourable of it are indeed men of honour, and scorn to do a base thing; when its king is thus the son of nobles.

9 Rise up, ye women that are at ease;
Hear my voice, ye careless daughters;
Give ear unto my speech. [women:
10 Many days and years shall ye be troubled, ye careless
For the vintage shall fail, the gathering shall not come.
11 Tremble, ye women that are at ease;
Be troubled, ye careless ones:
Strip you, and make you bare, and gird sackcloth upon your loins.
12 They shall lament for the teats,
For the pleasant fields, for the fruitful vine. [briers;
13 Upon the land of my people shall come up thorns and
Yea, upon all the houses of joy in the joyous city:
14 Because the palaces shall be forsaken;
The multitude of the city shall be left;
The forts and towers shall be for dens for ever,
A joy of wild asses, a pasture of flocks;
15 Until the spirit be poured upon us from on high,
And the wilderness be a fruitful field,
And the fruitful field be counted for a forest.
16 Then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness,
And righteousness remain in the fruitful field.
17 And the work of righteousness shall be peace;
And the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance for ever.
18 And my people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation,
And in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places;
19 When it shall hail, coming down on the forest;
And the city shall be low in a low place.
20 Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters,
That send forth thither the feet of the ox and the ass

In these verses we have God rising up to judgment against the vile persons, to punish them for their villany; but at length returning in mercy to the liberal, to reward them for their liberality.

First. When there was so great a corruption of manners, and so much provocation given to the holy God, bad times might well be expected; and here is warning given of such times coming. The alarm is sounded to "the women that were at ease," ver. 9, and "the careless daughters," to feed whose pride, vanity, and luxury, their husbands and fathers were tempted to starve the poor. Let them hear what the prophet has to say to them in God's name, "Rise up, and hear" with reverence and attention.

1. Let them know that God was about to bring wasting, desolating judgments upon the land in which they lived in pleasure, and were wanton. This seems to refer primarily to the desolations made by Sennacherib's army, when he seized all the fenced cities of Judah; but then those words, "many days and years," must be rendered as the margin reads them, 'days above a year;' that is, something above a year shall this havoc be in the making; so long it was from the first entrance of that army into the land of Judah to the overthrow of it. But it is applicable to the wretched disappointment which they will certainly meet with, first or last, that set their hearts upon the world, and place their happiness in it; "Ye shall be troubled, ye careless women." It will not secure us from trouble to cast away care when we are at ease; nay, to those who affect to live carelessly, even little troubles will be great vexations, and press hard upon them. They were careless and at ease, because they had money enough, and mirth enough. But the prophet here tells them, 1st. That the country whence they had their rents and dainties should shortly be laid waste. "The vintage shall fail," and then what will ye do for wine to make merry with; the gathering of fruits shall not come, for there shall be none to be gathered, and you will find the want of them, ver. 10. You will want "the teats," the good milk from the cows; the pleasant fields, and their products. The useful fields, that are serviceable to human life are the pleasant ones; you will want the fruitful vine, and the grapes it used to yield you. The abuse of plenty is justly punished with scarcity; and they deserve to be deprived of the supports of life who made them the food and fuel of lust, and prepared them for Baal. 2nd. That the cities too, the cities of Judah, where they lived at ease, spent their rents, and made themselves merry with their dainties, should be laid waste too; ver. 13, 14, "Briars and thorns," the fruits of sin and the curse, shall come up, not only "upon the land of my people," which shall lie uncultivated, but "upon all the houses of joy;" the play houses, the gaming houses, the taverns in the joyous cities. When a foreign army was ravaging the country, the houses of joy no doubt became houses of mourning. Then the palaces, or noblemen's houses, were forsaken by their owners, who perhaps fled to Egypt for refuge; the multitude of the city were left by their leaders to shift for themselves. Then the stately houses shall be dens for ever, which had been as forts and towers for strength and magnificence. They shall be abandoned, the owners shall never return to them; everybody shall look upon them to be like Jericho, an anathema; so that even when peace returns, they shall not be rebuilt, but shall be thrown to the waste, "a joy of wild asses, and a pasture of flocks." Thus is many a house brought to ruin by sin. Jam seges est ubi Troja fuit,—'Corn grows on the site of Troy.'

2. In the foresight of this, let them "tremble and be troubled, strip them, and gird sackcloth upon their loins," ver. 11. This intimates not only that when the calamity comes they shall thus be made to tremble, and be forced to strip themselves, that then God's judgments would strip them, and make them bare, but, 1st. That the best prevention of the trouble would be to repent, and humble themselves for their sin, and lie in the dust before God in true remorse and godly sorrow, which would be the lengthening out of their tranquillity.

xxxi. 8. "Discomfited:" rather, "tributary."

xxxi. 9. Translate the first clause, "And his rock shall pass away through fear." The "rock" of the Assyrian was his chief ground of confidence.

xxxii. 1. By "king" and "princes" here some understand Hezekiah and his chief men; others, Messiah and his apostles, &c. The first reference of the words may be to the king and princes of Judah, but the language reaches much further xxxii. 10. For "many days and years" the margin has the literal rendering, "days above a year." What the words mean is much disputed. Œcolampadius explains them to signify "more than a year," and some good modern critics favour that idea. "The gathering" is the harvest, especially that of fruit.

xxxii. 12. For "lament for the teats" we should put "smite upon their breasts." This was a usual expression of grief. (See Luke xxiii. 48.)

This is meeting God in the way of his judgments, and saving a correction by correcting our own mistakes. Those only shall break that will not bend. 2nd. That the best preparation for the trouble would be to deny themselves, and live a life of mortification, and to sit loose to all the delights of sense. Those that have already, by a holy contempt of this world, stripped themselves, can easily bear to be stripped when trouble and death come.

Secondly. While there was still a remnant that kept their integrity, they had reason to hope for good times at length, and such times the prophet here gives them a pleasant prospect of. Such times they saw in the latter end of the reign of Hezekiah; but the prophecy may well be supposed to look farther, to the days of the Messiah, who is King of righteousness, and King of peace, to whom all the prophets bare witness. Now observe,

1. How those blessed times should be introduced. By the "pouring out of the Spirit from on high," ver. 15; which speaks not only the good will of God towards us, but the good work of God in us; for then, and not till then, there will be good times, when God by his grace gives men good hearts. And, therefore, God's "giving his Holy Spirit to them that ask him" is in effect his giving them all good things, as appears by comparing Lu. xi. 13 with Mat. vii. 11. This is the great thing that God's people comfort themselves with the hopes of, that "the Spirit shall be poured out upon them;" that there shall be a more plentiful effusion of the spirit of grace than formerly, according as the necessity of the church in its desolate estate calls for. This comes from on high, and therefore they look up to their Father in heaven for it. When God designs favours for his church, he pours out his Spirit both to prepare his people to receive his favours and to qualify those whom he designs to employ as instruments of his favour, and give them success; for their endeavours to repair the desolations of the church are all fruitless, "until the Spirit be poured out upon them;" and then the work is done suddenly. The kingdom of the Messiah was brought in and set up by the pouring out of the Spirit, Acts ii.; and so it is still kept up, and will be to the end.

2. What a wonderful happy change shall then be made. That which was a wilderness, dry and barren, shall become a fruitful field; and that which we now reckon a fruitful field, in comparison with what it shall be then, shall be counted for a forest; "Then shall the earth yield her increase." It is promised that in the days of the Messiah, "the fruit of the earth shall shake like Lebanon," Ps. lxxii. 16. Some apply this to the admission of the Gentiles into the gospel church, which made the wilderness a fruitful field; and the rejection and exclusion of the Jews, which made that a forest which had been a fruitful field. On the Gentiles was poured out a spirit of life, but on the Jews a spirit of slumber. See what is the evidence and effect of the pouring out of the Spirit upon any soul; it is thereby made fruitful, and has its fruit unto holiness. Three things go to make these times happy:

1st. Judgment and righteousness, ver. 16. When the Spirit is poured out upon a land, "then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness," and turn it into a fruitful field; and "righteousness shall remain in the fruitful field," and make it yet more fruitful. Ministers shall expound the law and magistrates execute it, and both so judiciously and faithfully, that by both the bad shall be made good, and the good made better. Among all sorts of people, the poor and low and unlearned, that are neglected as the wilderness; and the rich and great and learned, that are valued as the fruitful field; there shall be right thoughts of things, good principles commanding, and conscience made of good and evil, sin and duty. Or, in all parts of the land, both champaign and enclosed, country and city, the ruder parts and those that are more cultivated and refined, justice shall be duly administered. The law of Christ introduceth a judgment or rule by which we must be governed; and the Gospel of Christ a righteousness by which we must be saved. And wherever the Spirit is poured out, both these dwell and remain as an everlasting righteousness.

2nd. Peace and quietness, ver. 17, 18. This of two kinds: First. Inward peace, ver. 17; this follows upon the indwelling of righteousness, ver. 16. Those in whom that work is wrought shall experience this blessed product of it. It is itself peace, and the effect of it "quietness and assurance for ever;" that is, a holy serenity and security of mind, by which the soul enjoys itself, and enjoys its God; and it is not in the power of this world to disturb it in those enjoyments. Note, Peace and quietness, and everlasting assurance, may be expected, and shall be found in the way and work of righteousness. True satisfaction is to be had only in true religion, and there it is to be had without fail. Those are the quiet and peaceable lives that are lived in all godliness and honesty, 1 Tim. ii. 2. 1st. Even the work of righteousness shall be peace even in the doing of our duty; we shall find abundance of true pleasure, a present great reward of obedience in obedience. Though the work of righteousness may be toilsome and costly, and expose us to contempt, yet it is peace, such peace as is sufficient to bear our charges. 2nd. The "effect of righteousness shall be quietness and assurance;" not only to the end of time, of our time, and in the end, but to the endless ages of eternity. Real holiness is real happiness now, and shall be perfect happiness, that is, perfect holiness, for ever. Secondly. Outward peace, ver. 18. It is a great mercy when those who by the grace of God have quiet and peaceable spirits are by the providence of God made to dwell in quiet and peaceable habitations; not disturbed in their houses, or solemn assemblies. When the terror of Sennacherib's invasion was over, the people no doubt were more sensible than ever of the mercy of a quiet habitation; not disturbed with the alarms of war. Let every family study to keep itself quiet from strifes and jars within; not two against three, and three against two in the house; and then put itself under God's protection to dwell safely, and to be quiet from the fear of evil without. Jerusalem shall be a peaceable habitation, compare ch. xxxiii. 20. Even when it shall hail, and there shall be a violent battering storm "coming down on the forest," that lies bleak, then shall "Jerusalem be a quiet resting-place," for "the city shall be low in a low place;" under the wind, not exposed, as those cities are that stand high, to the fury of the storm; but sheltered by "the mountains that are round about Jerusalem," Ps. cxxv. 2. The high forts and "towers are brought down," ver. 14; but the city that lies low shall be a quiet resting-place. Those are most safe, and may dwell most at ease, that are humble and are willing to dwell low, ver. 19. Those that would dwell in a peaceable habitation must be willing to dwell low, and in a low place. Some think here is an allusion to the preservation of the land of Goshen from the plague of hail, which made great destruction in the land of Egypt.

3rd. Plenty and abundance. There shall be such good crops gathered in everywhere, and every year, that the husbandmen shall be commended, and thought happy, "who sow beside all waters," ver. 20; that sow all the grounds that are fit for seedness, that cast their bread or bread corn upon the waters, Eccl. xi. 1. God will give the increase, but then the husbandman must be industrious, and mind his business, and "sow beside all waters;" which if he do, the corn shall come up so thick and rank, that he shall turn in his cattle, even the ox and the ass, to eat the tops of it, and keep it under. This is applicable, First. To the preaching of the word. Some think it points at the ministry of the apostles, who as husbandmen went forth to sow their seed, Mat. xiii. 3; and they "sowed beside all waters," they preached the Gospel wherever they came. Waters signify people, and they preached to multitudes. Wherever they found men's hearts softened and moistened, and disposed to receive the word, they cast in the good seed. And whereas, by the law of Moses, the Jews were forbidden to plough with an ox and an ass, Deu. xxii. 10, which intimated, that Jews and Gentiles should not intermix, now that distinction shall be taken away, and both the ox and the ass, both Jews and Gentiles, shall be employed in, and enjoy the benefit of, the gospel husbandry. Secondly. To works of charity. When God sends these happy times, blessed are they that improve them in doing good with what they have; that sow beside all waters, that embrace all opportunities of relieving the necessitous; for in due season they shall reap.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

This chapter relates to the same events with that foregoing, the distress of Judah and Jerusalem by Sennacherib's invasion, and their deliverance out of that distress by the destruction of the Assyrian army; these are intermixed in the prophecy in the way of a Pindaric. Observe, I. The great distress that Judah and Jerusalem should then be brought into, ver. 7—9. II. The particular frights which the sinners in Zion should then be in, ver. 13, 14. III. The prayers of good people to God in this distress, ver. 2. IV. The holy security which they should enjoy in the midst of this trouble, ver. 15, 16. V. The destruction of the army of the Assyrians, ver. 1—3; in which God would be greatly glorified, ver. 5, 10—12. VI. The enriching of the Jews with the spoil of the Assyrian camp, ver. 4, 23, 24. VII. The happy settlement of Jerusalem and the Jewish state upon this: religion shall be uppermost, ver. 6, and their civil state shall flourish, ver. 17—23. This was soon fulfilled, but is written for our learning.

WOE to thee that spoilest, and thou wast not spoiled,
And dealest treacherously, and they dealt not treacherously with thee!
When thou shalt cease to spoil, thou shalt be spoiled;
And when thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously they shall deal treacherously with thee.
2 O LORD, be gracious unto us; we have waited for thee:
Be thou their arm every morning,
Our salvation also in the time of trouble.
3 At the noise of the tumult the people fled;
At the lifting up of thyself the nations were scattered.
4 And your spoil shall be gathered like the gathering of the caterpiller:
As the running to and fro of locusts shall he run upon them.
5 The LORD is exalted;
For he dwelleth on high:
He hath filled Zion with judgment and righteousness.
6 And wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of thy times,
And strength of salvation:
The fear of the LORD is his treasure.
7 Behold, their valiant ones shall cry without:
The ambassadors of peace shall weep bitterly.
8 The highways lie waste,
The wayfaring man ceaseth:
He hath broken the covenant, he hath despised the cities,
He regardeth no man.
9 The earth mourneth and languisheth:
Lebanon is ashamed and hewn down:
Sharon is like a wilderness;
And Bashan and Carmel shake off their fruits.
10 Now will I rise, saith the LORD;
Now will I be exalted;
Now will I lift up myself.
11 Ye shall conceive chaff, ye shall bring forth stubble:
Your breath, as fire, shall devour you.
12 And the people shall be as the burnings of lime:
As thorns cut up shall they be burned in the fire.

Here is, First. The proud and false Assyrian justly reckoned with for all his fraud and violence, and laid under a woe, ver. 1. Observe, 1. The sin which the enemy had been guilty of. He had spoiled the people of God, and made a prey of them, and herein had broken his treaty of peace with them, and dealt treacherously. Truth and mercy are two such sacred things, and have so much of God in them, that those cannot but be under the wrath of God that make conscience of neither, but are perfectly lost to both; that care not what mischief they do, what spoil they make, what dissimulations they are guilty of, nor what solemn engagements they violate, to compass their own wicked designs. Bloody and deceitful men are the worst of men. 2. The aggravation of this sin. He spoiled those that had never done him any injury, and that he had no pretence to quarrel with; and dealt treacherously with those that had always dealt faithfully with him. Note, The less provocation we have from men to do an ill thing, the more provocation we give to God by it. 3. The punishment he should fall under for this sin. He that spoiled the cities of Judah shall have his own army destroyed by an angel, and his camp plundered by those whom he had made a prey of. The Chaldeans shall deal treacherously with the Assyrians, and revolt from them. Two of Sennacherib's own sons shall deal treacherously with him, and basely murder him at his devotions. Note, The righteous God often pays sinners in their own coin; "He that leads into captivity shall go into captivity," Rev. xiii. 10, and xviii. 6. 4. The time when he shall be thus dealt with. When he shall "make an end of to spoil, and to deal treacherously;"

xxii. 14. For "the forts" the Hebrew is Ophel, which was the name of a part of Jerusalem.

xxii. 19. This difficult verse may be rendered, "And it shall hail at the fall of the forest, and the city shall be brought very low."

xxii. 20. Some think sowing beside or upon all waters refers to the culture of rice, but as we have no proof that the Hebrews ever grew rice, it is best to understand the reference of the small channels by which gardens were watered. The second clause refers to the sending or driving forth of cattle to graze or to work, and the word "thither" is superfluous. In both clauses industry is commended.

xxiii. 1. This woe is usually understood to be spoken against the Assyrian, who is, however, not mentioned in the chapter.

xxiii. 2. "Their arm"—i.e., their strength. The reference is to God's people. The change of person, "their," "our," is not infrequent.

xxiii. 4. "Your spoil"—i.e., Israel's. "Like the gathering of the not by repentance and reformation, that might prevent his ruin, Dan. iv. 27; but when he shall have done his worst, when he shall have gone as far as God would permit him to go, to the utmost of his tether, then the cup of trembling shall be put into his hand. When he shall have arrived to his full stature in impiety, shall have filled up the measure of his iniquity, then all shall be called over again. When he has done, God will begin, for his day is coming.

Secondly. The praying people of God, earnest at the throne of grace for mercy for the land, now in its distress, ver. 2. "O Lord, be merciful to us." Men are cruel, be thou gracious; we have deserved thy wrath, but we intreat thy favour; if we may find thee propitious to us, we are happy. The trouble we are in cannot hurt us, shall not ruin us. It is in vain to expect relief from creatures, we have no confidence in the Egyptians; but we have waited for thee only, resolving to submit to thee, whatever the issue of the trouble be, and hoping that it shall be a comfortable issue. Those that by faith humbly wait for God shall certainly find him gracious to them. They pray, 1. For those that were employed in military services for them; "Be thou their arm every morning." Hezekiah, and his princes, and all the men of war, need continual supplies of strength and courage from thee; supply their need therefore, and be to them a God all-sufficient. Every morning, when they go forth upon the business of the day, and perhaps have new work to do, and new difficulties to encounter, let them be afresh animated and invigorated, and as the day so let the strength be. In our spiritual warfare our own hands are not sufficient for us, nor can we bring anything to pass unless God not only strengthen our arms, Gen. xlix. 24, but be himself our arm; so entirely do we depend upon him as our arm every morning, so constantly do we depend upon his power, as well as his compassions, which are new every morning, Lam. iii. 23. If God leave us to ourselves any morning we are undone; we must therefore every morning commit ourselves to him, and go forth in his strength to do the work of the day in its day. 2. For the body of the people. "Be thou our salvation also in the time of trouble;" ours that sit still, and do not venture into the high places of the field. They depend upon God not only as their Saviour, to work deliverance for them, but as their salvation itself; for, whatever becomes of their secular interests, they will reckon themselves safe and saved, if they have him for their God. If he undertake to be their Saviour, he will be their salvation; for "as for God his work is perfect." Some read it thus: 'Thou who wast their arm every morning,' who wast the continual strength and help of our fathers before us, "be thou our salvation also in time of trouble;" help us as thou helpedst them. "They looked unto thee, and were lightened," Ps. xxxiv. 5; let us not then walk in darkness.

Thirdly. The Assyrian army ruined, and their camp made a rich, but cheap and easy prey to Judah and Jerusalem. No sooner is the prayer made, ver. 2, but it is answered, ver. 3; nay, it is outdone. They prayed that God would save them from their enemies; but he doth more than that, he gives them victory over their enemies, and abundant cause to triumph; for, 1. The strength of the Assyrian camp is broken, ver. 3. When the destroying angel slew so many thousands of them, "at the noise of the tumult," of the shrieks of the dying men, who we may suppose did not die silently, the rest of the people fled, and shifted every one for his own safety. When God did thus lift up himself, the several nations, or clans, of which the army was composed, were scattered. It was time to stir when such an unprecedented plague broke out among them. When God ariseth, his enemies are scattered, Ps. lxviii. 1. 2. The spoil of the Assyrian camp is seized by way of reprisal, for all the desolations of the defenced cities of Judah; ver. 4, "Your spoil shall be gathered" by the inhabitants of Jerusalem, "like the gathering of the caterpillar, and as the running to and fro of locusts;" that is, the spoilers shall as easily and as quickly make themselves masters of the riches of the Assyrians as a host of caterpillars or locusts make a field or a tree bare. Thus the wealth of the sinners is laid up for the just, and Israel enriched with the spoil of the Egyptians. Some make the Assyrians to be caterpillars and locusts, which when they are killed are gathered together in heaps, as the frogs of Egypt, and are run upon, and trodden to dirt.

Fourthly. God and his Israel glorified and exalted thereby. When the spoil of the enemy is thus gathered, 1. God will have the praise of it; ver. 5, "The Lord is exalted." It is his honour thus to abase proud men and hide them in the dust together; thus he magnifies his own name, and his people give him the glory of it, as Israel, when the Egyptians were drowned, Ex. xv. 1, &c. He is exalted as one that dwelleth on high, out of the reach of their blasphemies, and that has an overruling power over them; and wherein they deal proudly delights to shew himself above them; who doth what he will, and they cannot resist him. 2. His people will have the blessing of it. When God lifts up himself to scatter the nations that are in confederacy against Jerusalem, ver. 3, then, as a preparative for that, or as the fruit and product of it, he "hath filled Zion with judgment and righteousness;" not only with a sense of justice, but with a zeal for it, and an universal care that it be duly administered. It shall again be called "The city of righteousness," ch. i. 26. In this the grace of God is exalted as much as his providence was in the destruction of the Assyrian army. We may conclude God has mercy in store for a people when he fills them with judgment and righteousness, when all sorts of people, and all their actions and affairs, are governed by them, and they are so full of them that no other considerations can crowd in to sway them against these. Hezekiah and his people are encouraged, ver. 6, with an assurance that God would stand by them in their distress. Here is, 1st. A gracious promise of God for them to stay themselves upon, "Wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of thy times, and strength of salvation." Here is a double end proposed, and that is, the stability of our times, that things be not disturbed and unhinged at home; and the strength of salvation, deliverance from, and success against, enemies abroad. The salvation that God ordains for his people hath strength in it; it is a horn of salvation. And here is the way and means for obtaining this end, wisdom and knowledge, not only piety but prudence; that is it by which the blessing of God will be the stability of our times, and the strength of salvation; that wisdom which is first pure, then peaceable, and which sacrificeth private interests to the public good; such prudence as this will establish truth and peace, and fortify the bulwarks in defence of them. 2nd. A pious maxim of state for Hezekiah and his people to govern themselves by, "The fear of the Lord is his treasure." It is God's treasure in the world, from which he receives his tribute; or, rather, it is the prince's treasure: a good prince accounts it so, that wisdom is better than gold, and he shall find it so. Note, True religion is the true treasure of any prince or people; it denominates them rich. Those places that have plenty of Bibles and ministers, and serious, good people, are really rich; and it contributes to that which makes a nation rich in this world. It is therefore the interest of a people to support religion among them, and take heed of every thing that threatens to hinder it.

Fifthly. The great distress that Jerusalem was brought into described; that they who believed the prophet might know beforehand what troubles were coming, and might provide accordingly; and that when the foregoing promise of their deliverance should have its accomplishment the remembrance of the extremity of their case might help to magnify God in it, and make them the more thankful, ver. 7—9. It is here foretold, 1. That the enemy would be very insolent and abusive, and there would be no dealing with him, either by treaties of peace, (for "he has broken the covenant," and never stuck at it, as if it were below him to be a servant to his word,) or by the preparations of war, for "he hath despised the cities;" scorns to take notice either of their appeals to justice, or of their petitions for mercy. He makes himself master of them so easily, though they are called fenced cities, and meets with so little resistance, that he despiseth them; and hath no relentings when he puts all to the sword, for he regardeth no man; hath no pity or concern, no, not for those that he is under particular obligations to. He neither fears God nor regards man, but is haughty and imperious to every one. These are those that take a pride in trampling upon all mankind, and have neither veneration for the honourable nor compassion for the miserable. 2. That therefore he would not be brought to any terms of reconciliation. "The valiant ones of Jerusalem" being unable to make their parts good with him, must be contentedly run down with noise and insolence, which will make them cry without, because they cannot serve their country as they might have done against a fair adversary. The ambassadors sent by Hezekiah to treat of peace, finding him so haughty and unmanageable, shall weep bitterly for vexation, at the disappointment they had met with in their negotiations; they shall weep like children, as despairing to find out any expedient to pacify him. 3. That the country should be made quite desolate for a time by his army. 1st. No man durst travel the roads, so that a stop was put to trade and commerce; and, which was worse, no man could safely go up to Jerusalem to keep the solemn feasts, "The highways lie waste." While the fields lie waste, trodden like the highways, the highways lie waste, untrodden like the fields, for the traveller ceaseth. 2nd. No man had any profit from the grounds, ver. 9. The earth used to rejoice in its products for the service of God's Israel, but now the enemies of Israel eat them up, or tread them down, it mourns and languisheth; the country looks melancholy, and the country people have misery in their countenances, wanting necessary food for themselves and their families. The wonted joy of harvest is turned into lamentation, so withering and uncertain are all worldly joys. The desolation is universal. That part of the country which belonged to the ten tribes was already laid waste; Lebanon, famed for cedars, Sharon for roses, Bashan for cattle, Carmel for corn, all very fruitful, are now become like wildernesses; are ashamed to be called by their old names, they are so unlike what they were. They shake off their fruits before their time, into the hand of the spoiler, which used to be gathered seasonably by the hand of the owner.

Sixthly. God appeared at length in his glory against this proud invader, ver. 10—12. When things are brought thus to the last extremity, 1. God will magnify himself. He had seemed to sit by as an unconcerned spectator, but "Now will I rise, saith the Lord;" now will I appear and act, and therein I will be not only evidenced but exalted; he will not only demonstrate that "there is a God that judgeth in the earth," but that he is God over all, and higher than the highest. "Now will I lift up myself," will prepare for action, will act vigorously, and will be glorified in it. God's time to appear for his people is when their affairs are reduced to the lowest ebb, "when their strength is gone, and there is none shut up or left," Deu. xxxii. 36. When all other helpers fail, then is God's time to help. 2. He will bring down the Assyrian. You, O Assyrians, are big with hopes that you shall have all the wealth of Jerusalem for your own, and are in pain till it be so; but all your hopes shall come to nothing, "You shall conceive chaff, and bring forth stubble," which is not only worthless and good for nothing, but combustible, and proper fuel for the fire, which it cannot escape when "your own breath as fire shall devour you;" that is, the breath of God's wrath provoked against you by the breath of your sins: your malignant breath, the threatenings and slaughter you breathe out against the people of God, this shall devour you; and your blasphemous breath against God and his name. God will make their own tongues to fall upon them, and their own breath to blow the fire that shall consume them. And then no wonder that the people are as the burnings of lime in a lime-kiln, all on fire together; and as thorns cut up, which are dried and withered, and therefore easily take fire, and are soon burnt up. Such was the destruction of the Assyrian army; it was like the burning up of thorns which can well be spared, or the burning of lime, which makes it good for something. The burning of that army enlightened the world with the knowledge of God's power, and made his name shine bright.

13 Hear, ye that are far off, what I have done;
And, ye that are near, acknowledge my might.
14 The sinners in Zion are afraid;
Fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites.
Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire?
Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?
15 He that walketh righteously, and speaketh uprightly;
He that despiseth the gain of oppressions,
That shaketh his hands from holding of bribes,
That stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood,
And shutteth his eyes from seeing evil;
16 He shall dwell on high:
His place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks:
Bread shall be given him;
His waters shall be sure.
17 Thine eyes shall see the king in his beauty:
They shall behold the land that is very far off.
18 Thine heart shall meditate terror.
Where is the scribe? where is the receiver?
Where is he that counted the towers?
19 Thou shalt not see a fierce people,
A people of a deeper speech than thou canst perceive;
Of a stammering tongue, that thou canst not understand.
20 Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities:
Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation,
A tabernacle that shall not be taken down;

caterpillar" should be "like what the locust gathers." A different kind or form of locust is meant in the latter part of the verse.

xxxiii. 6. The word "his" is variously referred to Hezekiah, to Judah, to the believer, to Jehovah, and to the Messiah. We seem to have here again a change of person, "thy," "his," with no change of object. We should explain the words "the fear of the Lord is his treasure" to mean that the Lord values greatly the reverence which is rendered to him.

xxxiii. 7. Many explanations have been suggested for the first clause of this verse, but none better than that of the common version. We take the sense of the verse to be that the brave men who went to treat with Sennacherib as messengers of peace would greatly lament the failure of their efforts. (See 2 Kings xviii. 14—16).

xxxiii. 8. In the second half of this verse the violence of Sennacherib is set forth; and in the next verse the effects of the invasion are practically described.

Not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed,
Neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken.
21 But there the glorious LORD will be unto us
A place of broad rivers and streams;
Wherein shall go no galley with oars,
Neither shall gallant ship pass thereby.
22 For the LORD is our judge, the LORD is our lawgiver,
The LORD is our king; he will save us.
23 Thy tacklings are loosed;
They could not well strengthen their mast,
They could not spread the sail:
Then is the prey of a great spoil divided;
The lame take the prey.
24 And the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick:
The people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity.

Here is a preface that commands attention, and it is fit all should attend, both near and far off, when God speaks, and to what God acts; ver. 13, "Hear ye that are afar off," whether in place or time. Let distant regions and future ages hear "what God has done." They do so, they will do so from the Scripture, with as much assurance as those that were near; the neighbouring nations, and those that lived then. But whoever hears what God has done, whether near or afar off, let them acknowledge his might, that is irresistible, and that he can do every thing. Those are very stupid who hear what God has done, and yet will not acknowledge his might. Now what is it that God has done which we must take notice of, and in which we must acknowledge his might?

First. He hath struck a terror upon the sinners in Zion; ver. 14, "Fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites." There are sinners in Zion, hypocrites that enjoy Zion's privileges, and concur in Zion's services, but their hearts are not right in the sight of God; they keep up secret haunts of sin under the cloak of a visible profession, which convict them of hypocrisy. And sinners in Zion will have a great deal to answer for above other sinners, and their place in Zion will be so far from being their security, that it will aggravate both their sin and punishment. Now those sinners in Zion, though always subject to secret frights and terrors, were struck with a more than ordinary consternation, from the convictions of their own consciences. 1. When they saw the Assyrian army besieging Jerusalem, and ready to set fire to it, and lay it in ashes, and burn the wasps in the nest, finding they could not make their escape to Egypt, as some had done, and distrusting the promises God had made by his prophets, that he would deliver them, they were at their wit's end, and ran about like men distracted, crying, "Who among us shall dwell with devouring fire?" let us, therefore, abandon the city, and shift for ourselves elsewhere; one had as good live in everlasting burnings as live here. 'Who will stand up for us against this devouring fire?' so some read it. See here how the sinners in Zion are affected when the judgments of God are abroad; while they were only threatened, they slighted them, and made nothing of them; but when they come to be executed they run into the other extreme: then they magnify them and make the worst of them; they call them devouring fire and everlasting burnings, and despair of relief and succour. Those that rebel against the commands of the word cannot take the comforts of it in a time of need. Or rather, 2. When they saw the Assyrian army destroyed; for the destruction of that is the fire spoken of immediately before, ver. 11, 12. When the sinners in Zion saw what dreadful execution the wrath of God made, they were in a great fright, being conscious to themselves that they had provoked this God by their secret worshipping of other gods, and therefore they cry out, "Who among us shall dwell with this devouring fire," before which so vast an army is as thorns? "Who among us shall dwell with these everlasting burnings," which have made the Assyrians as the burnings of lime? ver. 12. Thus they said or should have said. Note, God's judgments upon the enemies of Zion should strike a terror upon the sinners in Zion; nay, David himself trembles at them, Ps. cxix. 120. God himself is this devouring fire, Heb. xii. 29; "Who is able to stand before him?" 1 Sam. vi. 29. His wrath will burn those everlastingly that have made themselves fuel for it. It is a fire that shall never be quenched, nor will ever go out of itself; for it is the wrath of an everlasting God preying upon the conscience of an immortal soul; and the most daring sinners cannot bear up against it, cannot bear either the execution of it or the fearful expectation of it. Let this awaken us all "to flee from the wrath to come," by flying to Christ as our refuge.

Secondly. He hath graciously provided for the security of his people that trust in him. Hear this and acknowledge his power, in making those that walk righteously and speak uprightly to dwell on high, ver. 15, 16. We have here,

1. The good man's character, which he preserves even in times of common iniquity, in divers instances. 1st. He walks righteously; that is, in the whole course of his conversation he acts by rules of equity, and makes conscience of rendering to all their due, to God his due as well as to men theirs. His walk is righteousness itself; he would not for a world wilfully do an unjust thing. 2nd. He speaks uprightly, uprightnesses, so the word is; he speaks what is true and right, and with an honest intention. He cannot think one thing and speak another, nor look one way and row another. His word is to him as sacred as his oath, and is not yea and nay. 3rd. He is so far from coveting ill-got gain, that he despiseth it, thinks it a mean and sordid thing, and unbecoming a man of honour to enrich himself by any hardship put upon his neighbour. He scorns to do an ill thing, nay, a severe thing, though he might get by it. He doth not overvalue gain itself, and therefore easily abhors the gain that is not honestly come by. 4th. If he have a bribe at any time thrust into his hand to pervert justice, he shakes his hands from holding it with the utmost detestation, taking it as an affront to have it offered him. 5th. He stops his ears from hearing any thing that tends to cruelty or bloodshed, or any suggestions stirring him up to revenge, Job xxxi. 31. He turns a deaf ear to those that delight in war, and entice him to cast in his lot among them, Pr. i. 14, 16. 6th. He shuts his eyes from seeing evil. He hath such an abhorrence of sin, that he cannot bear to see others commit it, and doth himself watch against all the occasions of it. Those that would preserve the purity of their souls must keep a strict guard upon the senses of their bodies, stop their ears to temptations, and turn away their eyes from beholding vanity.

2. The good man's comfort, which he may preserve even in times of common calamity, ver. 16. 1st. He shall be safe. He shall escape the devouring fire and the everlasting burnings; he shall have access to, and communion with, that God who is a devouring fire, but shall be to him a rejoicing light. And as to present troubles, "He shall dwell on high," out of the reach of them, nay, out of the hearing of the noise of them. He shall not be really harmed by them; nay, he shall not be greatly frightened at them, "The floods of great waters shall not come nigh him." Or, if they should attack him, "his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks," strong and impregnable, fortified by nature as well as art. The Divine power will keep him safe, and his faith in that power will keep him easy; God, the Rock of ages, will be his high tower. 2nd. He shall be supplied; he shall want nothing that is necessary for him, "Bread shall be given him," even when the siege is straitest, and provisions are cut off; "and his waters shall be sure," that is, he shall be sure of the continuance of them, so that he shall not drink his water by measure and with astonishment. They that fear the Lord shall not want any thing that is good for them.

Thirdly. He will protect Jerusalem, and deliver it out of the hands of the invaders. This storm that threatened them should blow over, and they should enjoy a prosperous state again. Many instances are here given of this:

1. Hezekiah shall put off his sackcloth, and all the sadness of his countenance, and shall appear publicly in his beauty, in his royal robes, and with a pleasant aspect, ver. 17, to the great joy of all his loving subjects. Those that walk uprightly shall not only have bread given them, and their water sure, but they shall, with an eye of faith, see the King of kings in his beauty, the beauty of holiness, and that beauty shall be upon them.

2. The siege being raised, by which they were kept close within the walls of Jerusalem, they shall now be at liberty to go abroad, upon business or pleasure, without danger of falling into the enemy's hand; and they shall "behold the land that is very far off." They shall visit the utmost corners of thy nation, and take a prospect of the adjacent countries, which will be the more pleasant after so long a confinement. And believers behold the heavenly Canaan, that land that is very far off, and comfort themselves with the prospect of it in evil times.

3. The remembrance of the fright they were in shall add to the pleasure of their deliverance; ver. 18, "Thine heart shall meditate terror," meditate it with pleasure when it is over. Thou shalt think thou still hearest the alarm in thine ears, when all the cry was, Arm, arm, arm! every man to his post. "Where is the scribe," or secretary of war? let him appear, to draw up the muster-roll. "Where is the receiver," and paymaster of the army? let him see what he has in bank, to defray the charge of a defence. "Where is he that counted the towers?" let him bring in the account of them, that care may be taken to put a competent number of men in each. Or these words may be taken as Jerusalem's triumph over the vanquished army of the Assyrians; and the rather because the apostle alludes to them in his triumphs over the learning of this world, when it was baffled by the Gospel of Christ, 1 Cor. i. 20. The virgin, the daughter of Zion, despiseth all their military preparations, "Where is the scribe," or muster-master of the Assyrian army? "Where is their weigher," or treasurer? And where their engineers, that "counted the towers?" They are all either dead or fled; there is an end of them.

4. They shall no more be terrified with the sight of the Assyrians, who were a fierce people naturally, and were particularly fierce against the people of the Jews, and were of a strange language, that could neither understand their petitions and complaints, and therefore had a pretence to be deaf to them, nor could themselves be understood. They are "of a deeper speech than thou canst perceive," which will make them the more formidable, ver. 19. Thine eyes shall no more see them thus fierce, but their countenances changed when they are all become dead corpses.

5. They shall no more be under apprehensions of the danger of Jerusalem, Zion, and the temple there; ver. 20, "Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities;" the city where our solemn, sacred feasts are kept, where we used to meet to worship God in religious assemblies. The good people among them, in the time of their distress, were most in pain for Zion upon this account, that it was the city of their solemnities; that the conquerors would burn their temple, and they should not have that to keep their solemn feasts in any more. In times of public danger our concern should be most about our religion; and the cities of our solemnities should be dearer to us than either our strong cities or our store cities. And it is with an eye to this that God will work deliverance for Jerusalem, because it is the city of religious solemnities. Let those be conscientiously kept up as the glory of a people, and we may depend upon God to create a defence upon that glory. Two things are here promised to Jerusalem: 1st. A well grounded security. It shall be "a quiet habitation" to the people of God; they shall not be molested and disturbed as they have been by the alarms of the sword, either of war or persecution, ch. xxix. 20. It shall be a quiet habitation, as it is the city of our solemnities. It is desirable to be quiet in our own houses, but much more so to be quiet in God's house, and have none to make us afraid there. Thus it shall be with Jerusalem, and "thine eyes shall see" it, which will be a great satisfaction to a good man; Ps. cxxviii. 5, 6, "Thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem, and peace upon Israel;" shalt live to see it and share in it. 2nd. An unmoved stability. Jerusalem, the city of our solemnities, is indeed but a tabernacle in comparison with the New Jerusalem; the present manifestations of the Divine glory and grace are nothing in comparison with those that are reserved for the future state; but it is such a tabernacle as shall not be taken down. After this trouble is over, Jerusalem shall long enjoy a confirmed peace; and her sacred privileges, which are the stakes and cords of her tabernacle, shall not be removed from her, nor any disturbance given to the course and circle of her religious services. God's church on earth is a tabernacle, which, though it may be shifted from one place to another, yet shall not be taken down while the world stands; for in every age Christ will have a seed to serve him. The promises of the covenant are its stakes, which shall never be removed; and the ordinances and institutions of the Gospel are its cords, which shall never be broken. They are things which cannot be shaken, though heaven and earth be, but shall remain.

6. God himself will be their protector and saviour, ver. 21, 22. This is the principal ground of their confidence. He that is himself "the glorious Lord" will display his glory for us, and be a glory to us; such as shall eclipse the rival glory of the enemy. God, in being a gracious Lord, is a glorious Lord; for his goodness is his glory. God will be the saviour of Jerusalem, and her glorious Lord. 1st. As a guard against their adversaries abroad; he "will be a place of broad rivers and streams." Jerusalem had no considerable river running by it, as most great cities have; nothing but the brook Kidron; and so wanted one of the best natural fortifications, as well as one of the greatest advantages for trade and commerce, and upon this account their enemies despised them, and doubted not but to make an easy prey of them. But the presence and power of God is sufficient at any time to make up the deficiencies of the creature, and of its strength and beauty to us. We have all in God; all we need or can desire. Many external advantages Jerusalem has not which other places have; but in God there is more than an equivalent. But if there be broad rivers and streams about Jerusalem, may not these yield an easy access to the fleet of an invader? No; these are rivers and streams in which "shall go no galley with oars," no man of war, or gallant ship. If God himself be the river, it must needs be inaccessible to the enemy; they can neither find nor xxxiii. 11—13. These verses portend the overthrow of the Assyrians.

xxxiii. 14. God's judgments upon the Assyrians fill the sinners of Jerusalem with terror, and they cry out, "Who among us?" &c. The following verses answer the question, by describing the character of those who will not come under condemnation.

xxxiii. 17. Literally, this may mean the king of Judah and the extremities of the land; but the words may have a wider reference.

xxxiii. 18. To "meditate terror" here is to reflect upon the men and things which have caused terror, such as the officers who had levied tribute and surveyed the forts of Jerusalem, when Sennacherib invaded the land.

xxxiii. 19. They would no more see the fierce foreigner of strange language; i.e., the enemy would be removed. The word for "perceive" is "hear" in the Hebrew, the two ideas being often practically interchangeable in the Old and New Testaments.

xxxiii. 20. Stakes and cords are spoken of in allusion to the force their way by it. 2nd. As a guide to their affairs at home; "for the Lord is our judge," to whom we are accountable, to whose judgment we refer ourselves, and by whose judgment we abide; and who therefore, we hope, will judge for us. "He is our lawgiver;" his word is law to us; and to him every thought within us is brought into obedience. "He is our king," to whom we pay homage and tribute, and an inviolable allegiance; and therefore "he will save us;" for as protection draws allegiance, so allegiance may expect protection, and shall have it with God. By faith we take Christ for our Prince and Saviour, and, as such, depend upon him, and devote ourselves to him. Observe with what an air of triumph, and with what an emphasis laid upon the glorious name of God, they comfort themselves; "Jehovah is our judge; Jehovah is our lawgiver; Jehovah is our king;" who, being self-existent, is self-sufficient, and all-sufficient to us.

7. The enemies shall be quite infatuated, and all their powers and projects broken; like a ship at sea in stress of weather, that cannot ride out the storm, but having her tackle torn, her mast split, and nothing wherewithal to repair them, is given up for a wreck; ver. 23, "the tacklings" of the Assyrian are loosed; that is, they are like a ship whose tacklings "are loosed," or forsaken by the ship's crew when they give it over for lost, finding that "they cannot strengthen the mast," but it will come down. They thought themselves sure of Jerusalem; but when they were just entering the port, as it were, and thought all was their own, they were quite becalmed and could not spread their sail, but lay wind-bound till God poured the fury of his wrath upon them. The enemies of God's church are often disarmed and unrigged then when they think they have almost gained their point.

8. The wealth of their camp shall be a rich booty for the Jews; "Then is the prey of a great spoil divided." When the most were slain the rest fled in confusion, and with such precipitation that, like the Syrians, they left their tents as they were, so that all the treasure in them fell into the hands of the besieged, and even the lame take the prey; they that tarried at home did divide the spoil. It was so easy to come by that not only the strong man might make himself master of it, but even the lame man whose hands were lame that he could not fight, and his feet that he could not pursue. As the victory shall cost them no peril, so the prey shall cost them no toil. And there was such abundance of it that, when those who were forward and came first had carried off as much as they would, even the lame that came late yet found sufficient. Thus God brought good out of evil; and not only delivered Jerusalem, but enriched it, and abundantly recompensed the losses they had sustained. Thus comfortably and well do the frights and distresses of the people of God many times end.

9. Both sickness and sin shall be taken away; and then sickness is taken away in mercy, when this is all the fruit of it, and the recovery from it, even the taking away of sin. 1st. "The inhabitant shall not say, I am sick." As "the lame shall take the prey," so shall the sick, notwithstanding their weakness, make a shift to get to the abandoned camp and seize something for themselves. Or, there shall be such an universal transport of joy upon this occasion that even the sick shall for the present forget their sickness, and the sorrows of it, and join with the public in its rejoicings. The deliverance of their city shall be their cure. Or, it notes that whereas infectious diseases are commonly the effect of long sieges, it shall not be so with Jerusalem; but the inhabitants of it, with their victory and peace, shall have health also; and there shall be no complaining upon the account of sickness within their gates. Or, those that are sick shall bear their sickness without complaining as long as they see it goes well with Jerusalem. Our sense of private grievances should be drowned in our thanksgivings for public mercies. 2nd. "The people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity." Not only the body of the nation forgiven their national guilt in the removing of the national judgment, but particular persons that dwell therein shall repent and reform, and have their sins pardoned. And this is promised as that which is at the bottom of all other favours; he will do so and so for them, "for he will be merciful to their unrighteousness," Heb. viii. 12. Sin is the sickness of the soul; when God pardons the sin he heals the disease; and when the diseases of sin are healed by pardoning mercy the sting of bodily sickness is taken out, and the cause of it removed; so that either the inhabitant shall not be sick or at least shall not say, "I am sick." If iniquity be taken away, we have little reason to complain of outward affliction; "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

In this chapter we have the fatal doom of all the nations that are enemies to God's church and people, though Edom only is instanced in, because of the old enmity of Esau to Jacob, which was typical, as much as that more ancient enmity of Cain to Abel, and flowed from the original enmity of the serpent to the seed of the woman. It is probable this prophecy had its accomplishment in the great desolations made by the Assyrian army first, or rather by Nebuchadnezzar's army some time after, among those nations that were neighbours to Israel, and had been, some way or other, injurious to them. That mighty conqueror took a pride in shedding blood and laying countries waste, and therein, quite beyond his design, he was fulfilling what God here threatened against his and his people's enemies. But we have reason to think it is intended as a denunciation of the wrath of God against all those who fight against the interests of his kingdom among men; that it has its frequent accomplishment in the havoc made by the wars of the nations and other desolating judgments, and will have its full accomplishment in the final dissolution of all things at the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. Here is, I. A demand of universal attention, ver. 1. II. A direful scene of blood and confusion presented, ver. 2—7. III. The reason given for these judgments, ver. 8. IV. The continuance of this desolation, the country being made like the lake of Sodom, ver. 9, 10, and the cities abandoned to wild beasts and melancholy fowl, ver. 11—15. V. The solemn ratification of all this, ver. 16, 17. Let us hear and fear.

COME near, ye nations, to hear;
And hearken, ye people:
Let the earth hear, and all that is therein;
The world, and all things that come forth of it.
2 For the indignation of the LORD is upon all nations,
And his fury upon all their armies:
He hath utterly destroyed them,
He hath delivered them to the slaughter.
3 Their slain also shall be cast out,
And their stink shall come up out of their carcases,
And the mountains shall be melted with their blood.
4 And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved,
And the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll:
And all their host shall fall down,
As the leaf falleth off from the vine,
And as a fallen fig from the fig tree.
5 For my sword shall be bathed in heaven:
Behold, it shall come down upon Idumea,
And upon the people of my curse, to judgment.
6 The sword of the LORD is filled with blood,
It is made fat with fatness,
And with the blood of lambs and goats,
With the fat of the kidneys of rams:
For the LORD hath a sacrifice in Bozrah,
And a great slaughter in the land of Idumea
7 And the unicorns shall come down with them,
And the bullocks with the bulls;
And their land shall be soaked with blood
And their dust made fat with fatness.
8 For it is the day of the LORD'S vengeance,
And the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion.

Here we have a prophecy, as elsewhere we have a history, of the wars of the Lord, which, we are sure, are all both righteous and successful. This world, as it is his creature, he doth good to; but as it is in the interest of Satan, who is called the god of this world, he fights against it.

First. Here is the trumpet sounded, and the war proclaimed, ver. 1. All nations must hear and hearken, not only because what God is about to do is well worthy their remark, as ch. xxxiii. 11, but because they are all concerned in it. It is with them that God hath a quarrel; it is against them that God is coming forth in wrath. Let them all take notice that the great God is angry with them; his indignation is upon all nations, and therefore let all nations come near to hear. The "trumpet is blown in the city," Am. iii. 6, and the watchmen on the walls cry, "Hearken to the voice of the trumpet," Jer. vi. 17; "Let the earth hear, and the fulness thereof," for it is the Lord's, Ps. xxiv. 1, and ought to hearken to its maker and master. The world must hear, and "all things that come forth of it;" that is, the children of men, that are of the earth earthy, come out of it, and must return to it. Or, the inanimate products of the earth are called to, as more likely to hearken than sinners, whose hearts are hardened against the calls of God; "Hear, O ye mountains, the Lord's controversy," Mic. vi. 1. It is so just a controversy that all the world may be safely appealed to concerning the equity of it.

Secondly. Here is the manifesto published, setting forth,

1. Whom he makes war against; ver. 2, "The indignation of the Lord is upon all nations." They are all in confederacy against God and religion, all in the interests of the devil; and therefore he is angry with them all, even with "all the nations that forget him." He hath long "suffered all nations to walk in their own ways," Acts xiv. 16; but now he will no longer keep silence. As they have all had the benefit of his patience, so they must all expect now to feel his resentments. His fury is in a special manner upon all their armies; 1st. Because with them they have done mischief to the people of God. Those are they that have made bloody work with them, and therefore they must be sure to have blood given them to drink. 2nd. Because with them they hope to make their part good against the justice and power of God; they trust to them as their defence, and therefore on them, in the first place, God's fury will come. Armies before God's fury are but as dry stubble before a consuming fire, though never so numerous and courageous.

2. Whom he makes war for, and what are the grounds and reasons of the war; ver. 8, "It is the day of the Lord's vengeance," and he it is to whom vengeance belongs, and who is never unrighteous in taking vengeance, Rom. iii. 5. As there is a day of the Lord's patience, so there will be a day of his vengeance; for though he bear long he will not bear always; it is the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion. Zion is the holy city, the city of our solemnities, a type and figure of the church of God in the world. Zion has a just quarrel with her neighbours for the wrongs they have done her, for all the treacherous and barbarous usage they have given her, profaning her holy things, laying waste her palaces, and slaying her sons. She has left it to God to plead her cause, and he will do it when the time, even the set time to favour Zion, comes; then he will recompense to her persecutors and oppressors all the mischiefs they have done her. The controversy will be decided that Zion has been wronged, and therein Zion's God has been himself abused; judgment will be given upon this decision, and execution done. Note, There is a time prefixed in the Divine counsels for the deliverance of the church and the destruction of her enemies; a year of the redeemed which will come, a "year of recompences for the controversy of Zion," and we must patiently wait till then, and judge nothing before the time.

Thirdly. Here are the operations of the war, and the methods of it settled with an infallible assurance of success.

1. The "sword of the Lord is bathed in heaven;" that is all the preparation here made for the war, ver. 5. It may probably allude to some custom they had then of bathing their swords in some liquor or other to harden them or brighten them. It is the same with the furbishing of it, that it may glitter, Eze. xxi. 9—11. God's sword is bathed in heaven, in his counsel and decree, in his justice and power; and then there is no standing before it.

2. It shall come down. What he has determined shall without fail be put in execution. It shall come down from heaven; and the higher the place is from whence it comes the heavier will it fall. It will come down upon Idumea, the people of God's curse; that is, that lie under his curse, and are by it doomed to destruction. Miserable, for ever miserable, are they that have, by their sins, made themselves the people of God's curse; for the sword of the Lord will infallibly attend the curse of the Lord, and execute the sentences of it; and those whom he curseth they are cursed indeed. It shall come down to judgment, to execute judgment upon sinners. Note, God's sword of war is always a sword of justice. It is observed of him out of whose mouth goeth the sharp sword, that "in righteousness he doth judge, and make war," Rev. xix. 11, 15.

3. The nations and their armies shall be given up to the sword; ver. 2, God "hath delivered them to the slaughter;" and then they cannot deliver themselves, nor can all the friends they have deliver them from it. Those only are tent (or tabernacle) just mentioned—a prominent feature in Oriental life.

xxxiii. 21. The promise of a well-watered land is accompanied by a promise of security from hostile ships, both small and great; for the ships of enemies must be meant. The real meaning of the word for "gallant" is noble or mighty.

xxxiii. 23. The enemy is here personified as a ship which has become unmanageable, and which is easily captured and spoiled. This is the usual view, but some think it is the condition of Jerusalem which is indicated, and Jerusalem which is addressed.

xxxiv. 1, 2. The nations and peoples here addressed are heathen, to the exclusion of the Israel of God.

xxxiv. 5. The expression "my sword shall be bathed in heaven" is obscure, and must be modified. The word for "bathed" has the meanings of drunk, saturated, &c., and the idea of the clause is that the sword is dripping with blood. As the sword is represented as slain whom God delivers to the slaughter; for the keys of death are in his hand; and in delivering them to the slaughter he hath utterly destroyed them. Their destruction is as sure, when God hath doomed them to it, as if they were destroyed already, utterly destroyed. God has in effect delivered all the cruel enemies of his church to the slaughter by that word, Rev. xiii. 10, "He that killeth with the sword must be killed by the sword;" for the Lord is righteous.

4. Pursuant to the sentence a terrible slaughter shall be made among them; ver. 6, "The sword of the Lord," when it comes down with commission, doth vast execution; it is filled, satiated, surfeited with blood, the blood of the slain, and made fat with their fatness. When the day of God's abused mercy and patience is over the sword of justice gives no quarter, spares none. Men have by sin lost the honour of the human nature, and made themselves like the beasts that perish; and therefore are justly denied the compassions and respects that are owing to the human nature, and killed as beasts; and no more made of slaying an army of men than of butchering a flock of lambs or goats, and feeding on "the fat of the kidneys of rams." Nay, the sword of the Lord shall not only despatch the lambs and goats, the infantry of their armies, the poor common soldiers, but, ver. 7, the unicorns too shall be made to come down with them; and the bullocks with the bulls, though they are never so proud, and strong, and fierce, "the great men, and the mighty men, and the chief captains," Rev. vi. 25; the sword of the Lord will make as easy a prey of them as of the lambs and the goats. The greatest of men are nothing before the wrath of the great God. See what bloody work will be made; "the land shall be soaked with blood," as with the rain that comes often upon it, and in great abundance; and their dust, their dry and barren land, shall be made fat with the fatness of men slain in their full strength, as with manure. Nay, even the mountains, that are hard and rocky, shall be melted with their blood, ver. 3. These expressions are hyperbolical, as St. John's vision of blood to the horse bridles, Rev. xiv. 20, and are made use of, because they sound very dreadful to sense, (it makes us even shiver to think of such abundance of human gore,) and are therefore proper enough to express the terror of God's wrath, which is dreadful beyond conception and expression. See what work sin makes, and wrath makes, even in this world; and think how much more terrible the wrath to come is, which will bring down the unicorns themselves to the bars of the pit.

5. This great slaughter will be a great sacrifice to the justice of God; ver. 6, "The Lord hath a sacrifice in Bozrah;" there it is that the great Redeemer hath his garments dyed with blood, ch. lxiii. 1. Sacrifices were intended for the honour of God, to make it appear that he hates sin and demands satisfaction for it; and that nothing but blood will make atonement; and for these ends this slaughter is made, that in it "the wrath of God may be revealed from heaven against all the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men," especially their ungodly, unrighteous enmity to his people; which was the sin that the Edomites were notoriously guilty of. In great sacrifices abundance of beasts were killed, hecatombs offered, and their blood poured out before the altar; and so will it be in this day of the Lord's vengeance. And thus had the whole earth been soaked with the blood of sinners if Jesus Christ, the great propitiation, had not shed his blood for us. But those who reject him, and will not make a covenant with God by that sacrifice, will themselves fall as victims to Divine wrath. Damned sinners are everlasting sacrifices, Mar. ix. 49. They that sacrifice not, which is the character of the ungodly, Eccl. ix. 2, must be sacrificed.

6. These slain shall be detestable to mankind, and shall be as much their loathing as ever they were their terror; ver. 3, they shall be cast out, and none shall pay them the respect of a decent burial; but their stink shall come up out of their carcases, that all people, by the odious smell, as well as by the ghastly sight, may be made to conceive an indignation against sin, and a dread of the wrath of God. They lie unburied, that they may remain monuments of Divine justice.

7. The effect and consequence of this slaughter shall be an universal confusion and desolation, as if the whole frame of nature were dissolved and melted down, ver. 4. 'All the host of heaven shall pine and waste away,' so the word is; the sun shall be darkened, and the moon look black, or be turned into blood; the heavens themselves shall be rolled together as a scroll of parchment, when we have done with it, and lay it by, or as when it is shrivelled up by the heat of the fire; the stars shall fall as the leaves in autumn. All the beauty, joy, and comfort of the vanquished nation shall be lost and done away. Magistracy and government shall be abolished, and all dominion and rule, but that of the sword of war, shall fall. Conquerors in those times affected to lay waste the countries they conquered; and such a complete desolation is here described by such figurative expressions as will yet have a literal and full accomplishment in the dissolution of all things at the end of time; of which last day of judgment, the judgments which God doth now sometimes remarkably execute on sinful nations are figures, earnests, and forerunners; and by these we should be awakened to think of that, for which reason these expressions are used here, and Rev. vi. 12, 13; but they are used without a metaphor, 2 Pet. iii. 10, where we are told, that "the heavens shall pass away with a great noise and the earth shall be burnt up."

9 And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch,
And the dust thereof into brimstone,
And the land thereof shall become burning pitch.
10 It shall not be quenched night nor day;
The smoke thereof shall go up for ever:
From generation to generation it shall lie waste;
None shall pass through it for ever and ever.
11 But the cormorant and the bittern shall possess it;
The owl also and the raven shall dwell in it:
And he shall stretch out upon it the line of confusion,
And the stones of emptiness.
12 They shall call the nobles thereof to the kingdom,
But none shall be there,
And all her princes shall be nothing.
13 And thorns shall come up in her palaces,
Nettles and brambles in the fortresses thereof:
And it shall be an habitation of dragons,
And a court for owls.
14 The wild beasts of the desert shall also meet with the wild beasts of the island,
And the satyr shall cry to his fellow;
The screech owl also shall rest there,
And find for herself a place of rest.
15 There shall the great owl make her nest, and lay,
And hatch, and gather under her shadow:
There shall the vultures also be gathered,

EGYPTIAN VULTURES.

Every one with her mate.
16 Seek ye out of the book of the LORD, and read:
No one of these shall fail,
None shall want her mate:
For my mouth it hath commanded, and his spirit it hath gathered them.
17 And he hath cast the lot for them,
And his hand hath divided it unto them by line:
They shall possess it for ever,
From generation to generation shall they dwell therein.

CORMORANTS.—ver. 11.

This prophecy looks very black; but sure it looks so farther than upon Edom and Bozrah. 1. It speaks the melancholy changes that are often made by the Divine providence in countries, cities, palaces, and families. Places that have flourished, and been much frequented, strangely go to decay. We know not where to find the places where many great towns celebrated in history once stood. Fruitful countries, in process of time, are turned into barrenness; and pompous, populous cities, into ruinous heaps. Old decayed castles look frightful, and their ruins are almost as much dreaded as ever their garrisons were. 2. It speaks the destroying judgments which are the products of God's wrath, and the just punishment of those that are enemies to his people, which God will inflict when "the year of the redeemed is come," and "the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion." Those that aim to ruin the church, can never do that, but will infallibly ruin themselves. 3. It speaks the final desolation of this wicked world, which is "reserved unto fire at the day of judgment," 2 Pet. iii. 7. The earth itself, when it and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up, will (for aught I know) be turned into a hell to all those that set their affections only on earthly things; however, it shews us what will be the lot of the generation of God's curse.

being still in heaven, this must be spoken in anticipation of what would happen. (See verse 6.)

xxxiv. 6. Bozrah was one of the cities of Idumea, or Edom. It was not Bostra, in Hauran, but a place in the mountains of Edom.

xxxiv. 7. For "unicorns" here we must read buffaloes or wild oxen, as in all cases where the word occurs.

xxxiv. 9, 10. These and following verses describe in poetic language the desolation of Edom. Without asserting the literal fulfilment of that which is strongly figurative, it may be observed that this prediction has been substantially fulfilled in a most remarkable manner.

xxxiv. 11. By "cormorant" and "bittern" some understand pelican and hedgehog; others for "bittern" have porcupine. Dr. Tristram decides for pelican and bittern.

xxxiv. 13, 14. By "dragons" some kind of reptile is meant, and the so-called "owls" are probably ostriches. The "wild beasts of the desert" and "wild beasts of the island" are so called by con-

First. The country shall become like the lake of Sodom; ver. 9, 10, "The streams thereof" that both watered the land, and pleased and refreshed the inhabitants, shall now be turned into pitch, shall be congealed, shall look black, and shall move slowly, or not at all. 'Their floods to lazy streams of pitch shall turn,' so Sir R. Blackmore; and the dust thereof shall be turned into brimstone; so combustible hath sin made their land, that it shall take fire at the first spark of God's wrath struck upon it; and when it hath taken fire, it shall "become burning pitch." The fire shall be universal, not a house or town on fire, but a whole country; and it shall not be in the power of any to suppress or extinguish it; it shall burn continually, burn perpetually, and shall "not be quenched night or day." The torment of those in hell, or that have a hell within them in their own consciences, is without interruption; the smoke of this fire goes up for ever. As long as there are provoking sinners on earth, from one generation to another, an "increase of sinful men" to "augment the fierce anger of the Lord," Num. xxxii. 14, there will be a righteous God in heaven to punish them for it; and as long as a people keep up a succession of sinners God will have a succession of plagues for them; nor will any that fall under the wrath of God be ever able to recover themselves. It will be found, how light soever men make of it, that "it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." If the land be doomed to destruction, none shall pass through it; but travellers will choose rather to go a great way about, than come within smell of it.

Secondly. The cities shall become like old decayed houses, that being deserted by the owners, look very frightful, being commonly possessed by beasts of prey or fowl, that are ill omens. See how dismally the palaces of the enemy look. The description is very elegant and fine.

1. God shall mark them for ruin and destruction. "He shall stretch out upon Bozrah the line of confusion, with the stones" or plummets "of emptiness," ver. 11. This intimates the equity of the sentence passed upon it, it is given according to the rules of justice, and the exact agreeableness of the execution with the sentence, the destruction is not wrought at random, but by line and level. The confusion and emptiness that shall overspread the face of the whole country shall be like that of the whole earth when it was tohu and bohu, the very words here used, "without form and void." Sin will soon turn a paradise into a chaos, and sullies the beauty of the whole creation, Gen. i. 2. Where there is confusion there will soon be emptiness; but both are appointed by the Governor of the world, and in exact proportions.

2. Their great men shall be all cut off, and none of them shall dare to appear; ver. 12, "They shall call the nobles of the kingdom, to take care of the arduous affairs which lie before them, but none shall be there to take this ruin under their hand; and all her princes having the sad tidings brought them shall be nothing, shall be at their wits' end, and not be able to stand them in stead, to shelter them from destruction.

3. Even the houses of state, and those of strength, shall become as wildernesses, ver. 13; not only grass shall grow, but "thorns shall come up in her palaces, nettles and brambles in the fortresses thereof," and there shall be none to cut them up, or tread them down. We sometimes see ruined buildings thus overgrown with rubbish. It notes that the place shall not only be uninhabited and unfrequented, where a full court used to be kept, but that it shall be under the curse of God; for thorns and thistles were the products of the curse, Gen. iii. 18.

4. They shall become the residence and rendezvous of fearful, frightful beasts and birds, that usually frequent such melancholy places, because there they may be undisturbed; and when they are frightened thither, they help to frighten men thence. This circumstance of the desolation, being apt to strike a horror upon the mind, is much enlarged upon here, ver. 11. "The cormorant shall possess it;" or, the pelican, that affects to be solitary, Ps. cii. 6; and the bittern, that makes a hideous noise; the owl, a melancholy bird; the raven, a bird of prey, invited by the dead carcases shall dwell there, ('With all the ill-boding monsters of the air.'—Sir R. Blackmore.) All the unclean birds, which were not for the service of man; ver. 13, "It shall be a habitation of dragons," which are poisonous and hurtful.

'And in their lofty rooms of state,
Where cringing sycophants did wait,
Dragons shall hiss, and hungry wolves shall howl.
In courts before by mighty lords possest,
The serpent shall erect his speckled crest,
Or fold his circling spires to rest.'—Sir R. Blackmore.

That which was a court for princes shall now be a "court for owls," or ostriches; ver. 14, "The wild beasts of the desert," the dry and sandy country, shall meet as it were by appointment with the "wild beasts of the island," the wet, marshy country, and shall regale themselves with such a perfect desolation as they shall find there.

'Leopards and all the ravening brotherhoods,
That range the plains, or lurk in woods,
Each other shall invite to come,
And make this wilder place their home;
Fierce beasts of every frightful shape and size, Shall settle here their bloody colonies.'—Sir R. Blackmore.

"The satyr shall cry to his fellow" to go with him to this desert place; or, being there, shall please themselves that they have found such an agreeable habitation. There shall the screech owl rest, a night bird, and an ominous one; the great owl shall there make her nest, (ver. 15,) and lay and hatch. The breed of them shall be kept up to heir this desolate place; the vultures that feast on carcases shall be gathered there, every one with his mate. Now observe, 1st. How the places which men have deserted, and keep at a distance from, are proper receptacles for other animals, which the providence of God takes care of, and will not neglect. 2nd. Whom they resemble that are morose, unsociable, and unconversable, and affect a melancholy retirement. They are like these solitary creatures that take delight in desolations. 3rd. What a dismal change sin makes; it turns a fruitful land into barrenness, a frequented city into a wilderness.

5. Here is an assurance given of the full accomplishment of it; ver. 16, 17, "Seek ye out of the book of the Lord, and read." When this destruction comes, compare the event with the prediction, and you will find it to answer exactly. Note, The book of the prophets is the book of the Lord, and, as of Divine original and authority, we ought to consult it and converse with it. We must not only read it, but seek out of it, search into it; turn first to one text and then to another, and compare them together. Abundance of useful knowledge might thus be extracted by a diligent search out of the Scriptures, which cannot be got by a superficial reading of them. When you have read the prediction out of the book of the Lord, then observe, 1st. That according to what you have read so you see, "No one of these shall fail," either beast or fowl; and it being foretold, that they shall possess it from generation to generation, in order to that, that the species may be propagated, "none shall want her mate;" these marks of desolation shall be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the land. 2nd. That God's mouth having commanded this direful muster, his Spirit shall gather them, as the creatures by instinct were gathered to Adam to be named, and to Noah to be housed. What God's word has appointed his Spirit will effect and bring about; for no word of God shall fall to the ground. The word of God's promise shall in like manner be accomplished by the operations of the Spirit. 3rd. That there is an exact order and proportion observed in the accomplishment of this threatening. He hath cast the lot for these birds and beasts, so that each one shall know his place as readily as if it were marked by line. See the like, Joel ii. 7, 8, "They shall not break their ranks, neither shall one thrust another." The soothsayers among the heathen foretold events by the flight of birds, as if the fate of men depended on them; but here we find that the flight of birds is under the direction of the God of Israel; "He hath cast the lot for them." 4th. That the desolation shall be perpetual; "They shall possess it for ever." God's Jerusalem may be laid in ruins; but Jerusalem of old recovered itself out of its ruins, till it gave place to the gospel Jerusalem, which may be brought low, but shall be rebuilt, and shall continue till it give place to the heavenly Jerusalem; but the enemies of the church shall be for ever desolate, shall be punished with an everlasting destruction.

CHAPTER XXXV.

As after a prediction of God's judgments upon the world, ch. xxiv., follows a promise of great mercy to be had in store for his church, ch. xxv., so here, after a black and dreadful scene of confusion in the foregoing chapter, we have in this a bright and pleasant one; which, though it foretell the flourishing estate of Hezekiah's kingdom in the latter part of his reign, yet surely looks as far beyond that as the prophecy in the foregoing chapter doth beyond the destruction of the Edomites. Both were typical, and it concerns us most to look at those things which they were typical of,—the kingdom of Christ, and the kingdom of heaven. When the world that lies in wickedness shall be laid in ruins, and the Jewish church, that persisted in infidelity, shall become a desolation, then the gospel church shall be set up and made to flourish. I. The Gentiles shall be brought into it, ver. 1, 2, 7. II. The well-wishers to it, that were weak and timorous, shall be encouraged, ver. 3, 4. III. Miracles shall be wrought both on the souls and bodies of men, ver. 5, 6. IV. It shall be conducted in the way of holiness, ver. 8, 9. V. It shall be brought at last to endless joys, ver. 10. Thus do we find more of Christ and heaven in this chapter than one would have expected in the Old Testament.

THE wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them;
And the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose
2 It shall blossom abundantly,
And rejoice even with joy and singing:
The glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it,
The excellency of Carmel and Sharon,
They shall see the glory of the LORD,
And the excellency of our God.
3 Strengthen ye the weak hands,
And confirm the feeble knees.
4 Say to them that are of a fearful heart,
Be strong, fear not:
Behold, your God will come with vengeance,
Even God with a recompence;
He will come and save you.

In these verses we have,

First. The desert land blooming. In the chapter before we had a populous and fruitful country turned into a horrid wilderness; here we have, in lieu of that, a wilderness turned into a good land. When the land of Judah was freed from the Assyrian army, those parts of the country that had been made as a wilderness by the ravages and outrages they committed, began to recover themselves, and to look pleasantly again, and to "blossom as the rose." When the Gentile nations, that had been long as a wilderness bringing forth no fruit to God, received the Gospel, joy came with it to them, Ps. lxvii. 3, 4; xcvi. 11, 12. When Christ was preached in Samaria, there was "great joy in that city," Acts viii. 8; they that sat in darkness saw a great and joyful light; and then they blossomed, that is, gave hopes of abundance of fruit; for that was it which the preachers of the Gospel aimed at, Jno. xv. 16; to "go and bring forth fruit," Rom. i. 13; Col. i. 6. Though blossoms are not fruit, and often miscarry and come to nothing, yet they are in order to fruit. Converting grace makes the soul, that was as a wilderness, to rejoice "with joy and singing," and to "blossom abundantly." This flourishing desert shall have all "the glory of Lebanon given to it," which consisted in the strength and stateliness of its cedars, together with "the excellency of Carmel and Sharon," which consisted in corn and cattle. Whatever is valuable in any institution is brought into the Gospel. All the beauty of the Jewish church was admitted into the Christian church, and appeared in its perfection, as the apostle shews at large in his epistle to the Hebrews, that whatever was excellent and desirable in the Mosaic economy is translated into the evangelical institutes.

Secondly. The glory of God shining forth. "They shall see the glory of the Lord," that is, God will manifest himself more than ever in his grace and love to mankind, (for that is his glory and excellency,) and he shall give them eyes to see it, and hearts to be duly affected with it. This is that which will make the desert blossom. The more we see by faith of the "glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God," the more joyful and the more fruitful shall we be.

Thirdly. The feeble and faint-hearted encouraged, ver. 3, 4. God's prophets and ministers are in a special manner charged by virtue of their office to strengthen the weak hands, that is, to comfort those who could not yet recover the mighty fright they had been put into by the Assyrian army, with an assurance that God would now return in mercy to them. This is the design of the Gospel, 1. To strengthen those that are weak, and to confirm them; the weak hands that are unable either to work or fight, and can hardly be lifted up in prayer; and the feeble knees that are unable either to stand or walk, and unfit for the race set before us. The Gospel furnishes us with strengthening considerations, and shews us where strength is laid up for us. Among true Christians there are many that have weak hands and feeble knees, that are yet but babes in Christ; but it is our duty to strengthen our brethren, Lu. xxii. 32; not only to bear with the infirm, but to do what we can to confirm them, Rom. xv. 1; 1 Thes. v. 14. It is our duty also to strengthen ourselves, to "lift up the hands which hang down," Heb. xii. 12; improving the strength God has given us, and exerting it. 2. To hearten those that are timorous and discouraged; "Say to them that are of a fearful heart," because of their own weakness, and the strength of their enemies, that are hasty, (so the word is,) that are for betaking themselves to flight upon the first alarm, and jecture, and are probably hyænas and jackals. For "satyrs" we may understand wild goats. The older translators were little acquainted with the zoology of Bible lands, and consequently sometimes fell into mistakes.

xxxv. 1. The words "for them" might be omitted from the translation. Instead of "rose" Dr. Tristram prefers "narcissus."

xxxv. 2. The language here is in contrast with that in chap. xxxiii. 9, where the effects of invasion are signified. For the first clause the Greek has, "The desert of Jordan shall blossom and rejoice;" but this seems to be erroneous, as no other version or copies favour it. Between this verse and the next the Syriac and Arabic versions have editorial notes, as we may call them. The Syriac is, "End of the first part. Exhortation and consolation for the feeble that the Redeemer will come and redeem them." These words appear even in Dr. Lee's edition for the Bible Society. Those in the Arabic are partly similar: "Exhortation of the prophet to the giving up the cause; that say in their haste, they are cut off and undone, Ps. xxxi. 22. There is enough in the Gospel to silence these fears; it saith to them, and let them say it to themselves, and one to another, "Be strong, fear not." Fear is weakening, the more we strive against it, the stronger we are both for doing and suffering; and, for our encouragement to strive, he that saith to us, "Be strong," hath laid help for us upon one that is mighty.

Fourthly. Assurance given of the approach of a Saviour; "Your God will come with vengeance." God will appear for you against your enemies, will recompense both their injuries and your losses. The Messiah will come in the fulness of time, to take vengeance on the powers of darkness, to spoil them, and make a show of them openly, to recompense those that mourn in Zion with abundant comforts; he will come and save us. With the hopes of this the Old Testament saints strengthened their weak hands. He will come again at the end of time, will come in flaming fire, to recompense tribulation to them that have troubled his people, and to those who were troubled, rest; such a rest as will be not only a final period, but a full reward of all their troubles, 2 Thes. i. 6, 7. They whose hearts tremble for the ark of God, and are under a concern for his church in the world, may silence their fears with this, God will take the work into his own hands. Your God will come, who pleads your cause, and owns your interest, even God himself, who is God alone.

5 Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened,
And the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped.
6 Then shall the lame man leap as an hart,
And the tongue of the dumb sing:
For in the wilderness shall waters break out,
And streams in the desert.
7 And the parched ground shall become a pool,
And the thirsty land springs of water:
In the habitation of dragons, where each lay,
Shall be grass with reeds and rushes.
8 And an highway shall be there, and a way,
And it shall be called The way of holiness;
The unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those:
The wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein.
9 No lion shall be there,
Nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon,
It shall not be found there;
But the redeemed shall walk there:
10 And the ransomed of the LORD shall return,
And come to Zion with songs
And everlasting joy upon their heads:
They shall obtain joy and gladness,
And sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

Then, when your God shall come, even Christ, to set up his kingdom in the world, to which all the prophets bare witness, especially towards the conclusion of their prophecies of the temporal deliverances of the church, and this evangelical prophet especially; then look for great things.

First. Wonders shall be wrought in the kingdoms both of nature and grace; wonders of mercy wrought upon the children of men, sufficient to evince that it is no less than a God that comes to us. 1. Wonders shall be wrought on men's bodies; ver. 5, 6, "The eyes of the blind shall be opened." This was often done by our Lord Jesus, when he was here upon earth, with a word's speaking; and one he gave sight to that was born blind, Mat. ix. 27; xii. 22; xx. 30; Jno. ix. 6. By his power the ears of the deaf also were unstopped; with one word, Ephphatha, were opened, Mar. vii. 32. Many that were lame had the use of their limbs restored, so perfectly that they could not only go, but leap, and with so much joy to them that they could not forbear leaping for joy, as that impotent man, Acts iii. 8. The dumb also were enabled to speak, and then no marvel they were disposed to sing for joy, Mat. ix. 32, 33. These miracles Christ wrought to prove that he was sent of God, Jno. iii. 2; nay, working them by his own power, and in his own name, he proved that he was God, the same who at first made man's mouth, the hearing ear, and the seeing eye. When he would prove his Divine mission to John's disciples, he did it by miracles of this kind, in which this scripture was fulfilled. 2. Wonders, great wonders, shall be wrought on men's souls. By the word and Spirit of Christ those that were spiritually blind were enlightened, Acts xxvi. 18, those that were deaf to the calls of God were made to hear them readily, as Lydia, whose heart the Lord opened so that she attended, Acts xvi. 14. Those that were impotent to every thing that is good, by Divine grace are made not only able for it, but active in it, and run the way of God's commandments. Those also that were dumb, and knew not how to speak of God, or to God, having their understandings opened to know him, shall thereby have their lips opened to shew forth his praise. The tongue of the dumb shall sing for joy, the joy of God's salvation. Praise shall be perfected out of the mouths of babes and sucklings.

Secondly. The Spirit shall be poured out from on high. There shall be waters and streams, rivers of living water, which, when our Saviour spake of, as the fulfilling of the Scripture, and most probably of this scripture, the evangelist tells us he spake of the Spirit, Jno. vii. 38, 39, as doth also this prophet, ch. xxxii. 15. So here, ver. 6, "In the wilderness," where one would least expect it, "shall waters break out." This was fulfilled when the Holy Ghost fell upon the Gentiles that heard the word, Acts x. 44; then were the fountains of life opened, whence streams flowed that watered the earth abundantly. These waters are said to break out; which notes a pleasing surprise to the Gentile world, such as brought them, as it were, into a new world. The blessed effect of this shall be, that "the parched ground shall become a pool," ver. 7. They that laboured and were heavy laden under the burthen of guilt, and were scorched with the sense of Divine wrath, found rest and refreshment and abundant comforts in the Gospel. In the thirsty land, where no water was, no ordinances, Ps. lxiii. 1, there shall be springs of water, a gospel ministry, and by that the administration of all gospel ordinances in their purity and plenty, which are the river that makes glad the city of our God, Ps. xlvi. 4. "In the habitation of dragons," who choose to dwell in the parched, scorched ground, ch. xxxiv. 9, 13, these waters shall flow and dispossess them, so that "where each lay shall be grass with reeds and rushes," great plenty of useful products. Thus it was when Christian churches were planted and flourished greatly in the cities of the Gentiles, that for many ages had been habitations of dragons, or devils rather, as Babylon, Rev. xviii. 2. When the property of the idols' temples was altered, and they were converted to the service of Christianity, then the habitations of dragons became fruitful fields.

Thirdly. The way of religion and godliness shall be laid open. It is here called the way of holiness, ver. 8, the way both of holy worship and a holy conversation. Holiness is the rectitude of the human nature and will in conformity to the Divine nature and will. The way of holiness is that course of religious duties in which men ought to walk and press forwards with an eye to the glory of God, and their own felicity in the enjoyment of him. When our God shall come to save us he shall chalk out to us this way by his Gospel so as it had never been before described.

1. It shall be an appointed way; not a way of sufferance, but a highway, and a way into which we are directed by a Divine authority, and in which we are protected by a Divine warrant. It is the King's highway, the King of kings' highway, in which, though we may be waylaid, we cannot be stopped. The way of holiness is the way of God's commandments, it is (as highways use to be) the good old way, Jer. vi. 16.

2. It shall be an appropriated way, the way in which God will bring his own chosen to himself; but "the unclean shall not pass over it," either to defile it, or to disturb those that walk in it. It is a way by itself, distinguished from the way of the world, for it is a way of separation from, and nonconformity to, this world. "It shall be for those" whom the Lord hath set apart for himself, Ps. iv. 3, shall be reserved for them; "the redeemed shall walk there," and the satisfaction they take in these ways of pleasantness shall be out of the reach of molestation from an evil world. "The unclean shall not pass over it," for it shall be a fair way; those that walk in it are the undefiled in the way, who escape the pollution that is in the world.

3. It shall be a straight way: "The wayfaring men," who choose to travel it, "though fools," of weak capacity in other things, yet shall have such plain directions from the word and Spirit of God in this way, that they "shall not err therein;" not that they shall be infallible, no, not in their own conduct, or that they shall in nothing mistake; but they shall not be guilty of any fatal miscarriage, shall not so miss their way but they shall recover it again, and get well to their journey's end. They that are in the narrow way, though some may fall into one path and others into another, not all equally right, but all meeting at last in the same end, yet they shall never fall into the broad way again; the Spirit of truth shall lead them into all truth that is necessary for them. Note, The way to heaven is a plain way, and easy to hit. "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world," and made them wise to salvation. "Knowledge is easy to him that understandeth."

4. It shall be a safe way: "No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast," ver. 9; none to hurt or destroy. They that keep close to this way keep out of the reach of Satan, the roaring lion; "that wicked one toucheth them not." They that walk in the way of holiness may proceed with a holy security and serenity of mind, knowing that nothing can do them any real hurt; they shall be "quiet from the fear of evil." It was in Hezekiah's days, some time after the captivity of the ten tribes, that God, being displeased with the colonies that settled there, sent lions among them, 2 Kin. xvii. 25. But Judah keeps her integrity, and therefore no lion shall be there. Those that walk in the way of holiness must separate themselves from the unclean and the ravenous, must save themselves from an untoward generation; and, hoping that they themselves are of the redeemed, let them walk with the redeemed which shall walk there.

Fourthly. The end of this way shall be everlasting joy, ver. 10. This precious promise of peace now will end shortly in endless joys and rest for the soul. Here is good news for the citizens of Zion, rest to the weary; "the ransomed of the Lord," who therefore ought to follow him wherever he goes, Rev. xiv. 4, "shall return and come to Zion," 1. To serve and worship God in the church militant. They shall deliver themselves out of Babylon, Zec. ii. 7; "shall ask the way to Zion," Jer. l. 5; and shall find the way, ch. lii. 12. God will open them a door of escape out of their captivity, and it shall be an effectual door, though there be many adversaries. They shall join themselves to the gospel church, that mount Zion, that city of the living God, Heb. xii. 22. They shall come with songs of joy and praise for their deliverance out of Babylon, where they wept upon every remembrance of Zion, Ps. cxxxvii. 1. They that by faith are made citizens of the gospel Zion, may go on their way rejoicing, Acts viii. 39; they shall sing in the ways of the Lord, and be still praising him; they rejoice in Christ Jesus, and the sorrows and sighs of their convictions are made to flee away by the power of Divine consolations. They that mourn are blessed; for they shall be comforted. 2. To see and enjoy God in the church triumphant. They that walk in the way of holiness, under the conduct of their Redeemer, shall come to Zion at last, to the heavenly Zion, shall come in a body, shall all be presented together faultless at the coming of Christ's glory with exceeding joy, Jude 24, Rev. vii. 17; they shall come with songs. When God's people returned out of Babylon to Zion, they came weeping, Jer. l. 4; but they shall come to heaven singing a new song, which no man can learn, Rev. xiv. 3. When they shall enter into the joy of their Lord it shall be what the joys of this world never could be,—everlasting joy, without mixture, interruption, or period; it shall not only fill their hearts to their own perfect and perpetual satisfaction, but it shall be upon their heads, as an ornament of grace and crown of glory, as a garland worn in token of victory. Their joy shall be visible, and no longer a secret thing, as it is here in this world; it shall be proclaimed to the glory of God, and their mutual encouragement. They shall then obtain that joy and gladness which they could never expect on this side heaven; "and sorrow and sighing shall flee away" for ever, as the shadows of the night before the rising sun. Thus these prophecies, which relate to the Assyrian invasion, conclude, for the support of the people of God under that calamity, and to direct their joy in their deliverance from it to something higher. Our joyful hopes and prospects of eternal life should swallow up both all the sorrows and all the joys of the present time.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

The prophet Isaiah is, in this and the three following chapters, an historian; for the Scripture history, as well as the Scripture prophecy, is given by inspiration of God, and was dictated to holy men. Many of the prophecies of the foregoing chapters had their accomplishment in Sennacherib's invading Judah, and besieging Jerusalem, and the miraculous defeat he met with there; and therefore the story of this is here inserted, both for the explication and confirmation of the prophecy. The key of prophecy is to be found in history; and here, that we might have the readier entrance, it is as it were hung at the door. And the exact fulfilling of this prophecy might serve to confirm the faith of God's people in the other prophecies, the accomplishment of which was at a greater distance. Whether this story was taken from the book of the Kings, and added here, or whether it was first written by Isaiah here, and from hence taken into the book of Kings, is not material; but the story is the same almost verbatim; and it was so feeble, and encouragement of them, and prediction of the coming of the Messiah." Of course these notes are of no critical authority, but they are interesting records of Oriental views as to the division and meaning of the text. The Syriac renders the next two verses thus: "Let the hands which hang down be strengthened, and the knees which tremble be confirmed; say to the fearful of heart, Be strong, and fear not; behold, your God the Vindicator cometh; God the Redeemer cometh, and shall redeem you."

xxxv. 4. For "fearful" the Hebrew is "hasty;" but it is well known that the ideas of fear and haste were associated in the Jewish mind, as in the expression, "He that believeth shall not make haste"—i.e., shall not be in a state of trepidation and alarm.

xxxv. 7. For "parched ground" we must translate "mirage," the well-known fictitious appearance of water in hot countries. "Dragons"—i.e., reptiles.

xxxv. 8. The words, "But it shall be for those: the wayfaring men memorable an event, that it was well worthy to be twice recorded, 2 Kin. xviii. and xix., and here; and an abridgment of it likewise, 2 Chr. xxxii. We shall be but short in our observations upon this story here, having largely explained it there. In this chapter we have, I. The descent which the king of Assyria made upon Judah, and his success against all the defenced cities, ver. 1. II. The conference he desired to have with Hezekiah, and the managers on both sides, ver. 2, 3. III. Rabshakeh's railing, blasphemous speech with which he designed to frighten Hezekiah into a submission, and persuade him to surrender at discretion, ver. 4—10. IV. His appeal to the people, and his attempt to persuade them to desert Hezekiah, and so force him to surrender, ver. 11—20. V. The report of this made to Hezekiah by his agent, ver. 21, 22.

NOW it came to pass in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah, that Sennacherib king of Assyria came up against all the defenced cities of Judah, and took them. 2 And the king of Assyria sent Rabshakeh from Lachish to Jerusalem unto king Hezekiah with a great army. And he stood by the conduit of the upper pool in the highway of the fuller's field. 3 Then came forth unto him Eliakim, Hilkiah's son, which was over the house, and Shebna the scribe, and Joah, Asaph's son, the recorder. 4 And Rabshakeh said unto them, Say ye now to Hezekiah, Thus saith the great king, the king of Assyria, What confidence is this wherein thou trustest? 5 I say, sayest thou, (but they are but vain words) I have counsel and strength for war: now on whom dost thou trust, that thou rebellest against me? 6 Lo, thou trustest in the staff of this broken reed, on Egypt; whereon if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it: so is Pharaoh king of Egypt to all that trust in him. 7 But if thou say to me, We trust in the LORD our God: is it not he, whose high places and whose altars Hezekiah hath taken away, and said to Judah and to Jerusalem, Ye shall worship before this altar? 8 Now therefore give pledges, I pray thee, to my master the king of Assyria, and I will give thee two thousand horses, if thou be able on thy part to set riders upon them. 9 How then wilt thou turn away the face of one captain of the least of my master's servants, and put thy trust on Egypt for chariots and for horsemen? 10 And am I now come up without the LORD against this land to destroy it? the LORD said unto me, Go up against this land and destroy it.

First. That a people may be in the way of their duty, and yet meet with trouble and distress. Hezekiah was reforming, and his people in some measure reformed; and yet their country is at that time invaded, and a great part of it laid waste. Perhaps they began to grow remiss, and cool in the work of reformation, were doing it by the halves, and ready to sit down short of a thorough reformation; and then God visited them with this judgment, to put life into them and that good cause. We must not wonder if, when we are doing well, God sends afflictions to quicken us to do better, to do our best, and to press towards perfection.

Secondly. That we must never be secure of the continuance of our peace in this world, nor think our mountain stands so strong as that it cannot be moved. Hezekiah was not only a pious king, but prudent, both in his administration at home and his treaties abroad. His affairs were in a good posture, and he seemed particularly to be upon good terms with the king of Assyria; for he had lately made his peace with him by a rich present, 2 Kin. xviii. 14, and yet that perfidious prince pours an army into his country all of a sudden, and lays it waste. It is good for us, therefore, always to keep up an expectation of trouble, that, when it comes, it may be no surprise to us, and then it will be the less a terror.

Thirdly. That God sometimes permits the enemies of his people, even those that are most impious and treacherous, to prevail far against them. The king of Assyria took all, or most, of the defenced cities of Judah, and then the country would, of course, be an easy prey to him. Wickedness may prosper a while, but cannot prosper always.

Fourthly. Proud men love to talk big, to boast of what they are and have, and have done; nay, of what they will do, to insult over others, and set all mankind at defiance; though thereby they render themselves ridiculous to all wise men, and obnoxious to the wrath of that God who resisteth the proud. But thus they think to make themselves feared, though they make themselves hated, and to carry their point by great swelling words of vanity, Jude 16.

Fifthly. The enemies of God's people endeavour to conquer them by frightening them, especially by frightening them from their confidence in God. Thus Rabshakeh here, with noise and banter, runs down Hezekiah as utterly unable to cope with his master, or in the least to make head against him. It concerns us, therefore, that we may keep our ground against the enemies of our souls, to keep up our spirits by keeping up our hope in God.

Sixthly. It is acknowledged on all hands, that those who forsake God's service forfeit his protection. If it had been true, which Rabshakeh alleged, that Hezekiah had thrown down God's altars, he might justly infer that he could not with any assurance trust in him for succour and relief, ver. 7. We may say thus to presuming sinners, who say they trust in the Lord and in his mercy, Is not this he whose commandments they have lived in the contempt of, whose name they have dishonoured, and whose ordinances they have slighted? How then can we expect to find favour with him?

Seventhly. It is an easy thing, and very common, for those that persecute the church and people of God, to pretend a commission from him for so doing. Rabshakeh could say, "Am I now come up without the Lord?" when really he was come up against the Lord, ch. xxxvii. 28. They that kill the servants of the Lord think they do him service, and say, "Let the Lord be glorified." But, sooner or later, they will be made to know their error to their cost, to their confusion.

11 Then said Eliakim and Shebna and Joah unto Rabshakeh, Speak I pray thee, unto thy servants in the Syrian language; for we understand it: and speak not to us in the Jews' language, in the ears of the people that are on the wall. 12 But Rabshakeh said, Hath my master sent me to thy master and to thee to speak these words? hath he not sent me to the men that sit upon the wall, that they may eat their own dung, and drink their own piss with you? 13 Then Rabshakeh stood, and cried with a loud voice in the Jews' language, and said, Hear ye the words of the great king, the king of Assyria. 14 Thus saith the king, Let not Hezekiah deceive you: for he shall not be able to deliver you. 15 Neither let Hezekiah make you trust in the LORD, saying, The LORD will surely deliver us: this city shall not be delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria. 16 Hearken not to Hezekiah: for thus saith the king of Assyria, Make an agreement with me by a present, and come out to me: and eat ye every one of his vine, and every one of his fig tree, and drink ye every one the waters of his own cistern; 17 Until I come and take you away to a land like your own land, a land of corn and wine, a land of bread and vineyards. 18 Beware lest Hezekiah persuade you, saying, The LORD will deliver us. Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria? 19 Where are the gods of Hamath and Arphad? where are the gods of Sepharvaim? and have they delivered Samaria out of my hand? 20 Who are they among all the gods of these lands, that have delivered their land out of my hand, that the LORD should deliver Jerusalem out of my hand? 21 But they held their peace, and answered him not a word: for the king's commandment was, saying, Answer him not. 22 Then came Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, that was over the household, and Shebna the scribe, and Joah, the son of Asaph, the recorder, to Hezekiah with their clothes rent, and told him the words of Rabshakeh.

We may hence learn these lessons:

First. That while princes and counsellors have public matters under debate, it is not fair to appeal to the people. It was a reasonable motion which Hezekiah's plenipotentiaries made, that this parley should be held in a language which the people did not understand, ver. 11, because reasons of state are secret things, and ought to be kept secret, the vulgar being incompetent judges of them. It is therefore an unfair practice, and not doing as men would be done by, to incense subjects against their rulers by base insinuations.

Secondly. Proud and haughty scorners, the fairer they are spoken to, commonly the fouler they speak. Nothing could be said more mildly and respectfully than that which Hezekiah's agents said to Rabshakeh. Besides that the thing itself was just which they desired, they called themselves his servants, they petitioned for it, "Speak, we pray thee," but this made him the more spiteful though fools," &c., are differently understood by Lowth, Barnes, Ewald, &c., thus: "But He himself shall be with them, walking in the way, and the foolish shall not err therein." Other critics defend the ordinary translation, as more in harmony with the text as it stands in the Hebrew. Such is the opinion of Gesenius, Delitzsch, and Alexander. The sense commonly assigned to the words on this view is that set forth by Mr. Henry. The Targum seems to avoid the real difficulty: "The unclean shall not pass over it, and they shall not fail during (or as long as) the way, and the untaught shall not go astray." The Greek is, "And the unclean shall not pass by there, nor shall there be there an unclean way, and the scattered shall go thereon, and shall not wander." The Vulgate is, "The unclean shall not pass thereby, and it shall be unto you a straight way, so that fools may not err therein." The Syriac is, "And uncleanness shall not pass over it, nor shall there be a way (for it) therein, and the foolish shall not wander therein," or "shall not go astray."

and imperious. To give rough answers to those who give us soft answers is one way of rendering evil for good; and those are wicked indeed, and it is to be feared incurably, with whom that which useth to turn away wrath doth but make ill worse.

Thirdly. When Satan would tempt men from trusting in God and cleaving to him, he doth it by insinuating that in yielding to him they may better their condition; but it is a false suggestion, and grossly absurd, and therefore to be rejected with the utmost abhorrence. When the world and the flesh say to us, Make an agreement with us, and come out to us, submit to our dominion, and come into our interests, and you shall eat every one of his own vine, they do but deceive us, promising liberty then when they would lead us into the basest captivity and slavery. One might as good take Rabshakeh's word as theirs for kind usage and fair quarter; therefore, when they speak fair, believe them not. Let them say what they will, there is no land like the land of promise, the holy land.

Fourthly. Nothing can be more absurd in itself, nor a greater affront to the true and living God, than to compare him with the gods of the heathen; as if he could do no more for the protection of his worshippers than they can for the protection of theirs; and as if the God of Israel could as easily be mastered as the gods of Hamath and Arphad. Whereas they are vanity and a lie; they are nothing; he is the great I AM. They are the creatures of men's fancy, and the works of men's hands; he is the Creator of all things.

Fifthly. Presumptuous sinners are ready to think that, because they have been too hard for their fellow-creatures, they are therefore a match for their Creator. This and the other nation they have subdued, and therefore the Lord himself shall not deliver Jerusalem out of their hand. But though the potsherds may strive with the potsherds of the earth, let them not strive with the potter.

Sixthly. It is sometimes prudence not to answer a fool according to his folly. Hezekiah's command was, "Answer him not;" it will but provoke him to rail and blaspheme yet more and more; leave it to God to stop his mouth, for you cannot. They had reason enough on their side, but it would be hard to speak it to such an unreasonable adversary without a mixture of passion; and if they should fall to rail like him, Rabshakeh would be quite too hard for them at that weapon.

Seventhly. It becomes the people of God to lay to heart the dishonour done to God by the blasphemies of wicked men, though they do not think it prudent to reply to those blasphemies. Though they answered him not a word, yet they rent their clothes in a holy zeal for the glory of God's name, and a holy indignation at the contempt put upon it. They tore their garments when they heard blasphemy, as taking no pleasure in their own ornaments when God's honour suffered.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

In this chapter we have a farther repetition of the story which we had before in the book of Kings, concerning Sennacherib. In the chapter before we had him conquering, and threatening to conquer; in this chapter we have him falling, and at last fallen, in answer to prayer, and in performance of many of the prophecies which we have met with in the foregoing chapters. Here we have, I. Hezekiah's pious resentment of Rabshakeh's impious discourse, ver. 1. II. The gracious message he sent to Isaiah to desire his prayers, ver. 2—5. III. The encouraging answer which Isaiah sent him from God, assuring him that God would plead his cause against the king of Assyria, ver. 6, 7. IV. An abusive letter which the king of Assyria sent to Hezekiah to the same purpose with Rabshakeh's speech, ver. 8—13. V. Hezekiah's humble prayer to God upon the receipt of this letter, ver. 14—20. VI. The farther full answer which God sent him by Isaiah, promising him that his affairs should shortly take a happy turn, that the storm should blow over, and every thing should appear bright and serene, ver. 21—35. VII. The immediate accomplishment of this prophecy, in the ruin of his army, ver. 36, and the murder of himself, ver. 37, 38. All which was largely opened, 2 Kin. xviii.

AND it came to pass, when king Hezekiah heard it, that he rent his clothes, and covered himself with sackcloth, and went into the house of the LORD. 2 And he sent Eliakim, who was over the household, and Shebna the scribe, and the elders of the priests covered with sackcloth, unto Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz. 3 And they said unto him, Thus saith Hezekiah, This day is a day of trouble, and of rebuke, and of blasphemy: for the children are come to the birth, and there is not strength to bring forth. 4 It may be the LORD thy God will hear the words of Rabshakeh, whom the king of Assyria his master hath sent to reproach the living God, and will reprove the words which the LORD thy God hath heard: wherefore lift up thy prayer for the remnant that is left. 5 So the servants of king Hezekiah came to Isaiah. 6 And Isaiah said unto them, Thus shall ye say unto your master, Thus saith the LORD, Be not afraid of the words that thou hast heard, wherewith the servants of the king of Assyria have blasphemed me. 7 Behold, I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a rumour, and return to his own land; and I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land.

We may observe here,

First. That the best way to baffle the malicious designs of our enemies against us is to be driven by them to God and to our duty, and so to fetch meat out of the eater. Rabshakeh intended to frighten Hezekiah from the Lord, but it proves that he frightens him to the Lord. The wind, instead of forcing the traveller's coat from him, makes him wrap it closer about him The more Rabshakeh reproacheth God, the more Hezekiah studies to honour him, by rending his clothes for the dishonour done to him, and attending in his sanctuary to know his mind.

Secondly. That it well becomes great men to desire the prayers of good men and good ministers. Hezekiah sent messengers and honourable ones, those of the first rank, to Isaiah, to desire his prayers, remembering how much his prophecies of late had plainly looked towards the events of the present day, in dependence upon which it is probable he doubted not but that the issue would be comfortable, yet he would have it to be so in answer to prayer; this is a day of trouble, therefore let it be a day of prayer.

Thirdly. When we are most at a plunge we should be most earnest in prayer. Now "the children are brought to the birth, but there is not strength to bring forth;" now let prayer come and help at a dead lift. When we meet with the greatest difficulties, then is a time to stir up not ourselves only but others also, to take hold on God. Prayer is the midwife of mercy, that helps to bring it forth.

Fourthly. It is an encouragement to pray, though we have but some hopes of mercy; ver. 4, "It may be the Lord thy God will hear; who knows but he will return and repent?" That "it may be" of the prospect of the haven of blessings should quicken us with double diligence to ply the oar of prayer.

Fifthly. When there is a remnant left, and but a remnant, it concerns us to lift up a prayer for that remnant, ver. 4. The prayer that reacheth heaven must be lifted up by a strong faith, earnest desires, a direct intention to the glory of God; all which should be quickened when we are come to the last stake.

Sixthly. Those that have made God their enemy we have no reason to be afraid of, for they are marked for ruin; and though they may hiss they cannot hurt. Rabshakeh hath blasphemed God, and therefore let not Hezekiah be afraid of him, ver. 6. He has made God a party to the cause by his invectives, and therefore judgment will certainly be given against him; God will plead his own cause.

Seventhly. Sinners' fears are but prefaces to their falls. He shall hear the rumour of the slaughter of his army, which shall oblige him to retire to his own land, and there he shall be slain, ver. 7. The terrors that pursue him shall bring him at last to the king of terrors, Job xviii. 11, 14. The curses that come upon sinners shall overtake them.

8 So Rabshakeh returned, and found the king of Assyria warring against Libnah: for he had heard that he was departed from Lachish. 9 And he heard say concerning Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, He is come forth to make war with thee. And when he heard it, he sent messengers to Hezekiah, saying, 10 Thus shall ye speak to Hezekiah king of Judah, saying, Let not thy God, in whom thou trustest, deceive thee, saying, Jerusalem shall not be given into the hand of the king of Assyria. 11 Behold, thou hast heard what the kings of Assyria have done to all lands by destroying them utterly; and shalt thou be delivered? 12 Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed, as Gozan, and Haran, and Rezeph, and the children xxxv. 10. The Greek translators connect this verse with the ninth: "But the redeemed shall go therein, and those who are collected by the Lord, and they shall return and come to Zion with gladness, and eternal gladness upon their head; for on their head shall be praise and rejoicing, and gladness shall take hold of them: pain, and grief, and groaning has fled away." There is no need to alter our version.

xxxvi 1. We have here the commencement of four chapters which may be called wholly historical. Chronological and historical indications occur elsewhere in the book of Isaiah, but this is the only consecutive record of events. It appears in all copies and versions, and is found, with minor variations, in 2 Kings xvii.—xx. A shorter narrative of the leading incidents is inserted in 2 Chron. xxxii. Three theories especially have been proposed to account for the repetition:—1, That the compiler of 2 Kings copied from Isaiah; 2, that Isaiah copied from some one; and 3, that the chapters are an of Eden which were in Telassar? 13 Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arphad, and the king of the city of Sepharvaim, Hena, and Ivah? 14 And Hezekiah received the letter from the hand of the messengers, and read it: and Hezekiah went up unto the house of the LORD, and spread it before the LORD. 15 And Hezekiah prayed unto the LORD, saying, 16 O LORD of hosts, God of Israel, that dwellest between the cherubims, thou art the God, even thou alone, of all the kingdoms of the earth: thou hast made heaven and earth. 17 Incline thine ear, O LORD, and hear; open thine eyes, O LORD, and see: and hear all the words of Sennacherib, which hath sent to reproach the living God. 18 Of a truth, LORD, the kings of Assyria have laid waste all the nations, and their countries, 19 And have cast their gods into the fire: for they were no gods, but the work of men's hands, wood and stone: therefore they have destroyed them. 20 Now therefore, O LORD our God, save us from his hand, that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that thou art the LORD, even thou only.

We may observe here,

First. That if God gives us an inward satisfaction in his promise, that may confirm us in our silent bearing of reproaches. God answered Hezekiah, but it doth not appear that he, after deliberation, sent any answer to Rabshakeh; but God, having taken the work into his own hands, he quietly left the matter with him. So Rabshakeh returned to the king, his master, for fresh instructions.

Secondly. Those that delight in war shall have enough of it. Sennacherib, without provocation given to him, or warning given by him, went forth to war against Judah; and now, with as great surprise, the king of Ethiopia goes forth to war against him, ver. 9. They that are quarrelsome may expect to be quarrelled with, and God sometimes checks the rage of his enemies by giving it a powerful diversion.

Thirdly. It is bad to talk proudly and profanely, but it is worse to write so, for that argues more deliberation and design; and what is written spreads farther, and lasts longer, and doth the more mischief. Atheism and irreligion written will certainly be reckoned for another day.

Fourthly. Great successes often harden sinners' hearts in their sinful ways, and make them the more daring. Because the kings of Assyria have destroyed all lands,—though, in fact, they were but a few that fell within their reach,—therefore they doubt not but to destroy God's lands. Because the gods of the nations were unable to help, they conclude the God of Israel is so; because the idolatrous kings of Hamath and Arphad became an easy prey to them, therefore the religious, reforming king of Judah must needs be so too. Thus is this proud man ripened for ruin by the sunshine of prosperity.

Fifthly. Liberty of access to the throne of grace, and liberty of speech there, is the unspeakable privilege of the Lord's people at all times, especially in times of distress and danger. Hezekiah took Sennacherib's letter, "and spread it before the Lord," not designing to make any other complaints against him but what were grounded upon his own handwriting. Let the thing speak itself; here it is in black and white, "Open thine eyes, O Lord, and see." God allows his praying people to be humbly free with him, to utter all their words, as Jephthah did, before him, to spread the letter, whether of a friend or an enemy, before him, and leave the contents, the concern of it, with him.

Sixthly. The great and fundamental principles of our religion applied by faith, and improved in prayer, will be of sovereign use to us in our particular exigencies and distresses, whatever they are; to them, therefore, we must have recourse, and abide by them. So Hezekiah did here; he encouraged himself with this, that the God of Israel is the Lord of hosts, of the hosts of Israel, to animate them; of the hosts of their enemies, to dispirit and restrain them; that he is God alone, and there is none that can stand in competition with him; that he is the God of all the kingdoms of the earth, and disposeth of them all as he pleaseth, for he made heaven and earth, and therefore both can do any thing and doth every thing.

Seventhly. When we are afraid of men that are great destroyers, we may with humble boldness appeal to God as the great Saviour. They have indeed destroyed the nations who had thrown themselves out of the protection of the true God by worshipping false gods; but the Lord, the God alone, is our God, our king, our lawgiver, and he will save us who is the Saviour of them that believe.

Eighthly. We have enough to take hold of in our wrestling with God by prayer if we can but plead that his glory is interested in our case, that his name will be profaned if we are run down, and glorified if we are relieved. Thence, therefore, will our most prevailing pleas be drawn; Do it for thy glory's sake.

21 Then Isaiah the son of Amoz sent unto Hezekiah, saying, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, Whereas thou hast prayed to me against Sennacherib king of Assyria: 22 This is the word which the LORD hath spoken concerning him;

The virgin, the daughter of Zion, hath despised thee,
And laughed thee to scorn;
The daughter of Jerusalem hath shaken her head at thee.
23 Whom hast thou reproached and blasphemed?
And against whom hast thou exalted thy voice,
And lifted up thine eyes on high?
Even against the Holy One of Israel. [said,
24 By thy servants hast thou reproached the Lord, and hast
By the multitude of my chariots am I come up
To the height of the mountains, to the sides of Lebanon;
And I will cut down the tall cedars thereof, and the choice fir trees thereof:
And I will enter into the height of his border, and the forest of his Carmel 25 I have digged, and drunk water;
And with the sole of my feet have I dried up all the rivers of the besieged places.
26 Hast thou not heard long ago, how I have done it;
And of ancient times, that I have formed it?
Now have I brought it to pass,
That thou shouldest be to lay waste defenced cities into ruinous heaps.
27 Therefore their inhabitants were of small power,
They were dismayed and confounded:
They were as the grass of the field, and as the green herb,
As the grass on the housetops,
And as corn blasted before it be grown up. [in,
28 But I know thy abode, and thy going out, and thy coming
And thy rage against me.
29 Because thy rage against me, and thy tumult, is come up into mine ears,
Therefore will I put my hook in thy nose,
And my bridle in thy lips, [camest.
And I will turn thee back by the way by which thou 30 And this shall be a sign unto thee,
Ye shall eat this year such as groweth of itself;
And the second year that which springeth of the same:
And in the third year sow ye, and reap,
And plant vineyards, and eat the fruit thereof.
31 And the remnant that is escaped of the house of Judah
Shall again take root downward,
And bear fruit upward:
32 For out of Jerusalem shall go forth a remnant,
And they that escape out of mount Zion:
The zeal of the LORD of hosts shall do this. [Assyria, 33 Therefore thus saith the LORD concerning the king of
He shall not come into this city,
Nor shoot an arrow there,
Nor come before it with shields,
Nor cast a bank against it.
34 By the way that he came, by the same shall he return,
And shall not come into this city, saith the LORD.
35 For I will defend this city to save it
For mine own sake, and for my servant David's sake.

36 Then the angel of the LORD went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and fourscore and five thousand: and when they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses. 37 So Sennacherib king of Assyria departed, and went and returned, and dwelt at Nineveh. 38 And it came to pass, as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his god, that Adrammelech and Sharezer his sons smote him with the sword; and addition to Isaiah by Ezra or somebody else. The common and preferable opinion is that Isaiah wrote them, and that the compiler of 2 Kings copied them from him. In support of this view, it is observed that Isaiah did write history (2 Chron. xxvi. 22; xxxii. 32); that Isaiah was much concerned in the events; and that the record contains and illustrates some of his prophecies. On the other hand, the variations in 2 Kings xviii., &c., show that the compiler of Kings introduced such modifications as he thought desirable.

xxxvii. 24. For "the forest of his Carmel" the margin has "his fruitful field." Some render "its garden forest"—a combination of garden and park.

xxxvii. 25. Sennacherib here boasts of his Egyptian exploits. For "rivers of besieged places" we should translate "rivers of Egypt," the word matzor sometimes meaning Egypt. As a fact, Sennacherib had been successfully repulsed by Tirhakah, king of Egypt.

xxxvii. 26. Our translators give another version in the margin, they escaped into the land of Armenia: and Esar-haddon his son reigned in his stead.

ESAR-HADDON.

We may here observe,

First. That those who receive messages of terror from men with patience, and send messages of faith to God by prayer, may expect messages of grace and peace from God for their comfort, then when they are most cast down. Isaiah sent a long answer to Hezekiah's prayer, in God's name,—sent it in writing, for it was too long to be sent by word of mouth,—and sent it by way of return to his prayer; relation being thereunto had; "Whereas thou hast prayed to me," know, for thy comfort, thy prayer is heard. Isaiah might have referred him to the prophecies he had delivered particularly that, ch. x., and bid him pick out an answer from thence; but, that he might have abundant consolation, a message is sent him on purpose. The correspondence between earth and heaven is never let fall on God's side.

Secondly. Those that magnify themselves, especially that magnify themselves against God and his people, do really vilify themselves, and make themselves contemptible in the eyes of all wise men. "The virgin, the daughter of Zion," hath despised Sennacherib, and all his impotent malice and menaces. She knows, while she preserves her integrity, she is sure of the Divine protection; and though he may bark, he cannot bite. All his threats are a jest; it is all but brutum fulmen,—'a mere flash.'

Thirdly. Those that abuse the people of God affront God himself; and he takes what is said and done against them as said and done against himself; "Whom hast thou reproached?" Even "the Holy One of Israel," whom thou hast therefore reproached, because he is a holy one. And it aggravated the indignity Sennacherib did to God, that he not only reproached him himself, but set his servants on to do it; "By thy servants," the abjects, "thou hast reproached me."

Fourthly. They that brag of themselves, and their own achievements, reflect upon God and his providence; "Thou hast said, I have digged and drunk water," I have done mighty feats, and will do more, and will not own that I have done it, ver. 24, 26. The most active men are no more than God makes them, and God makes them no more than of old he designed to make them. "What I have formed of ancient times," in an eternal counsel, "now have I brought to pass," (for God doth all according to the counsel of his will,) "that thou shouldst be to waste defenced cities;" it is therefore intolerable arrogance to make it thine own doing.

Fifthly. All the malice, and all the motions and projects of the church's enemies, are under the cognizance and check of the church's God. Sennacherib was active and quick, here and there and everywhere, but God knew his going out and coming in, and had always an eye upon him, ver. 28. And that was not all; he had a hand upon him too, a strict hand, a strong hand,—a hook in his nose, and a bridle in his lips,—with which, though he was very headstrong and unruly, he could, and would, turn him back by the way he came; ver. 29, "Hitherto he shall come, and no farther." God had signed Sennacherib's commission against Judah, ch. x. 6, here he supersedes it. He has frightened them, but he must not hurt them, and therefore is discharged from going any farther. Nay, his commitment is here signed, by which he is clapped up to answer for what he had done beyond his commission.

Sixthly. God is his people's bountiful benefactor, as well as their powerful protector; both a sun and a shield to those that trust in him. Jerusalem shall be defended, ver. 35; the besiegers shall not come into it, no, nor come before it with any regular attack; but they shall be routed before they begin the siege, ver. 33. But this is not all; God will return in mercy to his people, and will do them good. Their land shall be more than ordinarily fruitful, so as their losses shall be abundantly repaired. They shall not feel any of the ill effects either of the enemies wasting the country or of their own being taken off from husbanding; but the earth, as at first, shall bring forth of itself, and they shall live, and live plentifully, upon its spontaneous products. The blessing of the Lord can, when he pleaseth, make rich without the hand of the diligent. And let them not think that the desolations of their country would excuse them from observing the sabbatical year, which happened, as it should seem, the year after, and when they were not to plough or sow; no, though they had not now their usual stock beforehand for that year, yet they must religiously observe it, and depend upon God to provide for them. God must be trusted in the way of duty.

Seventhly. There is no standing before the judgments of God, when they come with commission. 1. The greatest numbers cannot stand before them One angel shall in one night lay a vast army of men dead upon the spot, when God commissions him so to do, ver. 36. Here are 185,000 brave soldiers in an instant turned into so many dead corpses. Many think the 76th psalm was penned upon occasion of this defeat; where, from "the spoiling of the stout-hearted," and sending them to sleep their long sleep, (ver. 5,) it is inferred, that God is "more glorious and excellent than the mountains of prey," ver. 4, and that "he, even he, is to be feared," ver. 7. Angels are employed more than we are aware of, as ministers of God's justice, to punish the pride, and break the power of wicked men. 2. The greatest men cannot stand before them. "The great king, the king of Assyria," looks very little when he is forced to return, not only with shame, because he cannot accomplish what he had projected with so much assurance; but with terror and fear, lest the angel, that had destroyed his army, should destroy him. Yet he is made to look less when his own sons, that should have guarded him, sacrificed him to his idol, whose protection he sought, ver. 37, 38. God can quickly stop their breath that breathe out threatenings and slaughter against his people, and will do it when they have filled up the measure of their iniquity. And the Lord is known by these judgments which he executeth; known to be a God that resists the proud. Many prophecies were fulfilled in this providence, which should encourage us, as far as they look farther, and are designed as common and general assurances of the safety of the church, and of all that trust in God, to depend upon God for the accomplishment of them. He that has delivered doth and will. Lord, forgive our enemies; but "so let all thine enemies perish, O Lord."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

This chapter proceeds in the history of Hezekiah. Here is, I. His sickness, and the sentence of death he received within himself, ver. 1. II. His prayer in his sickness, ver. 2, 3. III. The answer of peace which God gave to that prayer, assuring him that he should recover, that he should live fifteen years yet, that Jerusalem should be delivered from the king of Assyria, and that, for a sign to confirm his faith herein, the sun should go back ten degrees, ver. 8—10. And this we read and opened before, 2 Kin. xx. 10, &c. But, IV. Here is Hezekiah's thanksgiving for his recovery, which we had not before, ver. 9—20; to which is added, the means used, ver. 21, and the end the good man aimed at in desiring to recover, ver. 22. This is a chapter which will entertain the thoughts, direct the devotions, and encourage the faith and hopes of those that are confined by bodily distempers; it visits those that are visited with sickness.

IN those days was Hezekiah sick unto death. And Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz came unto him, and said unto him, Thus saith the LORD, Set thine house in order: for thou shalt die, and not live. 2 Then Hezekiah turned his face toward the wall, and prayed unto the LORD, 3 And said, Remember now, O LORD, I beseech thee, how I have walked before thee in truth and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight. And Hezekiah wept sore. 4 Then came the word of the LORD to Isaiah, saying, 5 Go, and say to Hezekiah, Thus saith the LORD, the God of David thy father, I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears: behold, I will add unto thy days fifteen years. 6 And I will deliver thee and this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria: and I will defend this city. 7 And this shall be a sign unto thee from the LORD, that the LORD will do this thing that he hath spoken: 8 Behold, I will bring again the shadow of the degrees, which is gone down in the sun dial of Ahaz, ten degrees backward. So the sun returned ten degrees, by which degrees it was gone down.

We may hence observe, among others, these good lessons.

First. That neither men's goodness nor greatness will exempt them from the arrests of sickness and death. Hezekiah, a mighty potentate on earth, and a mighty favourite of Heaven, is struck with a disease, which, without a miracle, will certainly be mortal; and this in the midst of his days, his comforts and usefulness; "Lord, behold he whom thou lovest is sick." It should seem, this sickness seized him when he was in the midst of his triumphs over the ruined army of the Assyrians, to teach us always to rejoice with trembling.

Secondly. It concerns us to prepare when we see death approaching; "Set thine house in order," and thy heart especially. Put both thine affections and thine affairs into the best posture thou canst, that when thy Lord comes thou mayest be found of him in peace with God, with thy own conscience, and with all men, and mayest have nothing else to do but to die. Our being ready for death will make it come never the sooner, but much the easier; and those that are fit to die are most fit to live.

Thirdly. "Is any afflicted" with sickness? "Let him pray," Jas. v. 13. Prayer is a salve for every sore, personal or public. When Hezekiah was distressed by his enemies, he prayed; now he was sick, he prayed. Whither should the child go when any thing ails him but to his Father? Afflictions are sent to bring us to our Bibles, and to our knees. When Hezekiah was in health he "went up to the house of the Lord" to pray, for that was then the house of prayer; when he was sick in bed he "turned his face towards the wall," pro-but neither is quite correct. We render, "Hast thou not heard? of old I did it, from the days of old, and framed it; now have I brought it to pass, that thou shouldest come to lay waste fortified cities into ruinous heaps." The Lord had made Sennacherib a scourge.

xxxvii. 29. The Assyrians were accustomed to secure and drive along captives taken in war by means of a ring in the lips and a sort of bridle (see chap. xxx. 28). This and other cruelties are abundantly illustrated by the monuments.

xxxvii. 30. Here the prophet addresses Hezekiah.

xxxvii. 33. The Assyrians were diverted from their intention of besieging Jerusalem.

xxxvii. 36. See note on 2 Kings xix. 35.

xxxvii. 38. For "Armenia" the Hebrew has "Ararat;" but doubtless an Armenian province is meant. The Syriac and Chaldee point to Kurdistan.

xxxviii. 1. "In those days" must refer to the period of the bably towards the temple, which was a type of Christ, to whom we must look by faith in every prayer.

Fourthly. The testimony of our consciences for us, that by the grace of God we have lived a good life, and have walked closely and humbly with God, will be a great support and comfort to us when we come to look death in the face. And though we may not depend upon it as our righteousness, by which to be justified before God, yet we may humbly plead it as an evidence of our interest in the righteousness of the Mediator. Hezekiah doth not demand a reward from God for his good services, but modestly begs that God would remember, not how he had reformed the kingdom, taken away the high places, cleansed the temple, and revived neglected ordinances, but, which was "better than all burnt offerings and sacrifices," how he had approved himself to God with a single eye, and an honest heart, not only in these eminent performances, but in an even, regular course of holy living. "I have walked before thee in truth," and sincerity, and "with a perfect," that is, an upright "heart;" for uprightness is our gospel perfection.

Fifthly. God has a gracious ear open to the prayers of his afflicted people. The same prophet that was sent to Hezekiah with warning to prepare for death is sent to him with a promise that he shall not only recover, but be restored to a confirmed state of health, and live fifteen years yet. As Jerusalem was distressed, so Hezekiah was diseased, that God might have the glory of the deliverance of both, and that prayer too might have the honour of being instrumental in the deliverance. When we pray in our sickness, though God send not to us such an answer as he here sent to Hezekiah, yet if by his Spirit he bids us be of good cheer, assures us that our sins are forgiven us, that his grace shall be sufficient for us, and that whether we live or die we shall be his; we have no reason to say that we prayed in vain. God answers us, if he strengthens us with strength in our souls, though not with bodily strength, Ps. cxxxviii. 3.

Sixthly. A good man cannot take much comfort in his own health and prosperity, unless withal he see the welfare and prosperity of the church of God. Therefore, God knowing what lay near Hezekiah's heart, promised him not only that he should live, but that he should see the good of Jerusalem all the days of his life, Ps. cxxviii. 5; or otherwise he cannot live comfortably. Jerusalem, that is now delivered, shall still be defended from the Assyrians, who perhaps threatened to rally again, and renew the attack. Thus doth God graciously provide to make Hezekiah upon all accounts easy.

Seventhly. God is "willing to shew to the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel," that they may have unshaken faith in it, and therewith a strong consolation. God had given Hezekiah repeated assurances of his favour; and yet, as if all were thought too little, that he might expect from him uncommon favours, a sign is given him, an uncommon sign. None, that we know of, having had an absolute promise of living such a number of years to come as Hezekiah had, God thought fit to confirm this unprecedented favour with a miracle. The sign was the going back of the shadow upon the sun-dial. The sun is a faithful measurer of time, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race. But he that set that clock a-going can set it back when he pleaseth, and make it to return; for the Father of all lights is the director of them.

9 ¶ The writing of Hezekiah king of Judah, when he had been sick, and was recovered of his sickness:

10 I said in the cutting off of my days,
I shall go to the gates of the grave:
I am deprived of the residue of my years.
11 I said, I shall not see the LORD,
Even the LORD, in the land of the living:
I shall behold man no more
With the inhabitants of the world.
12 Mine age is departed, and is removed from me as a shepherd's tent:
I have cut off like a weaver my life:
He will cut me off with pining sickness:
From day even to night wilt thou make an end of me.
13 I reckoned till morning, that, as a lion,
So will he break all my bones:
From day even to night wilt thou make an end of me.
14 Like a crane or a swallow, so did I chatter:
I did mourn as a dove:
Mine eyes fail with looking upward:
O LORD, I am oppressed; undertake for me.
15 What shall I say?
He hath both spoken unto me, and himself hath done it:
I shall go softly all my years
In the bitterness of my soul.
16 O Lord, by these things men live,
And in all these things is the life of my spirit:
So wilt thou recover me, and make me to live
17 Behold, for peace I had great bitterness:
But thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption:
For thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back.
18 For the grave cannot praise thee,
Death can not celebrate thee:
They that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth
18 The living, the living, he shall praise thee, as I do this day:
The father to the children shall make known thy truth.
20 The LORD was ready to save me:
Therefore we will sing my songs to the stringed instruments
All the days of our life in the house of the LORD.
21 For Isaiah had said, Let them take a lump of figs, and lay it for a plaister upon the boil, and he shall recover. 22 Hezekiah also had said, What is the sign that I shall go up to the house of the LORD?

We have here Hezekiah's thanksgiving song, which he penned by Divine direction, after his recovery. He might have taken some of the psalms of his father David, and have made use of them for his purpose. He might have found many very pertinent ones. He appointed the Levites to praise the Lord with the words of David, 2 Chr. xxix. 30. But the occasion here was extraordinary, and, his heart being full of devout affections, he would not confine himself to the composures he had, though of Divine inspiration, but would offer up his affections in his own words, which is most natural and genuine. He put this thanksgiving in writing, that he might review it himself afterwards, for the reviving of the good impressions made upon him by the providence, and that it might be recommended to others also, for their use upon the like occasion. Note, There are writings which it is proper for us to draw up, after we have been sick, and are recovered. It is good to write a memorial of the affliction, and of the frame of our hearts under it; to keep a record of the thoughts we had of things when we were sick, the affections that were then working in us. To write a memorial of the mercies of a sick-bed, and of our release from it, that they may never be forgotten; to write a thanksgiving to God, write a sure covenant with him, and seal it; give it under our hands, that we will never return again to folly. It is an excellent writing which Hezekiah here left upon his recovery; and yet we find, 2 Chr. xxxii. 25, that he rendered not again according to the benefit done to him. The impressions, one would have thought, should never have worn off, and yet it seems they did. Thanksgiving is good, but thanks-living is better. Now in this writing he preserves upon record,

First. The deplorable condition he was in when his disease prevailed, and his despair of recovery, ver. 10—13. He tells us what his thoughts were of himself, when he was at the worst. And these he keeps in remembrance, 1. As blaming himself for his despondency, and that he gave up himself for gone, whereas while there is life there is hope, and room for our prayer, and God's mercy. Though it is good to construe sickness as a summons to the grave, so as thereby to be quickened in our preparation for another world, yet we ought not to make the worst of our case, nor to think that every sick man must needs be a dead man presently. He that brings low can raise up. Or, 2. As minding himself of the apprehensions he had of death approaching, that he might always know and consider his own frailty and mortality; and that, though he had a reprieve for fifteen years, it was but a reprieve, and the fatal stroke he had now such a dread of would certainly come at last. Or, 3. As magnifying the power of God, in recovering him when his case was desperate, and his goodness in being so much better to him than his own fears. Thus David sometimes, when he was delivered out of trouble, reflected upon the black and melancholy conclusions he had made upon his own case when he was in trouble, and what he had then said in his haste, as Ps. xxxi. 22; lxxvii. 7—9. Let us see what Hezekiah's thoughts of himself were.

1st. He reckoned that the number of his months was cut off in the midst. He was now about thirty-nine or forty years of age, and when he had a fair prospect of many years, and happy ones, very happy, very many before him. This distemper, that suddenly seized him, he concluded would be the cutting off of his days, that he should now be deprived of the residue of his years, which, in a course of nature, he might have lived; not which he could command as a debt due to him, but which he had reason to expect, considering the strength of his constitution. And with them he should be deprived not only of the comforts of life, but of all the opportunities he had of serving God and his generation. To the same purpose; ver. 12, "Mine age is departed," and gone, "and is removed from me as a shepherd's tent," out of which I am forcibly dislodged, by the pulling of it down in an instant. Our present residence is but like that of a shepherd in his tent,—a poor, and mean, and cold lodging,—where we are upon duty, and with a trust committed to our charge, as the shepherd hath, of which we must give an account, and which will easily be taken down, by the drawing one pin or two. But observe, it is not the final period of our age, but only the removal of it to another world, where the tents of Kedar, that are taken down coarse, and black, and weather-beaten, shall be set up again in the New Jerusalem, comely as the curtains of Solomon. He adds another similitude; "I have cut off, like a weaver, my life." Not that he did by any act of his own cut off the thread of his life, but, being told that he must needs die, he was forced to cut off all his designs and projects; his purposes were broken off, even the thoughts of his heart, as Job's were, ch. xvii. 11. Our days are compared to the weaver's shuttle, Job vii. 6, passing and repassing very swiftly; and every throw leaving a thread behind it; and when they are finished, the thread is cut off, and the piece taken out of the loom and shewed to our Master, to be judged of whether it be well woven or no, that we may receive according to the things done in the body. But, as the weaver, when he has cut off his threads, has done his work, and the toil is over, so a good man, when his life is cut off, his cares and fatigues are cut off with it, and he rests from his labours. But, did I say, I have cut off my life? No, my times are not in mine own hand; they are in God's hand, and it is he that 'will cut me off from the thrum,' so the margin reads it. He has appointed what shall be the length of the piece, and when it comes to that length he will cut it off.

2nd. He reckoned that he should "go to the gates of the grave;" to the grave, the gates of which are always open; for it is still crying, Give, give. The grave is here put not only for the sepulchres of his fathers, in which his body would be deposited with a great deal of pomp and magnificence,—for he was buried in the chief of the sepulchres of the kings, and all Judah did him honour at his death, 2 Chr. xxxii. 33, which yet he himself took no care of, nor gave any order about, when he was sick,—but for the state of the dead, that is, the Sheol, the Hades, the invisible world to which he saw his soul going.

3rd. He reckoned that he was deprived of all the opportunities he might have had of worshipping God, and doing good in the world; ver. 11, "I said," First. "I shall not see the Lord," as he manifests himself in his temple, in his oracles and ordinances, "even the Lord," here "in the land of the living." He hopes to see him on the other side death; but he despairs of seeing him any more on this side death, as he had seen him in the sanctuary, Ps. lxiii. 2. He shall no more see, that is, serve the Lord in the land of the living, the land of conflict between his kingdom and the kingdom of Satan, this seat of war. He xxxviii. 9. This verse and the following, down to verse 20, are not in 2 Kings xx., where the corresponding narrative appears.

Assyrian invasion or thereabout, and not to the time of Sennacherib's death.

xxxviii. 10. "I said in the cutting off of my days," &c., is now generally objected to by critics, who mostly think the word rendered "cutting off" signifies quiet or tranquillity. But there is quite as much reason for translating thus, "I said in the extending of my days," i.e., "when my days were extended by miraculous mercy, at that very time I was bemoaning my impending death."

xxxviii. 11. Here for "the world" many understand the region of the dead, "the other world," as the common phrase is.

xxxviii. 13. We may translate the first clause "I waited until morning," or "I awaited morning; as a lion," &c. The king clearly continues the record of his mental conflicts. Hence in verse 14 "fail" should be "failed," and "I said" should be understood harps much upon this, "I shall no more see the Lord, even the Lord;" for a good man wisheth not to live for any other end but that he may serve God, and have communion with him. Secondly. "I shall see man no more." He shall see his subjects no more, whom he may protect and administer justice to; shall see no more objects of charity, whom he may relieve; shall see his friends no more, who were often sharpened by his countenance, as iron is by iron. Death puts an end to conversation, and removes our acquaintance into darkness, Ps. lxxxviii. 18.

4th. He reckoned that the agonies of death would be very sharp and severe; "He will cut me off with pining sickness," which will waste me, and wear me off apace. The distemper increased so fast, without intermission or remission, either day or night, morning or evening, that he concluded it would come to a crisis presently, and make an end of him. That God, whose servants all diseases are, would by them, as a lion, break all his bones, with grinding pain, ver. 13. He thought next morning was the utmost he could expect to live in such pain and misery. When he had outlived the first day's illness, the second day he repeated his fears, and concluded this must needs be his last night; "From day even to night wilt thou make an end of me." When we are sick, we are very apt to be thus calculating our time; and after all, we are still at an uncertainty. It should be more our care how we shall get safe to another world than how long we are likely to live in this world.

Secondly. The complaints he made in this condition; ver. 14, "Like a crane or swallow so did I chatter;" I made a noise as those birds do when they are frightened. See what change sickness makes in a little time; he that but the other day spoke with so much freedom and majesty, now, through the extremity of pain, or deficiency of spirits, chatters like a crane or a swallow. Some think he refers to his praying in his affliction; it was so broken and interrupted with groanings that could not be uttered, that it was more like the chattering of a crane or swallow than what it used to be. Such mean thoughts had he of his own prayers, which yet were acceptable to God, and successful. He "mourned like a dove," sadly, but silently and patiently. He had found God so ready to answer his prayers at other times, that he could not but look upwards in expectation of some relief now; but in vain, his eyes failed, and he saw no hopeful symptom, nor felt any abatement of his distemper; and therefore he prays, "I am oppressed," quite overpowered, and ready to sink, "Lord, undertake for me," bail me out of the hands of this serjeant that has arrested me; "be surety for thy servant for good," Ps. cxix. 122; come between me and the gates of the grave, to which I am ready to be hurried. When we recover from sickness, the Divine pity doth as it were beg day for us, and undertakes we shall be forthcoming another time, and answer the debt in full; and when we receive the sentence of death within ourselves we are undone if the Divine grace do not undertake for us to carry us through the valley of the shadow of death, and to preserve us blameless to the heavenly kingdom on the other side it; if Christ do not undertake for us to bring us off in the judgment, and present us to his Father, and to do all that for us which we need, and cannot do for ourselves. 'I am oppressed, ease me,' so some read it; for when we are tossed with sense of guilt, and fear of wrath, nothing will make us easy but Christ's undertaking for us.

Thirdly. The grateful acknowledgment he makes of God's goodness to him in his recovery. He begins this part of the writing as one at a stand how to express himself; ver. 15, "What shall I say?" Why should I say so much by way of complaint, when this is enough to silence all my complaints; "He hath spoken unto me," he hath sent his prophet to tell me that I shall recover, and live fifteen years yet; "and himself hath done it." It is as sure to be done as if it were done already; what God hath spoken, he will himself do, for no word of his shall fall to the ground. God having spoken it, he is sure of it; ver. 16, "Thou wilt recover me, and make me to live;" not only recover me from this illness, but make me to live through the years assigned me. And having this hope,

1. He promiseth always to retain the impressions of his affliction; ver. 15, "I will go softly all my years in the bitterness of my soul," as one in sorrow for my sinful distrusts and murmurings under my affliction; as one in the care to make suitable returns for God's favour to me, and to make it appear I have got good by the providences I have been under. "I will go softly," that is, gravely and considerately, and with thought and deliberation; not as many, when they are recovered, live as carelessly and as much at large as ever. Or, 'I will go pleasantly,' so some understand it; when God has delivered me, I will walk cheerfully with him in all holy conversation, as having tasted that he is gracious. Or, "I will go softly," that is, mournfully, "in the bitterness of my soul," for my sins. Or, 'I will go softly even after the bitterness of my soul,' so it may be read; when the trouble is over, I will endeavour to retain the impression of it, and to have the same thoughts of things I had then.

2. He will encourage himself and others with the experiences he had had of the goodness of God, ver. 16. By these things which thou hast done for me they live, the kingdom lives; for the life of such a king was the life of the kingdom; all that hear of it shall live and be comforted; by the same power and goodness that hath recovered me all men have their souls held in life, and they ought to acknowledge it. "In all these things is the life of my spirit," that is, my spiritual life; that is supported and maintained by what God has done for the preservation of my natural life. The more we taste of the lovingkindness of God in every providence, the more will our hearts be enlarged to love him, and live to him; and that will be the life of our spirit. Thus our souls live, and they shall praise him.

3. He magnifies the mercy of his recovery on several accounts.

1st. That he was raised up from great extremity; ver. 17, "Behold, for peace I had great bitterness." When, upon the defeat of Sennacherib, he expected nothing but an uninterrupted peace to himself and his government, he was suddenly seized with sickness, which embittered all his comforts to him; and went to that height, that it seemed to be the bitterness of death itself; bitterness, bitterness, nothing but gall and wormwood. This was his condition when God sent him seasonable relief.

2nd. That it came from the love of God, from love to his soul. Some are spared and reprieved in wrath, that they may be reserved for some greater judgment, when they have filled up the measure of their iniquities; but temporal mercies are then sweet indeed to us when we can taste the love of God in them; "He delivered me because he delighted in me," Ps. xviii. 19. And the word here signifies a very affectionate love. 'Thou hast loved my soul from the pit of corruption,' so it runs in the original. God's love is sufficient to bring a soul from the pit of corruption. This is applicable to our redemption by Christ; it was in love to our souls, our poor perishing souls, that he delivered them from the bottomless pit, snatched them as brands out of everlasting burnings; "In his love, and in his pity he redeemed us." And the preservation of our bodies, and the provision made for them, is then doubly comfortable, when it is in love to our souls; when God repairs the house because he has a kindness for the inhabitant.

3rd. That it was the product and effect of the pardon of sin; "For thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back," and thereby hast delivered my soul from the pit of corruption, in love to it. Note, First. When God pardons sin, he casts it behind his back, as not designing to look upon it with an eye of justice and jealousy; he remembers it no more to visit for it. The pardon doth not make the sin not to have been, or not to have been sin, but not to be punished as it deserves. When we cast our sins behind our back, and take no care to repent of them, God sets them before his face, and is ready to reckon for them; but when we set them before our face in true repentance, as David did when his sin was ever before him, God casts them behind his back. Secondly. When God pardons sins, he pardons all, casts them all behind his back, though they have been as scarlet and crimson. Thirdly. The pardoning of the sin is the delivering of the soul from the pit of corruption. Fourthly. It is then pleasant to think of our recoveries from sickness, when we see them flowing from the remission of sin; then the cause is removed, and then it is in love to the soul.

4th. That it was the lengthening out of his opportunity to glorify God in this world, which he made the business, and pleasure, and end of life.

First. If this sickness had been his death, it had put a period to that course of service for the glory of God, and the good of the church, he was now in, ver. 18. Heaven indeed praiseth God; and the souls of the faithful, when at death they remove thither, do the work of heaven, as the angels, and with the angels there; but what is the world the better for that? What doth that contribute to the support and advancement of God's kingdom among men, in this state of struggle? The grave cannot praise God, nor the dead bodies that lie there; death cannot celebrate him, cannot proclaim his perfections and favours, to invite others into his service. They who go down to the pit, being no longer in a state of probation, nor living by faith in his promises, cannot give him honour by hoping for his truth. They that lie rotting in the grave, as they are not capable of receiving any farther mercy from God, so neither of offering any more praises to him, till they shall be raised at the last day, and then they shall both receive and give glory.

Secondly. Being recovered from it, he resolves not only to proceed, but to abound in praising and serving God; ver. 19, "The living, the living, he shall praise thee." They may do it, they have an opportunity of praising God, and that is the main thing that makes life valuable and desirable to a good man. Hezekiah was therefore glad to live, not that he might continue to enjoy his royal dignity, and the honour and pleasure of his late successes, but that he might continue to praise God. The living must praise God, they live in vain if they do not. They that have been dying, and yet are living, whose life is life from the dead, are in a special manner obliged to praise God, as being most sensibly affected with his goodness. Hezekiah, for his part, being recovered from this sickness, will make it his business to praise God; "I do it this day," let others do it in like manner. They that give good exhortations should set good examples, and do themselves what they expect from others. For my part, saith Hezekiah, "The Lord was ready to save me;" he not only did save me, but he was ready to do it just then when I was in the greatest extremity; his help came in seasonably; he shewed himself willing and forward to save me. The Lord was to save me, was at hand to do it, saved me at the first word; and therefore, 1*st.* I will publish and proclaim his praises. I and my family, I and my friends, I and my people, will have a concert of praise to his glory; "We will sing my songs to the stringed instruments," that others may attend to them, and be affected with them, when they are in the most devout and serious frame "in the house of the Lord." It is for the honour of God, and the edification of his church, that special mercies should be acknowledged in public praises, especially mercies to public persons, Ps. cxvi. 18, 19. 2*nd.* I will proceed and persevere in his praises. We will do it all the days of our life, because every day of our life is itself a fresh mercy, and brings many fresh mercies along with it; and, as renewed mercies called for renewed praises, so former eminent mercies call for repeated praises. It is by the mercy of God that we live, and therefore as long as we live we must continue to praise him while we have breath; nay, while we have being. 3*rd.* I will propagate and perpetuate his praises. We will not only do it all the days of our life, but "the father to the children shall make known his truth," that the ages to come may give God the glory of his truth by trusting to it. It is the duty of parents to possess their children with a confidence in the truth of God, which will go far towards keeping them close to the ways of God. Hezekiah, doubtless, did this himself; and yet Manasseh his son walked not in his steps. Parents may give their children many good things, good instructions, good examples, good books, but they cannot give them grace.

In the last two verses of this chapter we have two passages relating to this story, which were omitted in the narrative of it here, but which we had, 2 Kin. xx., and therefore shall here only observe two lessons from them. 1. That God's promises are intended, not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage the use of means. Hezekiah is sure to recover, and yet he must "take a lump of figs, and lay it on the boil," ver. 21. We do not trust God, but tempt him, if when we pray to him for help we do not second our prayers with our endeavours. We must not put physicians or physic in the place of God, but make use of them in subordination to God and to his providence. Help thyself, and God will help thee. 2. That the chief end we should aim at in desiring life and health is, that we may glorify God, and do good, and improve ourselves in knowledge, and grace, and meetness for heaven. Hezekiah, when he asked, What is the sign that I shall recover, meant, "What is the sign that I shall go up to the house of the Lord," there to honour God, to keep up his acquaintance and communion with him, and to encourage others to serve him, ver. 22. It is taken for granted that if God would restore him to health, he would presently go up to the temple with his thank offerings; there Christ found the impotent man whom he had healed, Jno. v. 14. The exercises of religion are so much the business and delight of a good man, that to be restrained from them is the greatest grievance of his afflictions; and to be restored to them is the greatest comfort of his deliverances. "Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

The story of this chapter likewise we had before, 2 Kin. xx. 12, &c. It is here repeated, not only as a very memorable and improvable passage, but because it concludes with a prophecy of the captivity in Babylon; and as the former part of the prophecy of this book frequently referred to Sennacherib's invasion, and the defeat of that, to which, therefore, the history of that was very fitly subjoined, so the latter part of this book speaks much of the Jews' captivity in Babylon, and their deliverance out of that, to which, therefore, the first prediction of it, with the occasion thereof, is very fitly prefixed. We have here, I. The pride and folly of Hezekiah, in shewing his treasures to the king of Babylon's ambassadors that were sent to congratulate his recovery, ver. 1, 2. II. Isaiah's examination of him concerning it in God's name, and his confession of it, ver. 3, 4. III. The sentence passed upon him for it, that all his treasures should in process of time be carried to Babylon, ver. 5—7. IV. Hezekiah's penitent and patient submission to this sentence, ver. 8.

AT that time Merodach-baladan, the son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and a present to Hezekiah: for he had heard that he had before "O Lord," &c. After the prayer the promise is introduced in verse 15, where "I shall go softly," &c., may be rendered "I shall go all my years," &c.

xxxix. 1. Merodach-Baladan was at that time ruling in Babylon, in opposition to Sennacherib, who regarded it as part of his Assyrian empire, and re-conquered it.

xl. 1. Here begins the second half of the prophecies of Isaiah. Its genuineness has been questioned, chiefly by those who think the predictions too clear to have been given at so early a period; but the objectors have been refuted by many able critics, and the New Testament contains numerous references to these chapters as Isaiah's.

xl. 3. Some point this differently: "The voice of one that crieth, In the wilderness prepare ye," &c. It is hard to decide which is right.

xl. 7. For "spirit" some translate "breath," and others "wind." Barnes says the clause should be rendered, undoubtedly, "When the wind of Jehovah bloweth upon it."

been sick, and was recovered. 2 And Hezekiah was glad of them, and shewed them the house of his precious things, the silver, and the gold, and the spices, and the precious ointment, and all the house of his armour, and all that was found in his treasures: there was nothing in his house, nor in all his dominion, that Hezekiah shewed them not. 3 Then came Isaiah the prophet unto king Hezekiah, and said unto him, What said these men? and from whence came they unto thee? And Hezekiah said, They are come from a far country unto me, even from Babylon. 4 Then said he, What have they seen in thine house? And Hezekiah answered, All that is in mine house have they seen: there is nothing among my treasures that I have not shewed them.

Hence we may learn these lessons:

First. That humanity and common civility teach us to rejoice with our friends and neighbours when they rejoice, and to congratulate their deliverances, and particularly their recoveries from sickness. The king of Babylon having heard that Hezekiah had been sick, and was recovered, sent to compliment him upon the occasion. If Christians be unneighbourly, heathens will shame them.

Secondly. It becomes us to give honour to those whom our God puts honour upon. The sun was the Babylonian's god, and when they understood that it was with a respect to Hezekiah that the sun, to their great surprise, went back ten degrees such a day, they thought themselves obliged to do Hezekiah all the honour they could. Will all people thus walk in the name of their god, and shall not we?

Thirdly. Those that do not value good men for their goodness yet may be brought to pay them great respects by other inducements, and for the sake of their secular interests. The king of Babylon made his court to Hezekiah here, not because he was pious, but because he was prosperous; as the Philistines coveted an alliance with Isaac, because they saw the Lord was with him, Gen. xxvi. 28. The king of Babylon was an enemy to the king of Assyria, and therefore was fond of Hezekiah, because the Assyrians were so much weakened by the power of his God.

Fourthly. It is a hard matter to keep the spirit low in the midst of great advancements. Hezekiah is an instance of it. He was a wise and good man; but when one miracle after another was wrought in his favour he found it hard to keep his heart from being lifted up; nay, a little thing then drew him into the snare of pride. Blessed Paul himself needed a thorn in the flesh to keep him from being lifted up with the abundance of revelations.

Fifthly. We have need to watch over our own spirits, when we are shewing our friends our possessions, what we have done, and what we have got, that we be not proud of them, as if our might or our merit had purchased and procured us this wealth. When we look upon our enjoyments, and have occasion to speak of them, it must be with humble acknowledgments of our own unworthiness, and thankful acknowledgments of God's goodness, with a just value for others' achievements, and with an expectation of losses and changes; not dreaming that our mountain stands so strong but that it may soon be moved.

Sixthly. It is a great weakness for good men to value themselves much upon the civil respects that are paid them (yea, though there be something particular and uncommon in them) by the children of this world, and to be fond of their acquaintance. What a poor thing was it for Hezekiah, whom God had dignified, to be thus overproud of the respects done him by a heathen prince, as if those added any thing to him! We ought to return the courtesies of such with interest, but not to be proud of them.

Seventhly. We must expect to be called to an account for the workings of our pride, though they are secret, and in such instances as we thought there was no harm in; and therefore we ought to call ourselves to an account for them; and when we have had company with us that has paid us respect, and been pleased with their entertainment, and commended every thing, to be jealous over ourselves with a godly jealousy, lest our hearts have been lifted up. And as far as we see cause to suspect that this sly and subtle sin of pride hath insinuated itself into our breasts, and mingled itself with our conversation, let us be ashamed of it, and, as Hezekiah here, ingenuously confess it, and take shame to ourselves for it.

5 Then said Isaiah to Hezekiah, Hear the word of the LORD of hosts: 6 Behold, the days come, that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store until this day, shall be carried to Babylon: nothing shall be left, saith the LORD. 7 And of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shall they take away; and they shall be eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon. 8 Then said Hezekiah to Isaiah, Good is the word of the LORD which thou hast spoken. He said moreover, For there shall be peace and truth in my days.

Hence let us observe,

First. That if God love us he will humble us, and will find some way or other to pull down our spirits when they are lifted up above measure. A mortifying message is sent to Hezekiah, that he might be humbled for the pride of his heart, and be convinced of the folly of it; for though God may suffer his people to fall into sin, as he did Hezekiah here, to prove him, that he "might know all that was in his heart," yet he will not suffer them to lie still in it.

Secondly. It is just with God to take that from us which we make the matter of our pride, and on which we build a carnal confidence. When David was proud of the numbers of his people, God took a course to make them fewer; and when Hezekiah boasts of his treasures, and looks upon them with too great a complacency, he is told he doth like the foolish traveller, that shews his money and gold to one that proves a thief, and is thereby tempted to rob him.

Thirdly. If we could but see things that will be, we should be ashamed of our thoughts of things that are. If Hezekiah had known that the seed and successors of this king of Babylon would hereafter be the ruin of his family and kingdom, he would not have complimented his ambassadors as he did. And when the prophet told him it would be so, we may well imagine how he was vexed at himself for what he had done. We cannot certainly foresee what will be, but are told in general, "all is vanity;" and therefore it is vanity for us to take a complacency, and put a confidence, in any thing that goes under that character.

Fourthly. Those that are fond of an acquaintance and alliance with irreligious men, first or last, will have enough of it, and will have cause to repent it. Hezekiah thought himself mighty happy in the friendship of Babylon, though it was the mother of harlots and idolatries; but Babylon, that now courted Jerusalem, in process of time conquered her, and carried her captive. Leagues with sinners, and leagues with sin too, will end thus; it is therefore our wisdom to keep at a distance from them.

Fifthly. Those that truly repent of their sins will take it well to be reproved for them, and will be willing to be told of their faults. Hezekiah reckoned that word of the Lord good which discovered sin to him, and made him sensible that he had done amiss, which before he was not aware of. The language of true penitents is, "Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness;" and the law is therefore good, because, being spiritual, in it sin appears sin, and exceeding sinful.

Sixthly. True penitents will quietly submit, not only to the reproofs of the word, but to the rebukes of Providence, for their sins. When Hezekiah was told of the punishment of his iniquity he said, "Good is the word of the Lord;" not only the mitigation of the sentence good, but the sentence itself so. He hath nothing to object against the equity of it, but saith Amen to the threatening. They that see the evil of sin, and what it deserves, will justify God in all that is brought upon them for it, and own that he punisheth them less than their iniquities deserve.

Seventhly. Though we must not be regardless of those that come after us, yet we must reckon ourselves well done for, if there be peace and truth in our days, and better than we had reason to expect. If a storm be coming, we must reckon it a favour to get into the harbour before it comes, and be gathered to the grave in peace; yet we can never be secure of this, but must prepare for changes in our own time, that we may stand complete in all the will of God, and bid it welcome whatever it is.

CHAPTER XL.

At this chapter begins the latter part of the prophecy of this book, which is not only divided from the former by the historical chapters that come between, but seems to be distinguished from it in the scope and style of it. In the former part, the name of the prophet was frequently prefixed to the particular sermons, besides the general title, as ch. ii. 1; vii. 3; xiii. 1; but this is all one continued discourse, and the prophet not so much as once named; that consisted of many burthens, many woes, this of many blessings. There the distress which the people of God were in by the Assyrian, and their deliverance out of that, were chiefly prophesied of; but that is here spoken of as a thing past, ch. lii. 4; and the captivity in Babylon, and their deliverance out of that, which were much greater events, of more extensive and abiding concern, are here largely foretold. Before God sent his people into captivity, he furnished them with precious promises for their support and comfort in their trouble; and we may well imagine of what great use to them the glorious, gracious light of this prophecy was in that cloudy and dark day, and how much it helped to dry up their tears by the rivers of Babylon. But it looks farther yet, and to greater things; much of Christ and gospel grace we met with in the foregoing part of this book, but in this latter part we shall find much more; and, as if it were designed for a prophetical summary of the New Testament, it begins with that which begins the Gospels, "The voice of one crying in the wilderness," ch. xl. 3, and concludes with that which concludes the book of the Revelation, the new heavens and the new earth, ch. lxvi. 22. Even Mr. White acknowledgeth, that as all the mercies of God to the Jewish nation bore some resemblance to those glorious things performed by our Saviour for man's redemption, so they are by the Spirit of God expressed in such terms as shew plainly that, while the prophet is speaking of the redemption of the Jews, he had in his thoughts a more glorious deliverance. And we need not look for any farther accomplishment of these prophecies yet to come; for if Jesus be he, and his kingdom be it that should come, we are to look for no other, but the carrying on and completing of the same blessed work which was begun in the first preaching and planting of Christianity in the world.

In this chapter we have, I. Orders given to preach and publish the glad tidings of redemption, ver. 1, 2. II. These glad tidings introduced by a voice in the wilderness, which gives assurance that all obstructions shall be removed, ver. 3—5, and that, though all creatures fail and fade, the word of God shall be established for ever, ver. 6—8. III. A joyful prospect given the people of God of the happiness which this redemption should bring along with it, ver. 9—11. IV. The sovereignty and power of that God magnified who undertakes to work out this redemption, ver. 12—17. V. Idols therefore triumphed over, and idolaters upbraided with their folly, ver. 18—26. VI. A reproof given to the people of God for their fears and despondencies, and enough said in a few words to silence those fears, ver. 27—31. And we through patience and comfort of this scripture may have hope.

COMFORT ye, comfort ye my people,
Saith your God.
2 Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her,
That her warfare is accomplished,
That her iniquity is pardoned:
For she hath received of the LORD's hand
Double for all her sins.

We have here the commission and instructions given, not to this prophet only, but with him to all the Lord's prophets, nay, and to all Christ's ministers, to proclaim comfort to God's people. 1. This did not only warrant but enjoin this prophet himself to encourage the good people who lived in his own time.

xl. 9. It is disputed whether we should translate "O Zion, that bringest good tidings," or "O thou that bringest good tidings to Zion," and a like difference of opinion applies to the next clause. The Hebrew is, "Upon a high mountain get thee up, O preacher of Zion; lift up thy voice with power, O preacher of Jerusalem," the preacher being feminine.

xl. 10. Instead of "with a strong hand," some have "with might," others "as a mighty one," or "as a victorious one," or "against the strong one." We prefer "with power," or "with might." For "work" we must substitute "recompense," or "retribution," the reward of work.

xl. 11. For "are with young" read "have young," or "give suck."

xl. 12. The use of scales and balances, or steelyards, was common in Egypt, and in most ancient civilised countries.

xl. 15. "A very little thing" here means a particle of chaff or dust, which might be easily carried up by the wind.

who could not but have very melancholy apprehensions of things, when they saw Judah and Jerusalem, by their daring impieties, ripening apace for ruin, and God, in his providence, hastening ruin upon them. Let them be sure that for all this God had mercy in store for them. 2. It was especially a direction to the prophets that should live in the time of the captivity, when Jerusalem was in ruins; they must encourage the captives to hope for enlargement in due time. 3. Gospel ministers, being employed by the blessed Spirit as a comforter, and as helpers of the joy of Christians, are here put in mind of their business. Here is,

First. Comfortable words directed to God's people in general, ver. 1. The prophets have instructions from their God (for he is the Lord God of the holy prophets, Rev. xxii. 6) to comfort the people of God; and the charge is doubled, "Comfort ye, comfort ye;" not so much because the prophets are unwilling to do it,—no, it is the most pleasant part of their work,—but because sometimes the souls of God's people refuse to be comforted, and their comforters must repeat things again and again, ere they can fasten any thing upon them. Observe here, 1. There are a people in the world that are God's people. 2. It is the will of God that his people should be a comforted people, even in the worst of times. 3. It is the work and business of ministers to do what they can for the comfort of God's people. 4. Words of conviction, such as we had in the former part of this book, must be followed with words of comfort, such as we have here; for he that hath torn will heal us.

Secondly. Comfortable words directed to Jerusalem in particular. "Speak to the heart of Jerusalem," ver. 2. Speak that which will revive her heart, and be a cordial to her, and to all that belong to her, and wish her well. Do not whisper it, but cry unto her, cry aloud, to shew saints their comforts, as well as to shew sinners their transgressions; make her hear it. 1. That the days of her trouble are numbered and finished. "Her warfare is accomplished," the set time of her servitude; the campaign is now at an end, and she shall retire into quarters of refreshment. The human life is a warfare, Job vii. 1, the Christian life much more; but the struggle will not last always, the warfare will be accomplished, and then the good soldiers shall not only enter into rest, but be sure of their pay. 2. That the cause of her trouble is removed, and when that is taken away the effect will cease. Tell her "that her iniquity is pardoned;" God is reconciled to her, and she shall no longer be treated as one guilty before him. Nothing can be spoken more comfortably than this, "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee." Troubles are then removed in love when sin is pardoned. 3. That the end of her trouble is answered. "She has received of the Lord double for" the cure of "all her sins," sufficient, and more than sufficient, to part between her and her idols, the worship of which was the great sin for which God had a controversy with them, and from which he designed to reclaim them by their captivity in Babylon. And it had that effect upon them; it begat in them a rooted antipathy to idolatry, and was physic doubly strong for the purging out of that iniquity. Or, it may be taken as the language of the Divine compassion; "His soul was grieved for the misery of Israel," Jud. x. 16; and, like a tender father, since he spake against them, he earnestly remembered them, Jer. xxxi. 20, and was ready to say he had given them too much correction. They, being very penitent, acknowledged that God had punished them less than their iniquities deserved; but he, being very pitiful, owned that he had punished them more than they deserved. True penitents have, indeed, in Christ and his sufferings, received of the Lord's hand double for all their sins; for the satisfaction Christ made by his death was of such an infinite value that it was more than double to the demerits of sin; for God "spared not his own Son."

3 The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness,
Prepare ye the way of the LORD,
Make straight in the desert a highway for our God.
4 Every valley shall be exalted,
And every mountain and hill shall be made low:
And the crooked shall be made straight,
And the rough places plain:
5 And the glory of the LORD shall be revealed,
And all flesh shall see it together:
For the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it.
6 The voice said, Cry. And he said, What shall I cry?
All flesh is grass,
And all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field:
7 The grass withereth, the flower fadeth:
Because the spirit of the LORD bloweth upon it:
Surely the people is grass.
8 The grass withereth, the flower fadeth:
But the word of our God shall stand for ever.

The time to favour Zion, yea, the set time, being come, the people of God must be prepared for the favours designed them by repentance and faith; and to call them to both these we have here "the voice of one crying in the wilderness," which may be applied to those prophets who were with the captives in their wilderness state, and when they saw the day of their deliverance dawn, called earnestly upon them to prepare for it, and assured them all the difficulties that stood in the way of their deliverance should be got over. It is a good sign mercy is in the preparing for us, if we find God's grace preparing us for it, Ps. x. 17. But it must be applied to John the Baptist; for, though God was the speaker, he was "the voice of one crying in the wilderness," and his business was to prepare the way of the Lord, to dispose men's minds for the reception and entertainment of the Gospel of Christ. The way of the Lord is prepared,

First. By repentance for sin. That was it which John Baptist preached to all Judah and Jerusalem, Mat. iii. 2, 5; and thereby "made ready a people prepared for the Lord," Lu. i. 17. The alarm is given; let all take notice of it at their peril. God is coming in a way of mercy, and we must prepare for him, ver. 3—5. Applying it to their captivity, it may be taken as a promise, that whatever difficulties lie in their way, when they return, they shall be removed. This voice in the wilderness (Divine power going along with it) sets pioneers on work to level the roads. But it may be taken as a call to duty, and it is the same duty that we are called to, in preparation for Christ's entrance into our souls.

1. We must get into such a frame of spirit as will dispose us to receive Christ and his Gospel. "Prepare ye the way of the Lord;" that is, prepare yourselves for him, and let all that be suppressed which would be an obstruction to his entrance. Make room for Christ; make straight a highway for him. If he prepare the end for us, we ought sure to prepare the way for him. Prepare for the Saviour. "Lift up your heads, O ye gates," Ps. xxiv. 7, 9. Prepare for the salvation, the great salvation, and other lesser deliverances. Let us get to be fit for them, and then God will work them out. Let us not stand in our own light, nor put a bar in our own door, but find or make a highway for him, even in that which was desert ground. This is that for which he waits to be gracious.

2. We must get our hearts levelled by Divine grace. Those that were hindered from comfort in Christ, by their dejections and despondencies, are the valleys that must be exalted. Those that are hindered from comfort in Christ, by a proud conceit of their own merit and worth, are the mountains and hills that must be made low. Those that have entertained prejudices against the word and ways of God, that are untractable, and disposed to thwart and contradict even that which is plain and easy, because it agrees not with their corrupt inclinations and secular interests, are the crooked that must be made straight, and the rough places that must be made plain. Let but the Gospel of Christ have a fair hearing, and it cannot fail of acceptance: this prepares the way of the Lord; and thus God will, by his grace, prepare his own way in all the vessels of mercy, whose heart he opens as he did Lydia's.

And when this is done, "the glory of the Lord shall be revealed," ver. 5. 1st. When the captives are prepared for deliverance, Cyrus shall proclaim it, and they shall have the benefit it; and they only whose hearts the Lord stirred up with courage and resolution to break through the discouragements that lay in their way, and to make nothing of the hills and valleys, and all the rough places. 2nd. When John Baptist hath for some time preached repentance, mortification, and reformation, and so made ready a people prepared for the Lord, Lu. i. 17, then the Messiah himself shall be revealed in his glory, working miracles, which John did not; and by his grace, which is his glory, binding up and healing with consolations those whom John had wounded with convictions. And this revelation of Divine glory shall be "a light to lighten the Gentiles;" "all flesh shall see it together," and not the Jews only; they shall see and admire it, see it and bid it welcome, as the return out of captivity was taken notice of by the neighbour nations, Ps. cxxvi. 3. And it shall be the accomplishment of the word of God, not one iota or tittle of which shall fall to the ground; "the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it," and therefore the hand of the Lord will effect it.

Secondly. By confidence in the word of the Lord, and not in any creature. "The mouth of the Lord having spoken it," the voice hath this farther to cry, he that hath ears to hear, let him hear it, "The word of our God shall stand for ever," ver. 8; that is,

1. By this accomplishment of the prophecies and promises of salvation, and the performance of them to the utmost in due time, it appears that the word of the Lord is sure, and what may be safely relied on. And then we are prepared for deliverance, when we depend entirely upon the word of God, build our hopes on that, with an assurance that it will not make us ashamed; and in a dependence upon this word we must be brought to own that all flesh is grass, withering and fading. 1st. The power of man, when it doth appear against the deliverance, is not to be feared, for it shall be as grass before the word of the Lord, it shall wither and be trodden down. The insulting Babylonians, who promise themselves that the desolations of Jerusalem shall be perpetual, are but as grass, which the Spirit of the Lord blows upon, makes nothing of, but blasts all its glory; for the word of the Lord, which promises their deliverance, shall stand for ever, and it is not in the power of their enemies to hinder the execution of it. 2nd. The power of man, when it would appear for the deliverance, yet is not to be trusted to; for it is but as grass in comparison with the word of the Lord, which is the only firm foundation for us to build our hope upon. When God is about to work salvation for his people, he will take them off from depending upon creatures, and looking for it from hills and mountains: they shall fail them, and their expectations from them shall be frustrated, the Spirit of the Lord shall blow upon them; for God will have no creature to be a rival with him for the hope and confidence of his people; and as it is his word only that shall stand for ever, so in that word only our faith must stand. When we are brought to this, then, and not till then, we are fit for mercy.

2. The word of our God, that glory of the Lord which is now to be revealed, the Gospel, and that grace which is brought with it to us, and wrought by it in us, shall stand for ever; and this is the satisfaction of all believers, when they find all their creature comforts withering and fading like grass. Thus the apostle applies it to the word which by the Gospel is preached unto us, and which lives and abides for ever, as the incorruptible seed by which we are born again, 1 Pet. i. 23—25. To prepare the way of the Lord, we must be convinced, 1st. Of the vanity of the creature; that all flesh is grass, weak and withering. We ourselves are so, and therefore cannot save ourselves; all our friends are so, and therefore are unable to save us. All the beauty of the creature, which might render it amiable, is but as the flower of grass, soon blasted, and therefore cannot recommend us to God, and to his acceptance. We are dying creatures; all our comforts in this world are dying comforts, and therefore cannot be the felicity of our immortal souls; we must look farther for a salvation, look farther for a portion. 2nd. Of the validity of the promise of God. We must be convinced that word of the Lord can do that for us which all flesh cannot; that, forasmuch as it stands for ever, it will furnish us with a happiness that will run parallel with the duration of our souls, that must live for ever; for the things that are not seen, but must be believed, are eternal.

9 O Zion, that bringest good tidings,
Get thee up into the high mountain;
O Jerusalem, that bringest good tidings,
Lift up thy voice with strength;
Lift it up, be not afraid;
Say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God!
10 Behold, the Lord GOD will come with strong hand,
And his arm shall rule for him:
Behold, his reward is with him,
And his work before him.
11 He shall feed his flock like a shepherd:
He shall gather the lambs with his arm,
And carry them in his bosom,
And shall gently lead those that are with young.

It was promised, ver. 5, that "the glory of the Lord shall be revealed;" that xl. 16. The Chaldee properly explains Lebanon here by "the trees of Lebanon." The forests and animals of Lebanon would not make a burnt-offering worthy of the Divine Lord of all.

xl. 19. "The workman melteth a graven image;" i.e., he casts in a mould an image of melted metal. Such images were plated with gold and decorated with chains. The mention of idol-making in this verse and the next is in order to remind men of the impossibility of fashioning any likeness of the Most High.

xl. 26. The stars in the firmament deserve no worship, for they are the creatures of God, and under his absolute control.

xl. 31. There have been some curious speculations about this verse, chiefly owing to erroneous opinions about the eagle. Some of the old writers thought that the eagle in his old age renewed his feathers, and with them his youth. Some even went so far as to say that the eagle ascended to the sun every ten years and burnt off his feathers, which were replaced by new ones. There is nothing in it with the hopes of which God's people must be comforted. Now here we are told,

First. How it shall be revealed, ver. 9. 1. It shall be revealed to Zion and Jerusalem. Notice shall be given of it to the remnant that are left in Zion and Jerusalem, the poor of the land, that were vinedressers and husbandmen; it shall be told them that their brethren shall return to them; and to the captives who belonged to Zion and Jerusalem, and retained their affection for them. Zion is said to dwell with the daughter of Babylon, Zec. ii. 7; and there she receives notice of Cyrus' gracious proclamation; and so the margin reads it, 'O thou that tellest good tidings to Zion,' &c., meaning the persons that were employed in publishing that proclamation. Let them do it with a good will, let them make the country ring of it, and let them tell it to the sons of Zion in their own language, saying to them, "Behold your God." 2. It shall be published by Zion and Jerusalem; so the text reads it. They that remain here, or that were already returned, when they find the deliverance proceeding towards perfection, let them proclaim it in the most public places, from whence they may be best heard by all the cities of Judah; let them proclaim it as loud as they can; let them lift up their voice with strength, and not be afraid of overstraining themselves. Let them not be afraid lest the enemy should hear it, and quarrel with them, or lest it should not prove true, or not such good tidings as at first it appeared. Let them say to the cities of Judah, and all the inhabitants of the country, "Behold your God." When God is going on with the salvation of his people, let them industriously spread the news among their friends; let them tell them, it is God that has done it; whoever were the instruments, God was the author. It is their God, a God in covenant with them; and he doth it as theirs, and they will reap the benefit and comfort of it. Behold him, take notice of his hand in it, and look above second causes. Behold, the God you have long looked for is come at last, ch. xxv. 9, "This is our God; we have waited for him." This may refer to the invitation which was sent forth from Jerusalem to the cities of Judah, as soon as they had set up an altar, immediately upon their return out of captivity, to come and join with them in their sacrifice, Ezr. iii. 2—4. When the worship of God is set up again, send notice of it to all your brethren, that they may share with you in the comfort of it. But this was to have its full accomplishment in the apostles' public and undaunted preaching of the Gospel to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. The voice crying in the wilderness gave notice that he was coming; but now notice is given that he is come. "Behold the Lamb of God!" take a full view of your Redeemer. Behold your king; behold your God.

Secondly. What that glory is which shall be revealed. Your God will come, and shew himself,

1. With the power and greatness of a prince; ver. 10, "He will come with strong hand;" too strong to be obstructed, though it may be opposed. His strong hand shall subdue his people to himself, and shall restrain and conquer his and their enemies. He will come who is strong enough to break through all difficulties that lie in his way. Our Lord Jesus was full of power, a mighty Saviour. Some read it, he will come against the mighty one, and overpower him, overcome him. Satan is the strong man armed; but our Lord Jesus is stronger than he; and he shall make it to appear that he is so. For, 1st. He shall reign in defiance of all opposition. "His arm shall rule," shall overrule "for him," for the fulfilling of his counsels, to his own glory; for he is his own end. 2nd. He shall recompense to all according to their works, as a righteous judge; "His reward is with him." He brings along with him, as a returning prince, punishments for the rebels, and preferments for his loyal subjects. 3rd. He shall proceed, and accomplish his purposes. "His work is before him," that is, he knows perfectly well what he has to do, which way to go about it, and how to compass it; he himself knows what he will do.

2. With the pity and tenderness of a shepherd, ver. 11. God is the shepherd of Israel, Ps. lxxx. 1; Christ the good shepherd, Jno. x. 11. The same that rules with the strong hand of a prince, leads and feeds with the kind hand of a shepherd. 1st. He takes care of all his flock, the little flock. "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd." His word is food for his flock to feed on, his ordinances fields for them to feed in; his ministers are under shepherds, that are appointed to attend them. 2nd. He takes particular care of those that most need his care; the lambs that are weak, and cannot help themselves, and are accustomed to hardship, and those that are with young, that are therefore heavy, and if any harm be done them, are in danger of casting their young; he particularly takes care for a succession, that they may not fail, or be cut off. The good shepherd has a tender care for children that are towardly and hopeful; for young converts that are setting out in the way to heaven; for weak believers, and those that are of a sorrowful spirit. These are the lambs of his flock, that shall be sure to want nothing that their case requires. First. He will gather them in the arms of his power; his strength shall be made perfect in their weakness, 2 Cor. xii. 9. He will gather them in when they wander, gather them up when they fall, gather them together when they are dispersed, and gather them home to himself at last; and all this with his own arm, out of which none shall be able to pluck them, Jno. x. 28. Secondly. He will carry them in the bosom of his love, and cherish them there. When they tire or are weary, are sick and faint, when they meet with foul way, he will carry them on, and take care they be not left behind. Thirdly. He will gently lead them; by his word he requires no more service, and by his providence he inflicts no more trouble, than he will enable them for; for he considers their frame.

12 Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand,
And meted out heaven with the span,
And comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure,
And weighed the mountains in scales,
And the hills in a balance?
13 Who hath directed the Spirit of the LORD,
Or being his counsellor hath taught him?
14 With whom took he counsel, and who instructed him,
And taught him in the path of judgment,
And taught him knowledge,
And shewed to him the way of understanding?
15 Behold, the nations are as a drop of a bucket,
And are counted as the small dust of the balance:
Behold, he taketh up the isles as a very little thing.
16 And Lebanon is not sufficient to burn,
Nor the beasts thereof sufficient for a burnt offering.
17 All nations before him are as nothing;
And they are counted to him less than nothing, and vanity.

The scope of these verses is to shew what a great and glorious being the Lord Jehovah is, who is Israel's God and Saviour. It comes in here, 1. To encourage his people that were captives in Babylon to hope in him, and to depend upon him for deliverance, though they were never so weak, and their oppressors never so strong. 2. To engage them to cleave to him, and not to turn aside after other gods; for there are none to be compared with him. 3. To possess all those who receive the glad tidings of redemption by Christ with a holy awe and reverence of God. Though it was said, ver. 9, "Behold your God," and ver. 11, that "he shall feed his flock like a shepherd," yet these condescensions of his grace must not be thought of with any diminution to the transcendencies of his glory. Let us see how great our God is, and fear before him. For,

First. His power is unlimited, and what no creature can compare with, much less contend with, ver. 12. 1. He hath a vast reach. View the celestial globe, and you are astonished at the extent of it; but the great God metes the heavens with a span; to him they are but a handbreadth, so large-handed is he. View the terraqueous globe, and he has the command of that too; all the waters in the world he can measure in the hollow of his hand, where we can grasp but a little water; and the dry land he easily manageth, for he comprehends the dust of the earth in a measure, or with his three fingers. It is no more to him than a pugil, or that which we take up between our thumb and two fingers. 2. He hath a vast strength, and can as easily move mountains and hills as the tradesman heaves his goods into the scales and out of them again; and poiseth them with his hand as exactly as if he weighed them in a pair of balances. This may refer to the work of creation, when the heavens were stretched out as exactly as that which is spanned; and the earth and waters put together in just proportions, as if they had been measured; and the mountains made of such a weight as to serve for a ballast to the globe, and no more. Or, to the work of providence, (which is a continual creation,) and the consistency of all the creatures with each other.

Secondly. His wisdom is unsearchable, and what no creature can give either information or direction to, ver. 13, 14. As none can do what God has done and doth, so none can assist him in the doing of it, or suggest any thing to him which he thought not of. When the Lord by his Spirit made the world, Job xxvi. 13, there was none that directed his Spirit, or gave him any advice, either what to do or how to do it. Nor doth he need any counsellor to direct him in the government of the world; nor is there any with whom he consults, as kings (the wisest of them) do with them that know law and judgment, Est. i. 13. God needs not to be told what is done, for he knows it perfectly; nor needs he be advised concerning what is to be done, for he knows both the right end, and the proper means. This is much insisted upon here, because the poor captives had no politicians among them to manage their concerns at court, or to put them in a way of gaining their liberty. No matter, saith the prophet, you have a God to act for you, that needs not the assistance of statesman. In the great work of our redemption by Christ, matters were concerted before the world, when there were none to teach God in the path of judgment, 1 Cor. ii. 7.

Thirdly. The nations of the world are nothing in comparison of him, ver. 15, 17. Take them all together, all the great and mighty nations of the earth,—kings the most pompous, kingdoms the most populous, both the most wealthy; take the isles, the multitude of them, the isles of the Gentiles; and, before him, when they stand in competition with him, or in opposition to him, they "are as a drop of the bucket," compared with the vast ocean, or "the small dust of the balance," which doth not serve to turn it; and therefore is not regarded, it is so small in comparison with all the dust of the earth. He takes them up, and throws them away from him, "as a very little thing," not worth speaking of. They are all in his eye as nothing, as if they had no being at all; for they add nothing to his perfection and all-sufficiency. "They are counted" by him, and are to be counted by us, in comparison of him, "less than nothing, and vanity." When he pleaseth, he can as easily bring them all into nothing as at first he brought them out of nothing. When God has work to do, he values not either the assistance or the resistance of any creature; they are all vanity, (the word that is used for the chaos, Gen. i. 2,) to which they will at last be reduced. Let this beget in us high thoughts of God, and low thoughts of this world, and engage us to make God, and not man, both our fear and our hope. This magnifies God's love to the world, that, though it is of such small account and value with him, yet for the redemption of it he gave his only begotten Son, Jno. iii. 16.

Fourthly. The services of the church can make no addition to him, nor do they bear any proportion to his infinite perfections; ver. 16, "Lebanon is not sufficient to burn." Not the wood of it, to be for the fuel of the altar, though it be so well stocked with cedars; not the beasts of it, to be for sacrifices, though it be so well stocked with cattle, ver. 16. Whatever we honour God with, it falls infinitely short of the merit of his perfections; for "he is exalted far above all blessing and praise," all burnt offerings and sacrifices.

18 To whom then will ye liken God?
Or what likeness will ye compare unto him?
19 The workman melteth a graven image,
And the goldsmith spreadeth it over with gold,
And casteth silver chains.
20 He that is so impoverished that he hath no oblation
Chooseth a tree that will not rot;
He seeketh unto him a cunning workman to prepare a graven image, that shall not be moved.
21 Have ye not known? have ye not heard?
Hath it not been told you from the beginning?
Have ye not understood from the foundations of the earth?
22 It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth,
And the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers;
That stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain,
And spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in:
23 That bringeth the princes to nothing;

the text to favour these fancies, as the words only allude to the power of the eagle's flight.

xli. 1. This verse is an appeal to the Gentile world, its islands and nations. The word rendered "people" is plural in the Hebrew.

xli. 2. In the Hebrew the word for "the righteous man" is righteousness, and the whole verse may be translated accordingly. But it is manifestly righteousness personified, and therefore translators generally render it a just or righteous man, and suppose that Cyrus is intended. One interpretation is, however, that Abraham is meant; and another, that it is the Messiah. On the whole we prefer the application to Cyrus, whose extraordinary career well accords with the details in the following verses, which yet, it must be remembered, are in the language of poetry, and highly figurative.

xli. 5—7. Barnes says on verse 5, "The prophet evidently refers to what he says in the following verses, that they formed treaties, endeavoured to prepare for self-defence, looked to their idol gods,

He maketh the judges of the earth as vanity.
24 Yea, they shall not be planted;
Yea, they shall not be sown:
Yea, their stock shall not take root in the earth:
And he shall also blow upon them, and they shall wither,
And the whirlwind shall take them away as stubble.
25 To whom then will ye liken me,
Or shall I be equal?
Saith the Holy One.
26 Lift up your eyes on high, and behold
Who hath created these things,
That bringeth out their host by number:
He calleth them all by names by the greatness of his might, for that he is strong in power;
Not one faileth.

The prophet here reproves those, 1. That represented God by creatures, and so changed his truth into a lie, and his glory into shame; that made images, and then said they resembled God, and paid their homage to them accordingly. 2. That put creatures in the place of God, that feared them more than God, as if they were a match for him; or loved them more than God, as if they were fit to be rivals with him. Twice the challenge is here made, "To whom will ye liken God?" ver. 18; and again, ver. 25, the Holy One himself saith, "To whom will ye liken me?" This shews the folly and absurdity, 1st. Of corporal idolatry; making visible images of him who is invisible; imagining the image to be animated by the Deity, and the Deity to be presentiated by the image; which, as it was an instance of the corruption of the human nature, so it was an intolerable injury to the honour of the Divine nature. 2nd. Of spiritual idolatry; making creatures equal with God in our affections. Proud people make themselves equal with God; covetous people make their money equal with God; and whatever we esteem or love, fear or hope in, more than God, that creature we equal with God; which is the highest affront imaginable to him who is God over all. Now, to shew the absurdity of this,

First. The prophet describes idols as despicable things, and worthy of the greatest contempt, ver. 19, 20. Look upon the better sort of them, which rich people set up and worship; they are made of some base metal, cast into what shape the founder pleaseth, and that is gilded, or overlaid with plates of gold, that it may pass for a golden image. It is a creature; for "the workman made it, therefore it is not God," Hos. viii. 6. It depended upon his will whether it should be a god at all, and of what shape it should be. It is a cheat, for it is gold on the outside, but within it is lead or copper; in this, indeed, representing the deities, that they were not what they seemed to be, and deceived their admirers. How despicable then are the worse sort of them, the poor men's gods! "He that is so impoverished," that he hath scarce a sacrifice to offer to his god when he has made him, yet will not be without an enshrined deity of his own; and, though he cannot procure one of brass or stone, he will have a wooden one rather than none; and for that purpose "chooseth a tree that will not rot" presently, and of that he will have his graven image made. Both agree to have their image well fastened, that they may not be robbed of it. The better sort have silver chains to fix theirs with; and though it be but a wooden image, care is taken that it shall not be moved. Let us pause a little and see, 1. How these idolaters shame themselves, and what a reproach they put upon their own reason, in dreaming that gods of their own making, (Nehushtans, pieces of brass, or logs of wood,) should be able to do them any kindness. Thus vain were they in their imaginations; and how was their foolish heart darkened! 2. See how these idolaters shame us, who worship the only living and true God. They spared no cost upon their idols; we grudge that as waste which is spent in the service of our God. They took care they should not be moved; we wilfully provoke our God to depart from us.

Secondly. He describes God as infinitely great, and worthy of the highest veneration; so that between him and idols, whatever competition there may be, there is no comparison. To prove the greatness of God, he appeals,

1. To what they had heard of him by the hearing of the ear, and the consent of all ages and nations concerning him; ver. 20, "Have ye not known" by the very light of nature? "Hath it not been told you" by your fathers and teachers, according to the constant tradition received from their ancestors and predecessors, even "from the beginning?" Those notices of God are as ancient as the world. "Have ye not understood" it, as always acknowledged, "from the foundations of the earth," that God is "a great God, and a great king above all gods?" It has been a truth universally admitted, that there is an Infinite Being that is the fountain of all being. This is understood not only ever since the beginning of the world, but from and by the origin of the universe. It is founded upon the foundation of the earth; "The invisible things of God are clearly seen from the creation of the world," Rom. i. 20. Thou mayest not only ask thy father, and he shall tell thee this, and thine elders, Deu. xxxii. 7, but "ask them that go by the way," Job xxi. 9; ask the first man you meet, and he will say the same. Some read it, 'Will ye not know? will ye not hear?' For those that are ignorant of this are willingly ignorant. The light shines in their faces, but they shut their eyes against it. Now that which is here said of God is,

1st. That he has the command of all the creatures. The heaven and the earth themselves are under his management; "He sits upon the circle" or globe "of the earth," ver. 22. He that has the special residence of his glory in the upper world, yet maintains a dominion over this lower world, gives law to it, and directs all the motions of it to his own glory. He sits undisturbed upon the earth, and so establisheth it. He is still stretching out the heavens, his power and providence keep them still stretched out, and will do so till the day comes that they shall be rolled together like a scroll. He spreads them out as easily as we draw a curtain to and fro; opening these curtains in the morning, and drawing them close again at night; and the heaven is to this earth as a tent to dwell in; it is a canopy drawn over our heads; et quod tegit omnia cœlum,—'and it encircles all.'—Ovid. See Ps. civ. 2.

2nd. That the children of men, even the greatest and mightiest, are as nothing before him. The numerous inhabitants of this earth are in his eye as grasshoppers in ours; so little and inconsiderable, of such small value, and of such little use, and so easily crushed. Proud men's lifting up themselves is but like the grasshopper's leap; in an instant they must down to the earth again. If the spies thought themselves grasshoppers before the sons of Anak, Num. xiii. 33, what are we before the great God? Grasshoppers live but a while, and live carelessly, not like the ant; so do the most of men.

3rd. That those that appear and act against him, how formidable soever they may be to their fellow-creatures, will certainly be humbled and brought down by the mighty hand of God, ver. 23, 24. Princes and judges that have great authority, and abuse it to the support of oppression and injustice, they make nothing of those about them, "As for all their enemies, they puff at them," Ps. x. 5; xii. 5. But when the great God takes them to task, he brings them to nothing; he humbles them and tames them, and makes them as vanity; little regarded, neither feared nor loved. He makes them utterly unable to stand before his judgments, which shall either, First. Prevent their settlement in their authority; "They shall not be planted, they shall not be sown;" and those are the two ways of propagating plants, either by seed or slips. Nay, if they should gain a little interest, and so be planted or sown, yet "their stock shall not take root in the earth;" they shall not continue long in power. Eliphaz saw the foolish taking root, but suddenly cursed their habitation: and then how soon is the fig-tree withered away! Or, Secondly. He will blast them when they think they are settled. He doth but blow upon them, and then they shall wither and come to nothing, and "the whirlwind shall take them away as stubble." For God's wrath, though it seem at first to blow slightly upon them, yet will soon become a mighty whirlwind. When God judgeth, he will overcome. Those that will not bow before him cannot stand before him.

2. He appeals to what their eyes saw of him, ver. 26, "Lift up your eyes on high;" be not always poring on this earth, (O curvæ in terras animæ et cœlestium inanes,—'Degenerate minds, that can bend so towards the earth, having nothing celestial in them!) but sometimes look up; Os homini sublime dedit, cœlumque, tueri jussit,—'Heaven gave to man an erect countenance, and bade him gaze at the stars.' Behold the glorious lights of heaven; consider who has created them. They neither made nor marshalled themselves; doubtless, therefore, there is a God that gave them their being, power, and motion. What we see of the creature should lead us to the Creator. The idolaters, when they lifted up their eyes and beheld the hosts of heaven, being wholly merged in sense, looked no farther, but worshipped them, Deu. iv. 19 Job xxxi. 26. Therefore the prophet here directs us to make use of our reason as well as our senses, and to consider who created them, and to pay our homage to him. Give him the glory of his sovereignty over them; "He brings out their host by number," as a general draws out the squadrons and battalions of his army. Of the knowledge he hath of them; "He calls them all by names," proper names, according as their place and influence are, Ps. cxlvii. 4. And of the use he makes of them; when he calls them out to any service, so obsequious are they, that "by the greatness of his might, not one of them fails;" but, as when "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera," every one doth that to which he is appointed. To make these creatures, therefore, rivals with God, which are such ready servants to him, is an injury to them as well as an affront to him.

27 Why sayest thou, O Jacob, and speakest, O Israel,
My way is hid from the LORD,
And my judgment is passed over from my God?
28 Hast thou not known? hast thou not heard,
That the everlasting God, the LORD
The Creator of the ends of the earth,
Fainteth not, neither is weary?
There is no searching of his understanding.
29 He giveth power to the faint;
And to them that have no might he increaseth strength.
30 Even the youths shall faint and be weary,
And the young men shall utterly fall: [strength;
31 But they that wait upon the LORD shall renew their
They shall mount up with wings as eagles;
They shall run, and not be weary;
And they shall walk, and not faint.

Here, First. The prophet reproves the people of God, who are now supposed to be captives in Babylon, for their unbelief and distrust of God and the dejections and despondencies of their spirit under their affliction; ver. 27, "Why sayest thou, O Jacob," to thyself and to those about thee, "My way is hid from the Lord?" Why dost thou make hard and melancholy conclusions concerning thyself and thy present case, as if it were desperate? 1. The titles he here gives them were enough to shame them out of their distrusts, "O Jacob, O Israel!" Let them remember whence they took those names,—from one who had found God faithful to him, and kind in all his straits; and why they bore those names,—as God's professing people, a people in covenant with him. 2. The way of reproving them is by reasoning with him. Why? consider whether thou hast any ground to say so. Many of our foolish frets and foolish fears would vanish before a strict inquiry into the causes of them. 3. That which they are reproved for is an ill-natured, ill-favoured word they spoke of God, as if he had cast them off. There seems to be an emphasis laid upon their saying it; Why sayest thou and speakest thou? It is bad to have evil thoughts rise in our mind, but it is worse to put an imprimatur to them, and turn them into evil words. David reflects with regret upon what he said in his haste, when he was in distress. 4. The ill word they said was a word of despair concerning their present calamitous condition. They were ready to conclude, 1st. That God would not heed them. "My way is hid from the Lord;" that is, he takes no notice of our straits, nor concerns himself any more in our concernments There are such difficulties in our case, that even Divine wisdom and power will be nonplussed. A man whose way is hid is one whom God hath hedged in, Job iii. 23. 2nd. That God could not help them. "My judgment is passed over from my God;" that is, My case is past relief, so far past it, that God himself cannot redress the grievances of it. "Our bones are dried," Eze. xxxvii. 11.

Secondly. He reminds them of that which, if duly considered, was sufficient to silence all those fears and distrusts. For their conviction, as before for the conviction of idolaters, ver. 21, he appeals to what they had known, and what they had heard. Jacob and Israel were a knowing people, or might have been; and their knowledge came by hearing, for wisdom cried in their chief places of concourse. Now, among other things, they had heard that God had spoken once, twice, yea, many a time they had heard it, "That power belongs unto God," Ps. lxii. 10. That is,

1. He is himself an Almighty God. He must needs be so; for he is "the

and encouraged each other in their attempts to offer a successful resistance to the glorious arms of Cyrus." New zeal for religion, both false and true, is by no means uncommon in time of peril and danger, both public and personal.

xli. 8. Idolaters would trust in gods that could not help them, but Israel would be under the Lord's especial protection, as the offspring of Abraham and Jacob, and the subjects of his faithful covenant.

xli. 14. To call a man a worm is as much as to call him a feeble creature of no importance. Here the whole Hebrew nation is so styled; and yet in the next verses this worm Jacob is assured that through God's help he shall perform gigantic works.

xli. 15. Like a powerful threshing machine, Israel should beat down proud and mighty foes, who should be powerless before him.

xli. 17–20. By some these promises have been understood of the exiles returning from the captivity of Babylon, but it is doubtful whether the words have not a wider meaning. The shittah tree is everlasting God, even Jehovah.' He was from eternity; he will be to eternity; and therefore with him there is no deficiency, no decay. He hath his being of himself; and therefore all his perfections must needs be boundless. He is without beginning of days, or end of life; and therefore with him there is no change. He is also "the Creator of the ends of the earth;" that is, of the whole earth, and all that is in it, from end to end. He therefore is the rightful owner and ruler of all, and must be concluded to have an absolute power over all, and an all-sufficiency to help his people in their greatest straits. Doubtless he is still as able to save his church as he was at first to make the world. 1st. He hath wisdom to contrive the salvation, and that wisdom is never at a loss: "There is no searching of his understanding," so as to countermine the counsels of it, and defeat its intentions; no, nor so as to determine what he will do; for he hath ways by himself, ways in the sea. None can say, Thus far God's wisdom can go, and no farther; for when we know not what to do he knows. 2nd. He hath power to bring about the salvation; and that power is never exhausted; "He fainteth not, neither is weary;" upholds the whole creation, and governs all the creatures, and is neither tired nor toiled; and therefore no doubt he has power to relieve his church when it is brought never so low, without weakness or weariness.

2. He giveth strength and power to his people, and helps them by enabling them to help themselves. He that is the strong God is the strength of Israel. 1st. He can help the weak, ver. 29. Many a time "he giveth power to the faint;" to them that are ready to faint away, and "to them that have no might," he "not only giveth," but "increaseth strength," as there is more and more occasion for it. Many, out of bodily weakness, are wonderfully recovered, and made strong by the providence of God. And many that are feeble in spirit, timorous and faint-hearted, unable for services and sufferings, yet are strengthened by the grace of God with all might in the inward man. To them who are sensible of their weakness, and ready to acknowledge they have no might, God doth in a special manner increase strength; for when we are weak in ourselves, then are we strong in the Lord. 2nd. He will help the willing. Will help those that, in an humble dependence upon him, help themselves, and do well for those that do their best, ver. 30, 31. Those that trust to their own sufficiency, and are so confident of that, that they neither exert themselves to the utmost, nor seek unto God for his grace, are "the youths, and the young men," who are strong, but are apt to think themselves stronger than they are. And they "shall faint and be weary," yea, they "shall utterly fail," in their services, in their conflicts, and under their burthens; they shall soon be made to see the folly of trusting to themselves. "But they that wait on the Lord," that make conscience of their duty to him, and by faith rely upon him, and commit themselves to his conduct; they that do so God will not fail them. First. They shall have grace sufficient for them. They "shall renew their strength," as their work is renewed; as there is new occasion, they shall be anointed, and their lamps supplied with fresh oil. God will be their arm every morning, ch. xxxiii. 2. If at any time they have been foiled, and weakened, they shall recover themselves, and so renew their strength. Heb. 'They shall change their strength,' as their work is changed; doing work, suffering work. They shall have strength to labour, strength to wrestle, strength to resist, strength to bear. As the day, so shall the strength be. Secondly. They shall use this grace for the best purposes. Being strengthened, 1st. They shall soar upwards, upwards towards God. "They shall mount up with wings like eagles;" so strongly, so swiftly, so high, and heavenwards. In the strength of Divine grace their souls shall ascend above the world, and even enter into the holiest. Pious and devout affections are the eagles' wings on which gracious souls mount up, Ps. xxv. 1. 2nd. They shall press forwards, forwards towards heaven. They shall walk, they shall run, the way of God's commandments; cheerfully, and with alacrity,—they shall not be weary; constantly, and with perseverance,—they shall not faint; and therefore in due season they shall reap. Let Jacob and Israel, therefore, in their greatest distresses, continue waiting upon God; and not despair of relief and succour from him, timely and effectual.

CHAPTER XLI.

This chapter, as the former, is intended both for the conviction of idolaters and for the consolation of all God's faithful worshippers; for the Spirit is sent, and ministers employed by him, both to convince and to comfort. And however this might be primarily intended for the conviction of Babylonians, and the comfort of Israelites, or for the conviction of those in Israel that were addicted to idolatry, as multitudes were, and the comfort of those that kept their integrity, doubtless it was intended both for admonition and encouragement to us; admonition to keep ourselves from idols, and encouragement to trust in God. Here, I. God, by the prophet, shews the folly of those that worshipped idols, especially that thought their idols able to contest with him, and control him, ver. 1—9. II. He encourageth his faithful ones to trust in him, with an assurance that he would take their part against their enemies, make them victorious over them, and bring about a happy change of their affairs, ver. 10—20. III. He challengeth the idols, that were rivals with him for men's adoration, to vie with him either for knowledge or power, either to shew things to come or to do good or evil, ver. 21—29. So that the chapter may be summed up in those words of Elijah, "If Jehovah be God, then follow him; but if Baal be God, then follow him;" and in the people's acknowledgment upon the issue of the trial, "Jehovah he is the God, Jehovah he is the God."

KEEP silence before me, O islands; and let the people renew their strength:
Let them come near; then let them speak
Let us come near together to judgment.
2 Who raised up the righteous man from the east.
Called him to his foot,
Gave the nations before him,
And made him rule over kings?
He gave them as the dust to his sword,
And as driven stubble to his bow.
3 He pursued them, and passed safely;
Even by the way that he had not gone with his feet.
4 Who hath wrought and done it, calling the generations from the beginning?
I the LORD, the first,
And with the last; I am he.
5 The isles saw it, and feared:
The ends of the earth were afraid,
Drew near, and came.
6 They helped every one his neighbour;
And every one said to his brother, Be of good courage.
7 So the carpenter encouraged the goldsmith,
And he that smootheth with the hammer him that smote the anvil,
Saying, It is ready for the sodering:
And he fastened it with nails, that it should not be moved.
8 But thou, Israel, art my servant,
Jacob whom I have chosen,
The seed of Abraham my friend.
9 Thou whom I have taken from the ends of the earth,
And called thee from the chief men thereof,
And said unto thee, Thou art my servant;
I have chosen thee, and not cast thee away.

The particular instance of God's care for his people Israel, in raising up Cyrus to be their deliverer, is here insisted upon as a great proof both of his sovereignty above all idols and of his power to protect his people. Here is,

First. A general challenge to the worshippers and admirers of idols to make good their pretensions in competition with God, and opposition to him, ver. 1. It is renewed, ver. 21, "Produce your cause;" the court is set, summons are sent to the islands that lay most remote, (but not out of God's jurisdiction, for he is the Creator and possessor of the ends of the earth,) to make their appearance, and give their attendance. Silence, as usual, is proclaimed, while the cause is in trying: "Keep silence before me," and "judge nothing before the time." While the cause is in trying between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan, it becomes all people silently to expect the issue; not to object against God's proceedings, but to be confident that he will carry the day. The defendants of idolatry are called to say what they can in defence of it: "Let them renew their strength" in opposition to God, and see whether it be equal to the strength which they renew that wait upon him, ch. xl. 31. Let them try their utmost efforts, whether by force of arms or force of argument. "Let them come near," they shall not complain that God's dread makes them afraid, Job xiii. 21, so that they cannot say what they have to say in vindication and honour of their idols. No, "let them speak" freely; "let us come near together to judgment." Note, 1. The cause of God and his kingdom is not afraid of a fair trial; if the case be but fairly stated, it will be surely carried in favour of religion. 2. The enemies of God's church, and his holy religion, may safely be challenged to say and do their worst for the support of their unrighteous cause. "He that sits in heaven laughs at them," and the daughter of Zion too despiseth them; for great is the truth, and will prevail.

Secondly. He particularly challengeth the idols to do that for their worshippers and against his, which he had done, and would do, for his worshippers, and against theirs. Different senses are given of ver. 2, concerning the righteous man raised up from the east; and, since we cannot determine which is the true, we will make use of each as good. That which is to be proved is, 1. That the Lord is God alone, the first, and with the last, ver. 4. That he is infinite, eternal, and unchangeable; that he governed the world from the beginning, and will to the end of time; he has reigned of old, and will reign for ever: the counsels of his kingdom were from eternity, and the continuance of it will be to eternity. 2. That Israel is his servant, ver. 8, whom he owns, and protects, and employs, and in whom he is and will be glorified. As there is a God in heaven, so there is a church on earth that is his particular care. Elijah prays, 1 Kin. xviii. 36, "Let it be known that thou art God, and that I am thy servant." Now to prove this he shews,

1. That it was he who called Abraham, the father of this despised nation, out of an idolatrous country, and, by many instances of his favour, made his name great, Gen. xii. 2. He is the righteous man whom God raised up from the east. Of him the Chaldee paraphrase expressly understands it, 'Who brought Abraham publicly from the east?' To maintain the honour of the people of Israel, it was very proper to shew what a figure this great ancestor of theirs made in his day. And ver. 8 seems to be the explication of it, where God calls Israel, "the seed of Abraham my friend;" and ver. 4 he calls the generations, namely the generations of Israel, from the beginning. Also, to put contempt upon idolatry, and particularly the Chaldean idolatry, it was proper to shew how Abraham was called from serving other gods, Jos. xxiv. 2, &c.; so that an early testimony was borne against that idolatry which boasted so much of its antiquity. Also, to encourage the captives in Babylon to hope that God would find a way for their return to their own land, it was proper to remind them how at first he brought their father Abraham out of the same country into this land, to give it him for an inheritance, Gen. xv. 7.

Now observe what is here said concerning him, 1st. That he was a righteous man, or righteousness, a man of righteousness, that "believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness;" and so he became the father of all those who, by faith in Christ, are made the righteousness of God through him, Rom. iv. 3, 11; 2 Cor. v. 21. He was a great example of righteousness in his day, and taught his household to do judgment and justice, Gen. xviii. 19 2nd. That God raised him up from the east, from Ur first, and afterwards from Haran, which lay east from Canaan. God would not let him settle in either of those places, but did by him as the eagle by her young, when she stirs up her nest. He raised him up out of iniquity, and made him pious; out of obscurity, and made him famous. 3rd. He "called him to his foot," to follow him with an implicit faith; for "he went out, not knowing whither he went," but whom he followed, Heb. xi. 8. Those whom God effectually calls he calls to his foot; to be subject to him, to attend him, and follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes. And we must all either come to his foot or be made his footstool. 4th. He "gave nations before him," the nations of Canaan, which he promised to make him master of, and thus far gave him an interest in, that the Hittites acknowledged him a mighty prince among them, Gen. xxiii. 6. He made him rule over those kings whom he conquered for the rescue of his brother Lot, Gen. xiv. And when God gave them as dust to his sword, and as driven stubble to his bow, that is, made them an easy prey to his catechised servants, he then "pursued them and passed safely;" or in peace, under the Divine protection, though it was in a way he was altogether unacquainted with. And so considerable was this victory, that Melchizedek himself appeared to celebrate it. Now only mentioned here, though its wood is frequently spoken of as shittim wood. There is little doubt that it is a kind of acacia, which is not uncommon in the Sinaitic peninsula, and is found near the Dead Sea. It produces the well-known gum-arabic; its bark is used for tanning leather, and camels eat its foliage. The oil tree is an oleaster. The so-called fir tree may perhaps be the cypress. What is intended by the word rendered pine is uncertain, and elm and plane have been suggested, as well as ilex and poplar.

xli. 21—24. The prophet renews his assault upon idols and their worshippers, by suggesting tests which would bring out the whole truth. In our country and day the great use to be made of this language is perhaps in opposition to those who believe that the living converse with the dead, and receive from them communications which sometimes infringe upon the Divine omniscience, and sometimes contravene all the scriptural representations of the elevated character, occupations, and enjoyments of departed saints. That a who did this but the great Jehovah? Can any of the gods of the heathen do so?

2. That it is he who will, ere long, raise up Cyrus from the east. It is spoken of according to the language of prophecy as a thing past, because as sure to be done in its season as if it were already done; God will 'raise him up in righteousness,' so it may be read, ch. xlv. 13, will call him to his foot, make what use of him he pleaseth; make him victorious over the nations that oppose his coming to the crown, and give him success in all his wars. And he shall be a type of Christ, who is righteousness itself, the Lord our righteousness, whom God will, in the fulness of time, raise up, and make victorious over the powers of darkness, so that he shall spoil them and make a show of them openly.

Thirdly. He exposeth the folly of idolaters, who, notwithstanding the convincing proofs which the God of Israel had given of his being God alone, yet obstinately persisted in their idolatry, nay, were so much the more hardened in it; ver. 5, "The isles of the Gentiles saw this," not only what God did for Abraham himself, but what he did for his seed for his sake; how he brought them out of Egypt, and made them rule over kings, and they feared, Ex. xv. 14—16. They were afraid, and, according to the summons, ver. 1, they drew near, and came. They could not avoid taking notice of what God did for Abraham and his seed; but, instead of helping to reason one another out of their sottish idolatries, they helped to confirm one another in them, ver. 6, 7. 1. They looked upon it as a dangerous design upon their religion, which they were jealous for the honour of, and were resolved, right or wrong, to adhere to, and therefore were alarmed to appear vigorously for the support of it, as the Ephesians for their Diana. When God, by his wonderful appearances on the behalf of his people, went about to wrest their idols from them, they held them so much the faster, and said one to another, "Be of good courage," let us unanimously agree to keep up the reputation of our gods; though Dagon fell before the ark, he shall be set up again in his place. One tradesman encourageth another to come into a confederacy for the keeping up of the noble craft of god-making. Thus oftentimes men's convictions exasperate their corruptions, and they are made worse both by the word and works of God, that should make them better. 2. They looked upon it as a dangerous design upon themselves; they thought themselves in danger from the growing greatness both of Abraham, that was a convert from idolatry, and of the people of Israel, that were separatists from it; and therefore they not only had recourse to their old gods for protection, but made new ones, Deu. xxxii. 17. "So the carpenter," having done his part at the timber-work, "encouraged the goldsmith" to do his part in gilding or overlaying it; and when it came into the goldsmith's hand, "he that smooths with the hammer," that polisheth it, or beats it thin, quickened "him that smote the anvil," bade him be expeditious, and told him "it was ready for the soldering," which, perhaps was the last operation about it, and then it is "fastened with nails," and you have a god of it presently. Do sinners thus hearten and quicken one another in the ways of sin, and shall not the servants of the living God both stir up one another to, and strengthen one another in, his service? Some read all this ironically, and by way of permission, 'Let them help every one his neighbour, let the carpenter encourage the goldsmith;' but all in vain, idols shall fall for all this.

Fourthly. He encourageth his own people to trust in him; ver. 8, 9, "But thou, Israel, art my servant." They know me not, but thou knowest me, and knowest better things than to join with such ignorant, besotted people as these, for it is intended as a warning to the people of God not to walk in the way of the heathen. They put themselves under the protection of these impotent deities, but thou art under my protection; "They that make them are like to them, and so is every one that trusteth in them;" but thou, O Israel, art the servant of a better master. Observe what is suggested here for the encouragement of God's people when they are threatened and insulted over: 1. They are God's servants, and he will not see them abused, especially for what they do in his service; "Thou art my servant," ver. 8; and ver. 9, "I have said unto thee, Thou art my servant," and I will not go back from my word. 2. He hath chosen them to be a peculiar people to himself; they were not forced upon him, but of his own goodwill he set them apart. 3. They were the seed of Abraham his friend. It was the honour of Abraham that he was called the friend of God, Jam. ii. 23, whom God covenanted and conversed with as a friend and the man of his counsel; and this honour have all the saints, Jno. xv. 15. And for the father's sake the people of Israel were beloved. God was pleased to look upon them as the posterity of an old friend of his, and therefore to be kind to them, for the covenant of friendship was made with Abraham and his seed. 4. He had sometimes, when they had been scattered among the heathen, fetched them from the ends of the earth, and taken them out of the hands of the chief ones thereof, and therefore he would not now abandon them. Abraham their father was fetched from a place at a great distance, and they in his loins; and those who had been thus far-fetched and dear-bought he could not easily part with. 5. He had not yet cast them away, though they had often provoked him, and therefore he would not now abandon them. What God has done for his people, and what he has farther engaged to do, should encourage them to trust in him at all times.

10 Fear thou not; for I am with thee:
Be not dismayed; for I am thy God:
I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee;
Yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness.
11 Behold, all they that were incensed against thee
Shall be ashamed and confounded:
They shall be as nothing;
And they that strive with thee shall perish.
12 Thou shalt seek them, and shalt not find them,
Even them that contended with thee:
They that war against thee
Shall be as nothing, and as a thing of nought.
13 For I the LORD thy God will hold thy right hand
Saying unto thee, Fear not; I will help thee.
14 Fear not, thou worm Jacob, and ye men of Israel;
I will help thee, saith the LORD,
And thy redeemer, the Holy One of Israel.
15 Behold, I will make thee a new sharp threshing instrument Having teeth:
Thou shalt thresh the mountains, and beat them small,
And shalt make the hills as chaff.
16 Thou shalt fan them, and the wind shall carry them away,
And the whirlwind shall scatter them:
And thou shalt rejoice in the LORD,
And shalt glory in the Holy One of Israel.
17 When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none,
And their tongue faileth for thirst,
I the LORD will hear them,
I the God of Israel will not forsake them.
18 I will open rivers in high places,
And fountains in the midst of the valleys:
I will make the wilderness a pool of water,
And the dry land springs of water.
19 I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah tree,
And the myrtle, and the oil tree;
I will set in the desert the fir tree,
And the pine, and the box tree together:
20 That they may see, and know,
And consider, and understand together,
That the hand of the LORD hath done this,
And the Holy One of Israel hath created it.

The scope of these verses is to silence the fears and encourage the faith of the servants of God in their distresses. Perhaps it is intended in the first place for the support of God's Israel in captivity, that all that faithfully serve God through patience and comfort of this scripture may have hope. And it is addressed to Israel as a single person, that it might the more easily and readily be accommodated and applied by every Israelite indeed to himself. That is a word both of caution, counsel, and comfort, which is so often repeated; "Fear thou not;" and again, ver. 13, "Fear not;" and, ver. 14, "Fear not, thou worm Jacob." Fear not the threatenings of the enemy, doubt not the promises of thy God; fear not that thou shalt perish in thine affliction, or that the promise of thy deliverance shall fail. It is against the mind of God that his people should be a timorous people. For the suppressing of fear he assures them,

First. That they may depend upon his presence with them as their God, and a God all-sufficient for them, in the worst of times. Observe with what a tenderness God speaks, and how willing he is to let the heirs of promise know the immutability of his counsel; and how desirous to lay them easy; "Fear thou not, for I am with thee;" not only within call, but present with thee; "Be not dismayed" at the power of those that are against thee, "for I am thy God," and engaged for thee. Art thou weak? "I will strengthen thee." Art thou destitute of friends? "I will help thee" in the time of need. Art thou ready to sink, ready to fall? "I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness," that right hand which is full of righteousness, in dispensing rewards and punishments, Ps. xlviii. 10. And again, ver. 13, it is promised, 1. That God will strengthen their hands, that is, will help them. "I will hold thy right hand," go hand in hand with thee, so some; he will take us by the hand as our guide, to lead us in our way; will help us up when we are fallen, or prevent our falls; when we are weak, he will hold us up; wavering, he will fix us; trembling, he will encourage us, and so hold us by the right hand, Ps. lxxiii. 23. 2. That he will silence their fears; Saying unto thee, Fear not. He hath said it again and again in his word, and hath there provided sovereign antidotes against fear. But he will go farther; he will, by his Spirit, say it to their hearts, and make them to hear it, and so will help them.

Secondly. That though their enemies be now very formidable, insolent, and severe, yet the day is coming when God will reckon with them, and they shall triumph over them. There are those that are incensed against God's people, and strive with them, ver. 11, and war against them, ver. 12, that hate them, and seek their ruin, and are continually picking quarrels with them. But let not God's people be incensed at them, nor strive with them, nor render evil for evil; but wait God's time, and believe, 1. That they shall be convinced of the folly at least, if not of the sin, of striving with God's people; and, finding it to no purpose, "they shall be ashamed and confounded," which might bring them to repentance, but will rather fill them with rage. 2. That they shall be quite ruined and undone; ver. 11, "They shall be as nothing" before the justice and power of God. When God comes to deal with his proud enemies, he makes nothing of them; or, they shall be brought to nothing,—shall be as if they had never been. This is repeated, ver. 12; they "shall be as nothing, and as a thing of nought;" or as that which is gone, and has failed. They that were formidable shall become despicable; that fancied they could do anything, shall be able to bring nothing to pass; that made a figure in the world, and a mighty noise, shall become mere ciphers, and be buried in silence. They shall perish, not only be nothing, but be miserable. Thou shalt seek them; shalt inquire what is become of them, that they do not appear as usual; but thou shalt not find them, as David, Ps. xxxvii. 36, "I sought him, but he could not be found."

Thirdly. That they themselves should become a terror to those who were now a terror to them, and victory should turn on their side, ver. 14—16. See here, 1. How Jacob and Israel are reduced and brought very low. It is the worm Jacob; so little, and weak, and defenceless, despised and trampled on by every body, forced to creep even into the earth for safety. And we must not wonder that Jacob is become a worm, when even Jacob's king calls himself "a worm, and no man," Ps. xxii. 6. God's people are sometimes as worms in their humble thoughts of themselves, and their enemies' haughty thoughts of them; worms, but not vipers, as their enemies are, not of the serpent's seed. God regards Jacob's low estate, and saith, "Fear not, thou worm Jacob;" fear not that thou shalt be crushed. "And ye men of Israel," 'ye few men,' so some read it, 'ye dead men,' so others, do not give up yourselves for gone notwithstanding. Note, The grace of God will silence fears, even then when there seems to be the greatest cause for them; "Perplexed, but not in despair." 2. How Jacob and Israel are advanced from this low estate, and made as formidable as ever they had been despicable. But "by whom shall Jacob arise, for he is small?" We are here told: "I will help thee, saith the Lord," soul can come from heaven to curl a girl's hair or buffet a face with a boot in the dark, and play similar pranks, is a notion as gross and pagan as any of those denounced in this passage. The pretence to power to predict the future has always been one of the most popular of impostures, and whatever else may be doubtful in regard to it, the Scriptures condemn it in all who have not received a direct commission and inspiration from God. To such commission and inspiration none can now lay claim without sacrilege.

xli. 25. This is to be understood of Cyrus, who "was born in Persia, in the country called in the Scriptures the East, but he went early to Media, and came from Media, under the direction of his uncle, Cyaxares, when he attacked and subdued Babylon. Media was situated on the north and north-east of Babylon."

xli. 27. The words, "The first shall say to Zion," do not convey the correct idea, which Dr. Alexander says is, "I am the first to say to Zion." The prophetic promise was first given by the Lord him-and it is the honour of God to help the weak. He will help them, for he is their Redeemer, that hath used to redeem them.—That has undertaken to do it. Christ is the Redeemer; from him is our help found. He will help them; for he is the Holy One of Israel, worshipped among them in the beauty of holiness, and engaged by promise to them. The Lord will help them, by enabling them to help themselves, and making Jacob to become a threshing instrument. Observe, He is but an instrument, a tool, in God's hand, that he is pleased to make use of; and he is an instrument of God's making, and is no more than God makes him. But if God make him a threshing instrument, he will make use of him, and therefore will make him fit for use, new and sharp, and having teeth, or sharp spikes; and then, by Divine direction and strength, "thou shalt thresh the mountains," the highest, and strongest, and most stubborn of thine enemies. Thou shalt not only beat them, but beat them small. They shall not be as the corn threshed out, which is valuable, and is carefully preserved; such God's people are, when they are under the flail, ch. xxi. 10, "O my threshing," but "the corn of my floor," that shall not be lost; but these are made as chaff, which is good for nothing, and which the husbandman is glad to get rid of. He pursues the metaphor, ver. 16; having threshed them, thou shalt winnow them, "and the wind shall scatter them." This perhaps had its accomplishment in part in the victories of the Jews over their enemies in the times of the Maccabees; but it seems in general designed to read the final doom of all the implacable enemies of the church of God, and to have its accomplishment likewise in the triumphs of the cross of Christ, the Gospel of Christ, and all the faithful followers of Christ, over the powers of darkness, which, first or last, shall all be dissipated, and in Christ all believers shall be more than conquerors, and "he that overcomes shall have power over the nations," Rev. ii. 26.

Fourthly. That hereupon they shall have abundance of comfort in God, and God shall have abundance of honour from them; "Thou shalt rejoice in the Lord," ver. 16. When we are freed from that which hindered our joy, and are blessed with that which is the matter of it, we ought to remember that God is our exceeding joy, and in him all our joys must terminate. When we rejoice over our enemies, we must rejoice in the Lord; for to him alone we owe our liberties and victories. Thou shalt also "glory in the Holy One of Israel," in thine interest in him, and relation to him, and what he has done for thee. And if thus we make God our praise and glory, we become to him for a praise and a glory.

Fifthly. That they shall have seasonable and suitable supplies of every thing that is proper for them, in the time of need; and, if there be occasion, God will again do for them as he did for Israel in their march from Egypt to Canaan, ver. 17—19. When the captives, either in Babylon or in their return thence, are in distress for want of water or shelter, God will take care of them, and one way or other make their journey, even through a wilderness, comfortable to them. But, doubtless, this promise hath more than such a private interpretation. Their return out of Babylon was typical of our redemption by Christ; and so the contents of these promises, 1. Were provided by the Gospel of Christ. That glorious discovery of his love has given full assurance to all those who hear this joyful sound, that God has provided inestimable comforts for them, sufficient for the supply of all their wants, the balancing of all their griefs, and the answering of all their prayers. 2. They are applied by the grace and Spirit of Christ to all believers, that they may have strong consolation in their way, and a complete happiness in their end. Our way to heaven lies through the wilderness of this world. Now,

1. It is here supposed that the people of God, in their passage through this world, are often in straits; "The poor and needy seek water, and there is none;" "The poor in spirit hunger and thirst after righteousness." The soul of man, finding itself empty and necessitous, seeks for satisfaction somewhere; but soon despairs of finding it in the world, that has nothing in it to make it easy. Creatures are broken cisterns, that can hold no water, so "that their tongue faileth for thirst;" they are weary of seeking that satisfaction in the world which is not to be had in it. Their sorrow makes them thirsty, so doth their toil.

2. It is here promised, that one way or other all their grievances shall be redressed, and they shall be made easy. 1st. God himself will be nigh unto them in all that which they call upon him for. Let all the praying people of God take notice of this, and take the comfort of it; he hath said, "I, the Lord, will hear them," will answer them; "I the God of Israel will not forsake them," that is, I will be with them, as I have always been, in their distresses. While we are in the wilderness of this world, this promise is to us what the pillar of cloud and fire was to Israel, an assurance of God's gracious presence. 2nd. They shall have a constant supply of fresh water, as Israel had in the wilderness, even there where one would least expect it; ver. 18, "I will open rivers in high places," rivers of grace, rivers of pleasure, "rivers of living water," which he spake of the Spirit, Jno. vii. 38, 39; that Spirit which should be poured out upon the Gentiles, who had been as high places, dry and barren, and lifted up in their own conceit above the necessity of that gift. And there shall be "fountains in the midst of the valleys," the valleys of Baca, Ps. lxxxiv. 6, that are sandy and wearisome; or, among the Jews, that had been as fruitful valleys in comparison with the Gentile mountains. The preaching of the Gospel to the world turned that wilderness into a pool of water; yielding fruit to the owner of it, and a relief to the travellers through it. 3rd. They shall have a pleasant shade to screen them from the scorching heat of the sun, as Israel, when they pitched at Elim, where they had not only wells of water, but palm-trees, Ex. xv. 27. "I will plant in the wilderness the cedar," ver. 19. I will turn the wilderness into an orchard, or garden, such as used to be planted with these pleasant trees, so that they shall pass through the wilderness with as much ease and delight as a man walks in his grove. These trees shall be to them then what the pillar of cloud was to Israel in the wilderness, a shelter from the heat,—Christ and his grace are so to believers,—"as the shadow of a great rock," ch. xxxii. 2. When God sets up his church in the Gentile wilderness, there shall be as great a change by it in men's character as if thorns and briars were turned into cedars, and fir-trees, and myrtles; and by this a blessed change is described, ch. lv. 13. 4th. They shall see and acknowledge the hand of God, his power, and his favour in this, ver. 20. God will do these strange and surprising things on purpose to awaken them to a conviction and consideration of his hand in all. That they may see this wonderful change, and, knowing that it is above the ordinary course and power of nature, may consider that therefore it comes from a superior power; and, comparing notes upon it, may understand together, and concur in the acknowledgment of it, "that the hand of the Lord," that mighty hand of his, which is stretched out for his people, and stretched out to them, "hath done this;" and the Holy One of Israel hath created it, made it anew, made it out of nothing, made it for the comfort of his people. Note, God doth great things for his people, that he may be taken notice of.

21 Produce your cause, saith the LORD:
Bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob.
22 Let them bring them forth, and shew us what shall happen:
Let them shew the former things, what they be,
That we may consider them, and know the latter end of them;
Or declare us things for to come.
23 Shew the things that are to come hereafter,
That we may know that ye are gods:
Yea, do good, or do evil,
That we may be dismayed, and behold it together.
24 Behold, ye are of nothing,
And your work of nought:
An abomination is he that chooseth you.
25 I have raised up one from the north, and he shall come:
From the rising of the sun shall he call upon my name:
And he shall come upon princes as upon morter,
And as the potter treadeth clay.
26 Who hath declared from the beginning, that we may know?
And beforetime, that we may say, He is righteous?
Yea, there is none that sheweth, yea, there is none that declareth,
Yea, there is none that heareth your words.
27 The first shall say to Zion, Behold, behold them:
And I will give to Jerusalem one that bringeth good tidings.
28 For I beheld, and there was no man;
Even among them, and there was no counsellor,
That, when I asked of them, could answer a word.
29 Behold, they are all vanity;
Their works are nothing:
Their molten images are wind and confusion.

The Lord, by the prophet, here repeats the challenge to idolaters, to make out the pretensions of their idols. "Produce your cause," ver. 21; and make your best of it. Bring forth the strongest reasons you have to prove that your idols are gods, and worthy your adoration. Note, There needs no more to shew the absurdity of sin, than to produce the reasons that are given in defence of it, for they carry with them their own confutation.

First. The idols are here challenged to bring proofs of their knowledge and power. Let us see what they can inform us of, and what they can do. Understanding and active power are the accomplishments of a man; whoever pretends to be a god must have these in perfection. And have the idols made it to appear that they have so? No.

1. They can tell us nothing that we did not know before, so ignorant are they. We challenge them to inform us, 1st. What hath been formerly. "Let them shew the former things," and raise them out of the oblivion in which they were buried. God inspired Moses to write such a history of the creation as the gods of the heathen could never have dictated to any of their enthusiasts. Or, let the defenders of idols tell us what mighty achievements they can boast of, as performed by their gods in former times. What did they ever do that was worth taking notice of? Let them instance in any thing, and it shall be considered, and its due weight given it; and it shall be compared with the latter end of it, and if in the issue it proved to be as great as it pretended to be, they shall have the credit of it. 2nd. We challenge them to tell "us what shall happen," to "declare us things to come," ver. 22; and again, ver. 23, "shew the things that are to come hereafter." Give this evidence of your omniscience, that nothing can be hid from you; and of your sovereignty and dominion: make it appear that you have the doing of all, by letting us know beforehand what you design to do. Do this kindness to the world, let them know what is to come, that they may provide accordingly. Do this, and we will own that you are gods above us, and gods to us, and worthy of our adorations. No creature can foretell things to come, otherwise than by Divine information, with any certainty.

2. They can do nothing that we cannot do ourselves, so impotent are they. He challengeth them to do either good or evil, good to their friends, or evil to their enemies; let them do, if they can, any thing extraordinary that people will admire, and be affected with. Let them either bless or curse with power. Let us see them either inflict such plagues as God brought on Egypt or bestow such blessings as God bestowed on Israel. Let them do some great thing, and we shall be amazed when we see it, and frighted into a veneration of them, as many have been into a veneration of the true God.

That which is charged upon these idols, and let them disprove it if they can, is, that they are of nothing, ver. 24. Their claims have no foundation at all, nor is there any ground or reason in the least for men's paying them the respect they do. There is nothing in them worthy our regard. They are less than nothing, worse than nothing, so some read it; the work they do is of nought, and so is the ado that is made about them. There is no pretence, or colour for it; it is all a jest, it is all a sham put upon the world. And, therefore, he that chooseth you, and so gives you your deity; and, as some read it, that delighteth in you, is an abomination to God, and all wise and good men. He that chooseth you chooseth an abomination, so some take it. A servant is at liberty to choose his master, but a man is not at liberty to choose his God. He that chooseth any other but the true God chooseth an abomination. His choosing it makes it so.

Secondly. God here produceth proofs that he is the true God, and none but he. Let him produce his strong reasons.

1. He hath an irresistible power. This he will shortly make to appear in the raising up of Cyrus, and making him a type of Christ, ver. 25. He will raise him up from the north, and "from the rising of the sun." Cyrus, by his father was a Mede, by his mother a Persian; and his army consisted of Medes, whose country lay north, and Persians, whose country lay east from Babylon. God will raise him up to great power, and he shall come against Babylon, with ends of his own to serve. But, 1st. He shall proclaim God's name, so it may be self; and, as the next verses show, there were none among the idol-worshippers and their gods who could do or say anything.

xlii. 1. The Lord's "servant" here has been explained to be "the Jewish people," "Cyrus," "Isaiah himself," "the prophets collectively," and "the Messiah." The description which follows, and the authority of the New Testament, show that the Messiah is intended. The Chaldee Targum shows this was the ancient opinion of the Jews.

xlii. 6, 7. In these two verses the Messiah is personally addressed by the Lord, who declares his appointment and the character of his mission.

xlii. 10—12. To interpret this of the joy caused by the return of the Jews from their captivity in Babylon is insufficient, and, therefore, the words are more properly viewed as pointing to a greater manifestation of Jehovah's grace and power, in which the world at large would participate. We, therefore, understand it to refer to Gospel times.

read; he shall publish the honour of the God of Israel. So he did remarkably, when, in his proclamation for the release of the Jews out of their captivity, he acknowledged that the Lord God of Israel is the Lord God of heaven, and is the God. And he might be said to call on his name, when he encouraged the building of his temple, and very probably did himself call upon him, and pray to him, Ezr. i. 2, 3. 2nd. All opposition shall fall before him; he shall come upon the princes of Babylon, and all other that stood in his way, as mortar, and trample upon them "as the potter treadeth clay," to serve his own purposes with it. Christ as man was raised up from the north, for Nazareth lay in the northern parts of Canaan; as the angel of the covenant, he ascends from the east. He maintained the honour of heaven, "he shall call upon my name;" and broke the powers of hell, came upon the prince of darkness, as mortar, and trod him down.

2. He hath an infallible foresight. He would not only do this, but he did now by his prophet foretell it. Now the false gods not only could not do it, but they could not foresee it. 1st. He challengeth them to produce any of their pretended deities, or their diviners, that had given notice of this, or could; ver. 26, "Who has declared from the beginning" any thing of this kind, or has told it before time? Tell us if there be any, that we know of, for we know not any. If there be any, "we will say he is righteous;" he is true, his cause is just, his claims are proved, and he is in the right in demanding to be worshipped. This agrees with ver. 22, 23. 2nd. He challengeth to himself the sole honour of doing it, and foretelling it, ver. 27. 'I am the first,' so it may be read, 'that will say to Zion,' "Behold, behold them;" that will let the people of Israel know their deliverers are at hand; for there were those who understood by books, God's books, the approach of the time, Dan. ix. 2. And I am he that "will give to Jerusalem one that bringeth good tidings," these good tidings of their enlargement. This is applicable to the work of redemption, in which the Lord shewed himself much more than in the release of the Jews out of Babylon. He it was that contrived our salvation, and he brought it about, and he has given to us the glad tidings of reconciliation.

Lastly. Judgment is here given upon this trial.

1. None of all the idols had foretold, or could foresee, this work of wonder. Other nations beside the Jews were released out of captivity in Babylon by Cyrus; or, at least, were greatly concerned in the revolution of the monarchy, and the transferring of it to the Persians; and yet none of them had any intelligence given them of it beforehand by any of their gods or prophets; "There is none that sheweth," ver. 26, "none that declareth," none that gives the least intimation of it; there is none of the nations "that heareth your words," that pretend to have heard from their gods, such words, as you, O Israelites have heard from your God, by your prophets, Ps. cxlvii. 20. There is none of all the gods of the nations that have shewed their worshippers the way of salvation, which God will shew by the Messiah. The good tidings which the Lord will send in the Gospel is a mystery hid from ages and generations, Rom. xvi. 25, 26.

2. None of those who pleaded for them, could produce any instance of their knowledge or power, that had in it any colour of proof that they were gods. All their advocates were struck dumb with this challenge; ver. 28, "I beheld, and there was no man" that could give evidence for them, "even amongst them," that were their most zealous admirers, and "there was no counsellor;" none that could offer any thing for the support of their cause. Even among the idols themselves there was none fit to give counsel in the most trivial matters, and yet there were those that asked counsel of them in the most important and difficult affairs. When I asked them what they had to say for themselves, they stood mute; the case was so plain against them, there was none that could answer a word. Judgment must therefore be given against the defendant upon nihil dicit,—'he has nothing to say for himself.' "He was speechless," Mat. xxii. 12.

3. Sentence is therefore given, according to the charge exhibited against them, ver. 24. So it is; "Behold, they are all vanity," ver. 29; they are a lie, and a cheat; they are not in themselves what they pretend to be, nor will their worshippers find that in them which they promise themselves. "Their works are nothing," of no force, of no worth; their enemies need fear no hurt from them, their worshippers can hope for no good from them. "Their molten images," and indeed all their images, "are wind and confusion;" vanity and vexation. Those that worship them will be deceived in them, and will reflect upon their own folly with the greatest bitterness. Therefore, "dearly beloved, flee from idolatry," 1 Cor. x. 14.

CHAPTER XLII.

The prophet seems here to launch out yet farther into the prophecy of the Messiah, and his kingdom, under the type of Cyrus; and, having the great work of man's salvation by him yet more in view, he almost forgets the occasion that led him into it, and drops the return out of Babylon; for indeed the prospect of this would be a greater comfort and support to the believing pious Jews in their captivity than the hope of that. And, as Mr. Gataker well observes, in this, and other like prophecies of Christ, that are couched in types, as of David and Solomon, some passages agree to the type, and not to the truth; others to the truth, and not to the type; and many to the type in one sense, and the truth in another. Here is, I. A prophecy of the Messiah's coming with meekness, and yet with power, to do the Redeemer's work, ver. 1—4. II. His commission opened, which he received from the Father, ver. 5—9. III. The joy and rejoicings with which the glad tidings of this should be received, ver. 10—12. IV. The wonderful success of the Gospel for the overthrow of the devil's kingdom, ver. 13—17. V. The rejection and ruin of the Jews for their unbelief, ver. 18—25.

BEHOLD my servant, whom I uphold;
Mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth;
I have put my spirit upon him:
He shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles.
2 He shall not cry, nor lift up,
Nor cause his voice to be heard in the street.
3 A bruised reed shall he not break,
And the smoking flax shall he not quench:
He shall bring forth judgment unto truth.
4 He shall not fail nor be discouraged,
Till he have set judgment in the earth:
And the isles shall wait for his law.

We are sure that these verses are to be understood of Christ, for the evangelist tells us expressly, that in him this prophecy was fulfilled, Mat. xii. 17—21. Behold," with an eye of faith, "Behold," and observe. "Behold." and admire, "my servant whom I uphold." Let the Old Testament saints behold, and expect him. Let the New Testament saints behold, and remember him. Now what must we behold and consider concerning him?

First. The Father's concern for him, and relation to him; the confidence he put, and the complacence he took in him. This put an honour upon him, and made him remarkable above any thing, ver. 1. 1. God owns him as one employed for him. He is "my servant;" though he was a Son, yet as a Mediator "he took upon him the form of a servant;" learned obedience to the will of God, and practised it, and laid out himself to advance the interests of God's kingdom, and so he was God's servant. 2. As one chosen by him. He is "mine elect;" he did not thrust himself into the service, but was called of God, and pitched upon as the fittest person for it. Infinite Wisdom made the choice, and then avowed it. 3. As one he put a confidence in. He is my servant, 'on whom I lean,' so some read it. The Father put a confidence in him, that he would go through with his undertaking, and in that confidence brought many sons to glory. It was a great trust which the Father reposed in the Son, but he knew him to be par negotio,—'equal to it,' both able and faithful. 4. As one he took care of. He is "my servant, whom I uphold," so we read it. The Father bore him up, and bore him out in his undertaking; both were included in his upholding him; he stood by him, and strengthened him. 5. As one whom he took an entire complacency in. "Mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth." His delight was in him from eternity, when he was "by him as one brought up with him," Pr. viii. 30. He had a particular satisfaction in his undertaking; he declared himself well pleased in him, Mat. iii. 17; xvii. 5; and therefore loved him, because he laid down his life for the sheep. Let our souls delight in Christ, rely on him, and rejoice in him; and thus let us be united to him, and then for his sake the Father will be well pleased with us.

Secondly. The qualification of him for his office. "I have put my Spirit upon him," to enable him to go through his undertaking, ch. lxi. 1. The Spirit did not only come, but rest upon him, ch. xi. 2; not by measure, as on others of God's servants, but without measure. Those whom God employs as his servants, as he will uphold them, and be well pleased with them, so he will put his Spirit upon them.

Thirdly. The work to which he is appointed. It is to "bring forth judgment to the Gentiles;" that is, in infinite wisdom, holiness, and equity, to set up a religion in the world which the Gentiles should come under the bonds of, and enjoy the blessings of. The judgments of the Lord, which had been hid from the Gentiles, Ps. cxlvii. 20, he came to bring forth to the Gentiles, for he was to be a light to lighten them.

Fourthly. The mildness and tenderness with which he should pursue this undertaking, ver. 2, 3. He shall carry it on, 1. In silence, and without noise; "He shall not strive nor cry." It shall not be proclaimed, "Lo, here is Christ; or lo, he is there;" as when great princes ride in progress, or make a public entry. He shall have no trumpet sounded before him, nor any noisy retinue to follow him. The opposition he meets with he shall not strive against, but patiently endure the contradiction of sinners against himself. His kingdom is spiritual, and therefore its weapons are not carnal, nor its appearance pompous; it cometh not with observation. 2. Gently, and without rigour. Those that are wicked, he will be patient with; when he has begun to crush them, so that they are as bruised reeds, he will yet give them space to repent, and not presently break them; though they are very offensive, as smoking flax, ch. lxv. 4, yet he will bear with them, as he did with Jerusalem. Those that are weak, he will be tender of. Those that have but a little life, a little heat, that are weak as a reed, oppressed with doubts and fears, as a bruised reed, that are as smoking flax, as the wick of a candle newly lighted, which is ready to go out again; he will not despise them, will not plead against them with his great power, nor lay upon them more work, or more suffering, than they can bear, which would break and quench them, but will graciously consider their frame. More is implied than is expressed; "He will not break the bruised reed," but will strengthen it, that it may become as a cedar in the courts of our God. He will not "quench the smoking flax," but blow it up into a flame. Note, Jesus Christ is very tender towards those that have true grace, though they are but weak in it; and accepts the willingness of the spirit, pardoning and passing by the weakness of the flesh.

Fifthly. The courage and constancy with which he should persevere in this undertaking, so as to carry his point at last; ver. 4, "He shall not fail, nor be discouraged." Though he meets with hard service, and much opposition, and foresees how ungrateful the world will be, yet he goes on with his part of the work, till he is able to say, "It is finished;" and enables his apostles and ministers to go on with theirs too, and not to fail or be discouraged till they also have finished their testimony. And thus he accomplisheth what he undertook. 1. He brings "forth judgment unto truth;" that is, by a long course of miracles, and his resurrection at last, he shall fully evince the truth of his doctrine, and the Divine original and authority of that holy religion which he came to establish. 2. He sets judgment in the earth; that is, he erects his government in the world, a church for himself among men; reforms the world, and by the power of his Gospel and grace fixeth such principles in the minds of men as tend to make them wise and just. 3. "The isles of the Gentiles wait for his law;" wait for his Gospel, that is, bid it welcome, as if it had been a thing they had long waited for. They shall become his disciples, shall sit at his feet, and be ready to receive the law from his mouth. "What wilt thou have us to do?"

5 Thus saith God the LORD,
He that created the heavens, and stretched them out;
He that spread forth the earth, and that which cometh out of it;
He that giveth breath unto the people upon it,
And spirit to them that walk therein:
6 I the LORD have called thee in righteousness,
And will hold thine hand, [people,
And will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant of the
For a light of the Gentiles;
7 To open the blind eyes,
To bring out the prisoners from the prison,
And them that sit in darkness out of the prison house.
8 I am the LORD: that is my name:
And my glory will I not give to another,
Neither my praise to graven images.

xlii. 13—17. All this may be taken as a declaration that God would remove everything opposed to his will. The language is for the most part figurative, in accordance with the poetic style of the prophet.

xlii. 18—20. These verses point to the blind and stupid conduct of the Jews and their leaders, notwithstanding their great privileges and the abundant displays of the Divine favour towards themselves as well as others.

xlii. 21. This is a difficult verse. It may mean that the Lord in his righteousness had favoured Israel, and had magnified and honoured his most holy law, or would continue to magnify and honour it, although faithless Israel suffered for his sin, as indicated in the following verses. Some, however, regard the word "law" as including all the manifestations of the Divine will to his people everywhere. Dr. Delitzsch says, "The reference is primarily and chiefly to the Sinaitic law, and the verbs relate, not to the 9 Behold, the former things are come to pass,

And new things do I declare:
Before they spring forth I tell you of them.
10 Sing unto the LORD a new song,
And his praise from the end of the earth,
Ye that go down to the sea, and all that is therein;
The isles, and the inhabitants thereof.
11 Let the wilderness and the cities thereof lift up their voice,
The villages that Kedar doth inhabit:
Let the inhabitants of the rock sing,
Let them shout from the top of the mountains
12 Let them give glory unto the LORD,
And declare his praise in the islands.

Here is, First. The covenant God made with, and the commission he gave to, the Messiah, ver. 5—7; which is an exposition of ver. 1, "Behold my servant, whom I uphold."

1. The royal titles by which the great God here makes himself known, and distinguisheth himself from all pretenders, speak very much his glory; ver. 5, "Thus saith God the Lord." And who art thou, Lord? Why, he is the fountain of all being, and therefore the fountain of all power. He is the fountain of being, 1st. In the upper world; for "he created the heavens, and stretched them out," and keeps the vast expanse still upon the stretch, ch. xl. 22. 2nd. In the lower world; for "he spread forth the earth," and made it a capacious habitation, and "that which cometh out of it" is produced by his power. 3rd. In the world of mankind; "he giveth breath to the people upon it," not only air to breathe in, but the breath of life itself, and organs to breathe with; nay, he gives "spirit," the powers and faculties of a rational soul, "to them that walk therein." Now this is prefixed to God's covenant with the Messiah, and the commission given him, not only to shew that he has authority to make such a covenant, and give such a commission, and had power sufficient to bear him out; but that the design of the work of redemption was to maintain the honour of the Creator, and to reduce man to the allegiance he owes to God as his Maker.

2. The assurances which he gives to the Messiah of his presence with him in all he did pursuant to his undertaking speak very much encouragement to him, ver. 6. 1st. God owns that the Messiah did not take the honour of being Mediator to himself, but was called of God; that he was no intruder, no usurper, but was fairly brought to it, (Heb. v. 4,) "I have called thee in righteousness." God not only did him no wrong in calling him to this hard service, he having voluntarily offered himself to it; but did himself right, in providing for his own honour, and performing the word which he had spoken. 2nd. He promiseth to stand by him, and strengthen him in it; to hold his hand, not only to his work, but in it; to hold his hand that it might not shake, that it might not fail, and so to keep him. When an angel was sent from heaven to strengthen him in his agonies, and the Father himself was with him, then this promise was fulfilled. Note, Those whom God calls he will own and help, and will hold their hands.

3. The great intentions of this commission speak abundance of comfort to the children of men. He was given "for a covenant of the people," for a Mediator or guarantee of the covenant of grace, which is all summed up in him. God, in giving us Christ, has with him freely given us all the blessings of the new covenant. Two glorious blessings Christ in his Gospel brings with him to the Gentile world, light and liberty. 1st. He is given for a "light of the Gentiles," not only to reveal to them what they were concerned to know, and which otherwise they could not have known, but "to open the blind eyes" that they might know it. By his Spirit in the word he presents the object, by his Spirit in the heart he prepares the organ. When the Gospel came, light came, a great light, to them that sat in darkness, Mat. iv. 16; Jno. iii. 17. And St. Paul was sent to the Gentiles "to open their eyes," Acts xxvi. 18. Christ is the light of the world. 2nd. He is sent to proclaim liberty to the captives, as Cyrus did; to "bring out the prisoners." Not only to open the prison doors, and give them leave to go out, which was all that Cyrus could do; but to bring them out, to induce and enable them to make use of their liberty, which none did but those whose spirits God stirred up. This Christ doth by his grace.

Secondly. The ratification and confirmation of this grant. That we may be assured of the validity of it, consider,

1. The authority of him that makes the promise; ver. 8, "I am the Lord," Jehovah, "that is my name;" and that was the name by which he made himself known, when he began to perform the promise made to the patriarchs; whereas before he manifested himself by the name of "God Almighty," Ex. vi. 3. If he is the Lord that gives being and birth to all things, he will give being and birth to this promise. If his name be Jehovah, which speaks him God alone, we may be sure his name is Jealous, and he will not give his glory to another, whoever it is that stands in competition with him; especially not to graven images. Therefore he will send the Messiah to open men's eyes, that so he may turn them from the service of dumb idols to serve the living God; because, though he has long winked at the times of ignorance, he will now maintain his prerogative, and will not give his glory to graven images. Therefore he will perform his word, because he will not lose the honour of being true to it, nor be ever charged with falsehood by the worshippers of false gods. Therefore he will deliver his people from under the power of idolaters, because it looks as if he had given his praise to graven images, when he gives up his own worshippers to the worshippers of images.

2. The accomplishment of the promises he had formerly made concerning his church, which are proofs of the truth of his word, and the kindness he bears to his people; ver. 9, "Behold the former things are come to pass." Hitherto the Lord hath helped his church, hath supported her under former burthens, relieved her in former straits; and this in performance of the promises made to the fathers. "There has not failed one word," 1 Kin. viii. 56; and now "new things do I declare;" now I will make new promises, which shall as certainly be fulfilled in their season as old ones were. Now I will bestow new favours, such as have not been conferred formerly. Old Testament blessings you have had abundantly, now I declare New Testament blessings; not a fruitful country, and dominion over your neighbours, but spiritual blessings in heavenly things. "Before they spring forth" in the preaching of the Gospel "I tell you of them," under the type and figure of the former things. Note, The receipt of former mercies may encourage us to hope for farther mercies; for God is constant in his care of his people, and his compassions are still new.

Thirdly. The song of joy and praise which should be sung hereupon to the glory of God; ver. 10, "Sing unto the Lord a new song," a New Testament song. The giving of Christ for a light to the Gentiles, ver. 6, was a new thing, and very surprising. The apostle speaks of it as a "mystery," "which in other ages was not made known as it is now revealed, that the Gentiles should be fellow heirs," Eph. iii. 5, 6. Now this being the new thing which God declares, the newness of the song which is to be sung on this occasion is this, that whereas before the songs of the Lord were very much confined to the temple at Jerusalem, (David's psalms were in the language of the Jews only, and sung by them, and in their own country only; for when they were in a strange land they hung their harps on the willow trees, and could not sing the Lord's song, as we find, Ps. cxxxvii. 2—4,) now the songs of holy joy and praise shall be sung all the world over; the Gentile nations shall share, equally with the Jews, in New Testament blessings, and therefore shall join in New Testament praises and acts of worship. There shall be churches set up in the Gentile nations, and they shall sing a new song. The conversion of the Gentiles is often foretold under this notion, as appears, Rom. xv. 9—11.

It is here promised that the praises of God's grace shall be sung with joy and thankfulness. 1st. By those that live in "the end of the earth," in countries that lie most remote from Jerusalem; "From the uttermost parts of the earth have we heard songs," ch. xxiv. 16. This was fulfilled when Christianity was planted in our land. 2nd. By mariners and merchants, and those "that go down to the sea, that do business in great waters," and "suck the riches of the sea," and so make themselves masters of the "fulness thereof," and "all that is therein;" with which they shall praise God, and justly, for it is his, Ps. xxiv. 1; xcv. 5. The Jews traded little at sea; if, therefore, God's praise be sung by them that "go down to the sea," it must be by Gentiles. Seafaring men are called upon to praise God, Ps. cvii. 23. 3rd. By the islands, and "the inhabitants thereof," ver. 10; and again, ver. 12, Let them "declare his praise in the islands," the isles of the Gentiles; probably referring to the islands of Greece. 4th. By "the wilderness, and the cities thereof," and the villages of Kedar. These lay east from Jerusalem, as the islands lay west; so that the Gospel songs should be sung from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same. The whole Gentile world had been like an island, cut off from communication with God's church, and like a wilderness, uncultivated, and bringing forth no fruit to God; but now the islands and the wilderness shall praise God. 5th. By "the inhabitants of the rock," and those that dwell on the tops of the mountains; not only the Gentiles, but the poorest, and meanest, and most despicable; they that dwell in cottages, as well as those that inhabit cities and villages. The rude and most barbarous, as the mountaineers commonly are, shall be civilized by the Gospel. Or, by the inhabitants of the rock may be meant the inhabitants of that part of Arabia which was called Petræa, 'the rocky.' Perhaps the neighbouring countries shared in the joy of the Israelites when they returned out of Babylon, and some of them came and joined with them in their praises. But we find not that it was to any such degree as might fully answer this illustrious prophecy, and must conclude that it reaches farther, and was fulfilled in that which many other prophecies of the joy of the nations are said in the New Testament to be fulfilled; namely, the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ. When they are brought into the church they are brought to "give glory to the Lord;" then they are to him for a praise, and a name, and they make it their business to praise him. He is glorified in them, and glorified by them.

13 The LORD shall go forth as a mighty man,
He shall stir up jealousy like a man of war:
He shall cry, yea, roar;
He shall prevail against his enemies.
14 I have long time holden my peace;
I have been still, and refrained myself:
Now will I cry like a travailing woman,
I will destroy and devour at once.
15 I will make waste mountains and hills,
And dry up all their herbs;
And I will make the rivers islands,
And I will dry up the pools.
16 And I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not;
I will lead them in paths that they have not known:
I will make darkness light before them,
And crooked things straight.
These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them.
17 They shall be turned back, they shall be greatly ashamed,
That trust in graven images,
That say to the molten images,
Ye are our gods.

solemnity of the promulgation, but to the riches and exalted character of the contents."

xliii. 3. The words "I gave" represent a verb which we may translate "I have given," though some think it refers to a future period. The Lord gave or made Egypt to be the ransom of his people; i.e., he allowed Egypt to perish instead of Israel. Cush (translated Ethiopia) and Seba appear to have been geographically associated with Egypt, but lying farther to the south.

xliii. 5, 6. God will gather his people from the four winds of heaven. By some this is regarded in a spiritual sense, of the conversion of men to the Gospel everywhere. Others explain it of the restoration of the Jews after the captivity of Babylon. Others again refer it to a final gathering of the literal Israel out of all nations, and settlement once more in Palestine.

xliii. 8. Men with the natural use of their eyes and ears may be spiritually blind and deaf, as is implied by many passages of Holy

It comes all to one whether we make these verses, as some do, the song itself that is to be sung by the Gentile world, or a prophecy of what God will do to make way for the singing of that song, that evangelical new song.

First. He will appear in his power and glory more than ever. So he did in the preaching of his Gospel, and that Divine power and energy which went along with it, and the wonderful success it had in the pulling down of Satan's strongholds, ver. 13, 14. He had long held his peace, and been still, and refrained himself, while he winked at the times of the ignorance of the Gentile world, Acts xvii. 30; and "suffered all nations to walk in their own ways," Acts xiv. 16. But now he "shall go forth as a mighty man" as "a man of war," to attack the devil's kingdom, and give it a fatal blow. The going forth of the Gospel is thus represented, Rev. vi. 2. Christ in it "went forth conquering, and to conquer." The ministry of the apostles is called their warfare; and they were "the soldiers of Jesus Christ." He shall "stir up jealousy;" shall appear more jealous than ever for the glory of his own name, and against idolatry. 1. "He shall cry," in the preaching of his word; "cry like a travailing woman;" for the ministers of Christ preached as men in earnest, and that travailed in birth again till they saw Christ formed in the souls of people, Gal. iv. 19. "He shall cry, yea, roar," in the Gospel woes; which are more terrible than the roaring of a lion, and which must be preached along with Gospel blessings, to awaken a sleeping world. 2. He shall conquer by the power of his Spirit. "He shall prevail against his enemies," shall prevail to make them friends, Col. i. 21. Those that contradict and blaspheme his Gospel he shall prevail to put them to silence and shame. He "will destroy and devour at once" all the oppositions of the powers of darkness; Satan shall fall as lightning from heaven; and he that had the power of death shall be destroyed. And as a type and figure of this, to make way for the redemption of the Jews out of Babylon, God will humble the pride, and break the power, of their oppressors, and will at once destroy and devour the Babylonian monarchy. In accomplishing this destruction of Babylon by the Persian army, under the command of Cyrus, "he will make waste mountains and hills," level the country, and "dry up all their herbs;" that is, the army, as usual, shall either carry off the forage, or destroy it; and by laying bridges of boats over rivers shall turn them into islands, and so drain the fens and low grounds, to make way for the march of their army, that the pools shall be dried up. And thus, when the Gospel shall be preached, it shall have a free course, and that which hinders the progress of it shall be taken out of the way.

Secondly. He will manifest his favour and grace towards those whose spirits he hath stirred up to follow him; as Ezr. i. 5, those that ask the way to Zion he will shew them the way, and lead them in it, ver. 16. Those that by nature were blind, and those that, being under convictions of sin and wrath, are quite at a loss, and know not what to do with themselves, God will lead "by a way that they knew not;" will shew them the way to life and happiness by Jesus Christ, who is the way; and will conduct and carry them on in that way which before they were strangers to. Thus in the conversion of Paul he was struck blind first, and then God revealed his Son in him, and made the scales to fall from his eyes. They are weak in knowledge, and the truths of God at first seem unintelligible; but God will "make darkness light before them," and knowledge shall be easy to them. They are weak in duty, and the commands of God seem impracticable, and insuperable difficulties are in the way of their obedience; but God will make "crooked things straight," their way shall be plain, and the yoke easy. Those whom God brings into the right way he will guide in it; and as a type of this he will lead the Jews, when they return out of captivity, in a ready road to their own land again; and nothing shall occur to perplex or embarrass them in their journey. These are great things, and kind things; very great, and very kind. But, lest any should say they are too great, too kind, to be expected from God by such an undeserving people as that of the Jews, such an undeserving world as that of the Gentiles, he adds, "These things will I do unto them," take my word for it, I will; "and I will not forsake them." He that begins to shew this great mercy will go on to do them good.

Thirdly. He will particularly put those to confusion that adhere to idols, notwithstanding the attempts made by the preaching of the Gospel to turn them from idols; ver. 17, "They shall be turned back, and greatly ashamed, that trust in graven images." The Babylonians shall, when they see how the Jews, who despise their images, are owned and delivered by the God they worship without images; and the Gentiles, when they see how idolatry falls before the preaching of the Gospel, is scattered like darkness before the light of the sun, and melts like snow before its heat, they shall be ashamed that ever they said to these molten images, "Ye are our gods;" for how can they help their worshippers who cannot help themselves, nor save themselves from falling into contempt? In times of reformation, when many turn from iniquity, and sin, being generally deserted, becomes unfashionable, it may be hoped that those who will not otherwise be reclaimed will be wrought upon by that consideration to be ashamed of it.

18 Hear, ye deaf;
And look, ye blind, that ye may see.
19 Who is blind, but my servant?
Or deaf, as my messenger that I sent?
Who is blind as he that is perfect,
And blind as the LORD's servant?
20 Seeing many things, but thou observest not;
Opening the ears, but he heareth not.
21 The LORD is well pleased for his righteousness' sake;
He will magnify the law, and make it honourable.
22 But this is a people robbed and spoiled;
They are all of them snared in holes,
And they are hid in prison houses:
They are for a prey, and none delivereth;
For a spoil, and none saith, Restore.
23 Who among you will give ear to this?
Who will hearken and hear for the time to come?
24 Who gave Jacob for a spoil,
And Israel to the robbers?
Did not the LORD, he against whom we have sinned?
For they would not walk in his ways,
Neither were they obedient unto his law.
25 Therefore he hath poured upon him
The fury of his anger, and the strength of battle:
And it hath set him on fire round about, yet he knew not;
And it burned him, yet he laid it not to heart.

The prophet, having spoken by way of comfort and encouragement to the believing Jews that waited for the consolation of Israel, here turns himself to those among them that were unbelieving, for their conviction and humiliation. Among those that were captived in Babylon there were some that were as the evil figs in Jeremiah's vision, who were sent thither "for their hurt," to be "removed into all the kingdoms of the earth," for a "reproach and a proverb," Jer. xxiv. 9. And in them there was a type of the Jews that rejected Christ, and were rejected by him, and then fell more than ever under the curse, when those that believed were inheriting the blessing; for they were broken and ruined, and remain dispersed unto this day. Observe,

First. The call that is given to this people; ver. 18, "Hear, ye deaf," and attend to the joyful sound; and "look, ye blind, that you may see" the joyful light. There is no absurdity in this command; nor is it unbecoming the wisdom and goodness of God to call us to do that good which yet of ourselves we are not sufficient for; for those have natural powers which they may employ so as to do better than they do, and may have supernatural grace, if it be not their own fault, who yet labour under a moral impotency to that which is good. This call to the deaf to hear, and the blind to see, is like the command given to the man that had the withered hand to stretch it forth; which, though he could not do because it was withered, yet if he had not attempted to do it he had not been healed; and his being healed thereupon was owing not to this act, but the Divine power.

Secondly. The character that is given of them; ver. 19, 20, "Who is blind, but my servant? or deaf as my messenger?" The people of the Jews were in profession God's servants, and their priests and elders his messengers, Mal. ii. 7, but they were deaf and blind. The verse before may be understood as spoken to the Gentile idolaters, whom he calls deaf and blind, because they worshipped gods that were so. But, saith he, no wonder ye are deaf and blind, when my own people are as bad as you, and many of them as much set upon idolatry. He complains of their sottishness, they are blind; and of their stubbornness, they are deaf. They were even worse than the Gentiles themselves; corruptio optimi est pessima,—'what is best becomes, when corrupted, the worst.' Who is so wilfully, so scandalously blind and deaf as my servant, and my messenger, as Jacob, who is my servant, ch. xli. 8; and as their prophets and teachers, who are my messengers? "Who is blind as he that," in profession and pretension, "is perfect;" that should come nearer to perfection than other people, their priests and prophets? The one prophesies falsely, and the other bears rule by their means; and who so blind as they that will not see when they have the light shining in their faces? Note. 1. It is a common thing, but a very sad thing, for those that in profession are God's servants and messengers, to be themselves blind and deaf in spiritual things; ignorant, erroneous, and very careless. 2. Blindness and deafness in spiritual things is worse in those that profess themselves to be God's servants and messengers than in others. It is in them the greater sin and shame, the greater dishonour to God, and to themselves a greater damnation. The prophet goes on (ver. 20) to describe the blindness and obstinacy of the Jewish nation, just as our Saviour describes it in his time, Mat. xiii. 14, 15, "Seeing many things, but thou observest not." Multitudes are ruined for want of observing that which they cannot but see; they perish, not through ignorance, but mere carelessness. The Jews, in our Saviour's time, saw many proofs of his Divine mission, but they did not observe them; they seemed to open their ears to him, but they did not hear; that is, they did not heed, did not understand, or believe, or obey; and then it was all one as if they had not heard.

Thirdly. The care God will take of the honour of his own name, notwithstanding their blindness and deafness, especially of his word, which he has magnified above all his name. Shall the unbelief and obstinacy of men make the promise of God of none effect? God forbid, Rom. iii. 3. No; though they are blind and deaf God will be no loser in his glory; ver. 21, "The Lord is well pleased for his righteousness' sake;" not well pleased with their sin, but well pleased in the manifestation of his own righteousness, in rejecting them for rejecting the great salvation. He speaks as one well pleased, ch. i. 24, "Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries;" and, Eze. v. 13, he will be comforted. The Scripture was fulfilled in the casting off of the Jews as well as in the calling in of the Gentiles; and therein the Lord will be well pleased. "He will magnify the law;" that is, Divine revelation in all the parts of it, and will "make it honourable." The law is truly honourable, and the things of it are great things; and if men will not magnify it by their obedience to it, God will magnify it himself, by punishing them for their disobedience. He will "magnify the law," by accomplishing what is written in it; will magnify its authority, its efficacy, its equity. He will do it at last, when all men shall be "judged by the law of liberty," Jas. ii. 12. He is doing it every day. What is it that God is doing in the world, but magnifying the law, and making it honourable?

Fourthly. The calamities God will bring upon the Jewish nation for their wilful blindness and deafness; ver. 22, they are "robbed and spoiled." Those that were impenitent and unreformed in Babylon were sentenced to a perpetual captivity. It was for their sins that they were not only spoiled of all their possessions in their own land, but in the land of their enemies; they were some of them "snared in holes," and others "hid in prison houses." They cannot help themselves, for they are snared; their friends cannot help them, for they are hid; and their enemies have forgot them in their prisons. They, and all they have, are for a prey and for a spoil; and there is none that delivereth either by force or ransom; nor any that dares say to the proud oppressors, Restore. There they lie, and there they are likely to lie. This had its full accomplishment in the final destruction of the Jewish nation by the Romans, which God brought upon them for rejecting the Gospel of Christ.

Fifthly. The counsel given them in order to their relief; for, though their case be sad, it is not desperate. The generality of them are deaf, they would not hearken to the voice of God's word; he will therefore try his rod, and see who among them will give ear to that, ver. 23. We must not despair concerning those who have been long reasoned with in vain, but that at length some of them will give ear and hearken. If one method do not take effect another may; and sinners shall be left inexcusable. Observe, 1st. We may all of us, if we will, hear the voice of God, and are called and invited to hear it. 2nd. It is worth while to inquire who they are that perceive God speaking to them, and are willing to hear him. 3rd. Of the many that hear the voice of God there are very few that hearken to it, or heed it, that hear it with attention Writ. The people here meant are the Jews according to some, but many critics suppose Gentiles are intended. On the whole we prefer to understand that the Jews are meant in this verse, as the Gentiles are in the next.

xliii. 9. The Hebrew word rendered "people" here is plural, "peoples," and different from that so translated in verse 8.

xliii. 10. Those who are addressed are individually "witnesses," but collectively a servant; such at least is the ordinary view, but it has been suggested that the "servant" is the exalted person introduced at chap. xlii. 1, however understood. The latter clause is equivalent to "the first and the last," the eternal God who precedes and outlives all rivals.

xliii. 14. The words, "and have brought down all their nobles," &c., should be translated, "and have brought down all their fugitives (or, all of them as fugitives), and the Chaldeans in the ships of their rejoicing;" i.e., in which they rejoiced. The Chaldeans were and application. 4th. In hearing the word we must have an eye to the time to come. We must hear for hereafter, for what may occur betwixt us and the grave. We must especially hear for eternity; we must hear the word with another world in our eye. The counsel is,

1. To acknowledge the hand of God in their afflictions; and, whoever were the instruments, to have an eye to him as the principal agent; ver. 24, "Who gave Jacob and Israel," that people that used to have such an interest in heaven, and such a dominion on earth, who gave them "for a spoil to the robbers," as they are now to the Babylonians, to the Romans? "Did not the Lord?" You know he did. Consider it then, and hear his voice in these judgments.

2. To acknowledge that they had provoked God thus to abandon them, and had brought all these calamities upon themselves. 1st. These punishments were first inflicted on them for their disobedience to the laws of God; It is he "against whom we have sinned." The prophet puts himself into the number of the sinners, as Dan. ix. 7, 8, "We have sinned," we have all brought fuel to the fire; and there are those among us that have wilfully refused to "walk in his ways." Jacob and Israel had never been given up to the robbers if they had not by their iniquities sold themselves. For therefore it is, because they have violated the commands of the law, that God has brought upon them the curses of the law. He hath not dropped, but "poured upon him the fury of his anger, and the strength of battle;" that is, all the desolations of war, which have "set him on fire round about;" for God surrounds the wicked with his judgments, as he doth the righteous with his favours. See the power of God's anger; no resisting it, no escaping it. See the mischief that sin makes; it provokes God to anger against a people, and so kindles a universal conflagration, sets all on fire. 2nd. These judgments were continued upon them for their senselessness and incorrigibleness under the rod of God. The fire of God's wrath kindled upon him, and he knew it not; was not aware of it, took no notice of the judgments, at least not of the hand of God in them. Nay, it burnt him; and though he could not then but know it, and feel it, yet he laid it not to heart; was not awakened by the fiery rebukes he was under, nor at all affected with them. And those who are not humbled by lesser judgments, must expect greater; for when God judgeth he will overcome.

CHAPTER XLIII.

The contents of this chapter are much the same with that of the foregoing chapter, looking at the release of the Jews out of their captivity; but looking through that, and beyond that, to the great work of man's redemption by Jesus Christ, and the grace of the Gospel, which through him believers partake of. Here are, I. Precious promises made to God's people in their affliction, of his presence with them, for their support under it, and their deliverance out of it, ver. 1—7. II. A challenge to idols, to vie with the omniscience and omnipotence of God, ver. 8—13. III. Encouragement given to the people of God to hope for their deliverance out of Babylon, from the consideration of what God did for their fathers, when he brought them out of Egypt, ver. 14—21. IV. A method taken to prepare the people for their deliverance, by putting them in mind of their sins, by which they had provoked God to send them into captivity, and continue them there, that they might repent, and seek to God for pardoning mercy, ver. 22—28.

BUT now thus saith the LORD that created thee, O Jacob,
And he that formed thee, O Israel,
Fear not: for I have redeemed thee,
I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine.
2 When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee;
And through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee:
When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be [burned;
Neither shall the flame kindle upon thee
3 For I am the LORD thy God,
The Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour:
I gave Egypt for thy ransom,
Ethiopia and Seba for thee.
4 Since thou wast precious in my sight,
Thou hast been honourable, and I have loved thee:
Therefore will I give men for thee,
And people for thy life
5 Fear not: for I am with thee:
I will bring thy seed from the east,
And gather thee from the west;
6 I will say to the north, Give up;
And to the south, Keep not back:
Bring my sons from far,
And my daughters from the ends of the earth,
7 Even every one that is called by my name:
For I have created him for my glory, I have formed him;
Yea, I have made him.

This chapter has a plain connexion with the close of the foregoing chapter, but a very surprising one. It was there said, that Jacob and Israel would not walk in God's ways, and when he corrected them for their disobedience they were stubborn, and laid it not to heart. And now one would think it should have followed, that therefore God would utterly abandon and destroy them. No; the next words are, "But now fear not, O Jacob, O Israel; I have redeemed thee, and thou art mine." Though many among them were untractable and incorrigible, yet God would continue his love and care for his people, and the body of that nation should still be reserved for mercy. God's goodness takes occasion from man's badness to appear so much the more illustrious: "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound," Rom. v. 20; and "Mercy rejoiceth against judgment," as having prevailed and carried the day, Jas. ii. 13. Now the sun breaking out thus of a sudden from behind a thick and dark cloud, shines the brighter, and with a pleasing surprise. The expressions of God's favour and good-will to his people here are very high, and speak abundance of comfort to all the spiritual seed of upright Jacob and praying Israel. For to us is this Gospel preached, as well as unto them that were captives in Babylon, Heb. iv. 2. Here is,

First. The ground of God's care and concern for his people, and the interests of his church and kingdom among men. Jacob and Israel, though in a sinful, miserable condition, yet shall be looked after. For, 1. They are God's workmanship, created by him unto good works, Eph. ii. 10. He hath created them, and formed them; not only given them a being, but this being, formed them into a people, constituted their government, and incorporated them by the charter of his covenant. The new creature, wherever it is, is of God's forming; and he will not forsake the work of his own hands. 2. They are the people of his purchase; he hath redeemed them. Out of the land of Egypt he first redeemed them, and out of many other bondages, "in his love and in his pity," ch. lxiii. 9. Much more will he take care of those who are redeemed with the blood of his Son. 3. They are his peculiar people, whom he hath distinguished from others, and set apart for himself. He has called them by name, as those he has a particular intimacy with, and concern for; and they are his, appropriated to him, and that he has a special interest in. 4. He is their God in covenant; ver. 3, "I am the Lord thy God," worshipped by thee, and engaged by promise to thee, "the holy One of Israel," that is, the God of Israel; for the true God is a holy One, and holiness becomes his house. And upon all these accounts he might justly say, "Fear not," ver. 1, and again, ver. 5, "Fear not." Those that have God for them need not fear who or what can be against them.

Secondly. The former instances of this care. 1. God had purchased them dear; "I gave Egypt for thy ransom," for Egypt was quite laid waste by one plague after another, all their firstborn slain, and all their men of war drowned; and all this to force a way for Israel's deliverance from them. Egypt shall be sacrificed, rather than Israel shall be continued in slavery when the time is come for their release. The Ethiopians had invaded them in Asa's time; but they shall be destroyed rather than Israel shall be disturbed. And if this was reckoned so great a thing, to give "Egypt for their ransom," what reason have we to admire God's love to us in giving his own Son to be a ransom for us! 1 Jno. iv. 10. What is Ethiopia and Seba, all their lives and all their treasures, compared with the blood of Christ? 2. He had prized them accordingly, and they were very dear to him; ver. 4, "Since thou hast been precious in my sight thou hast been honourable." Note, True believers are precious in God's sight, they are his jewels, his peculiar treasure, Ex. xix. 5, he loves them, his delight is in them above any people; his church is his vineyard. And this makes God's people truly honourable, and their name great; for so men are really, as they are in God's eye. When the forces of Sennacherib, that they might be diverted from falling upon Israel, were directed by Providence to fall upon Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba, then God gave those countries for Israel, and shewed how precious his people were in his sight; so some understand it.

Thirdly. The farther instances God would yet give them of this care and kindness.

1. He would be present with them in their greatest difficulties and dangers; ver. 2, "When thou passest through the waters" and the rivers, through the fire and the flame, "I will be with thee," and that shall be thy security. When dangers are very imminent and threatening, thou shalt be delivered out of them. Did they, in their journey, pass through deep waters, they should not perish in them; "The rivers shall not overflow thee." Should they, by their persecutors, be cast into a fiery furnace, for their constant adherence to their God, yet then the flame should not kindle upon them; which was fulfilled in the letter, in the wonderful preservation of the three children, Dan. iii. Though they went through fire and water, which would be to them as the valley of the shadow of death, yet while they had God with them they need fear no evil; they should be borne up, and brought out in a wealthy place, Ps. lxvi. 12.

2. He would still, when there was occasion, make all the interests of the children of men truckle to the interests of his own children. I will "give men for thee," great men, mighty men, and men of war, and people; men by wholesale, for thy life. Nations shall be sacrificed to thy welfare. All shall be cut off, rather than God's Israel shall; so precious are they in his sight. The affairs of the world shall all be ordered and directed so as to be most for the good of the church, 2 Chr. xvi. 9.

3. Those of them that were scattered and dispersed in other nations should all be gathered in, and share in the blessings of the public, ver. 5—7. Some of the seed of Israel were dispersed into all countries, east, west, north, and south, or into all the parts of the country of Babylon; but those whose spirits God stirred up to go to Jerusalem should be fetched in from all parts. The Divine grace should reach those that lay most remote, and at the greatest distance from each other. And when the time was come nothing should prevent their coming together to return in a body; in answer to that prayer, Ps. cvi. 47, "Gather us from among the heathen;" and in performance of that promise, Deu. xxx. 4, "If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, thence will the Lord thy God gather thee:" which we find pleaded on behalf of the children of the captivity, Neh. i. 9. But who are the seed of Israel, that shall be thus carefully gathered in? He tells us, ver. 7, they are such as God has marked for mercy. For, 1st. They are called by his name; they make profession of religion, and are distinguished from the rest of the world by their covenant relation to God, and denomination from him. 2nd. They are created for his glory; the spirit of Israelites is created in them, and they are formed according to the will of God; and these shall be gathered in. Note, Those only are fit to be called by the name of God that are created by his grace for glory. And those whom God hath created and called shall be gathered in now to Christ as their Head, and hereafter to heaven as their home. He shall "gather in his elect from the four winds." This promise points at the gathering in of the "dispersed of the Gentiles," and the strangers scattered, by the Gospel of Christ, who died to gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad. For the promise was to "all that were afar off," even as many as the Lord our God shall call and create. God is with the church, and therefore let her not fear; none that belong to her shall be lost.

8 Bring forth the blind people that have eyes,
And the deaf that have ears.
9 Let all the nations be gathered together,
And let the people be assembled:
Who among them can declare this, and shew us former things? [justified:
Let them bring forth their witnesses, that they may be
Or let them hear, and say, It is truth.
10 Ye are my witnesses, saith the LORD, proud of their ships, and in them they would be driven to take refuge. The pride and glory of Babylon would be swept away.

xliii. 16, 17. The allusion here is probably to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, and specially to the passage through the Red Sea.

xliii. 19, 20. This points to the deliverance from Babylon, the journey homeward being accomplished under the Divine protection. The so-called dragons and owls seem to have been really reptiles and ostriches; but some say we should read wild dogs for "dragons."

xliii 23. The second clause means that the offerings and incense required involved no hard service and burdensome ceremonies.

xliii. 24. The Israelites had failed in their duty, and tried the patience of God. The sweet cane was used in compounding sacred perfumes. As no aromatic cane is found in Palestine, it had to be purchased, and was probably obtained from India.

xliii. 27. Many have thought the words "thy first father" refer to Adam, but some think Abraham is meant; and other explanations

And my servant whom I have chosen:
That ye may know and believe me,
And understand that I am he:
Before me there was no God formed,
Neither shall there be after me.
11 I, even I, am the LORD;
And beside me there is no saviour
12 I have declared, and have saved,
And I have shewed, when there was no strange god among you:
Therefore ye are my witnesses, saith the LORD,
That I am God.
13 Yea, before the day was I am he;
And there is none that can deliver out of my hand:
I will work, and who shall let it?

God here challengeth the worshippers of idols to produce such proofs of the divinity of their false gods as even this very instance, to go no farther, of the redemption of the Jews out of Babylon, furnished the people of Israel with, to prove that their God is the true and living God, and he only.

First. The patrons of idolatry are here called to appear, and say what they have to say in defence of their idols, ver. 8, 9. The gods "have eyes, and see not; ears, and hear not;" and "they that make them, and trust in them, are like unto them;" so David had said, Ps. cxv. 8; to which the prophet seems here to refer, when he calls idolaters "blind people that have eyes, and deaf people that have ears." They have the shape, and capacities, and faculties of men; but they are, in effect, destitute of reason and common sense, or they would never worship gods of their own making. "Let all the nations" therefore "be gathered together;" let them help one another, and with a combined force plead the cause of their dunghill gods. And if they have nothing to say in their own justification let them hear what the God of Israel hath to say for their conviction and confutation.

Secondly. God's witnesses are subpœnaed, or summoned to appear and give in evidence for him; ver. 10, "Ye," O Israelites, all ye that are called by my name, "ye are all my witnesses, and" so is "my servant whom I have chosen." It was Christ himself that was so described, ch. xlii. 1, "My servant, and mine elect." All the prophets that testified of Christ, and Christ himself, the great Prophet, are here appealed to as God's witnesses. 1st. God's people are witnesses for him, and can attest, upon their own knowledge and experience, concerning the power of his grace, the sweetness of his comforts, the tenderness of his providence, and the truth of his promise. They will be forward to witness for him, that he is gracious, and no word of his has fallen to the ground. 2nd. His prophets are in a particular manner witnesses for him, with whom his secret is, and who know more of him than others do. But the Messiah especially is given to be a witness for him to the people; having lain in his bosom from eternity, he has declared him. Now,

1. Let us see what the point is which these witnesses were called to prove; ver. 12, "Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, that I am God." Note, Those who do themselves acknowledge that the Lord is God should be ready to testify what they know of him to others, that they also may be brought to the acknowledgment of it: "I believed, therefore have I spoken." Particularly, since you cannot but know, and believe, and understand, you must be ready to bear record, 1st. "That I am he," the only true God; that I am a Being self-existent and self-sufficient; I am he whom you are to fear, and worship, and trust in. Nay, ver. 13, "Before the day was," before the first day of time, before the creation of the light, and consequently from eternity, "I am he." The idols were but of yesterday, "new gods that came newly up," Deu. xxxii. 17, but the God of Israel was from everlasting. 2nd. That "before me there was no God formed, nor shall be after me." The idols were gods formed, dii facti, —'made gods;' or, rather, fictitii,—'fictitious;' by nature they were no gods, Gal. iv. 8. And God had a being from eternity; yea, and a religion in this world, before there were either idols or idolaters. Truth is more ancient than error; and he will have a being to eternity, and will be worshipped and glorified when idols are famished and abolished, and idolatry shall be no more. True religion will keep its ground, and survive all opposition and competition; 'great is the truth, and will prevail.' 3rd. That "I, even I, am the Lord," the great Jehovah, who is, and was, and is to come; and "beside me there is no Saviour," ver. 11. See what it is that the great God glories in; not so much that he is the alone Ruler as that he is the alone Saviour; for he delights to do good, "is the Saviour of all men," 1 Tim. iv. 10.

2. Let us see what the proofs are which are produced for the confirmation of this point. It appears, 1st. That the Lord is God by two proofs: First. He has an infinite and infallible knowledge, as is evident from the predictions of his word; ver. 12, "I have declared, and I have shewed" that which has without fail come to pass. Nay, I never declared or shewed any thing but it has been accomplished; I shewed "when there was no strange god among you;" that is, when you pretended not to consult any oracles but mine, or to have any prophets but mine. It is said, when they came out of Egypt, that "the Lord alone did lead them, and there was no strange god with them." Secondly. He has an infinite and irresistible power, as is evident from the performances of his providence. He pleads not only "I have shewed," but "I have saved;" not only foretold what none else could foresee, but done what none else could do; for, ver. 13, none "can deliver out of my hand," those whom I will punish; not only no man can, but none of all the gods of the heathen can protect. It is therefore a "fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God," because there is no getting out of them again. "I will work" what I have designed, both in mercy and judgment; and who shall either oppose or retard it? 2nd. That the gods of the heathen who are rivals with him are not only inferior to him, but no gods at all; which is proved, ver. 9, by a challenge, "Who among them can declare this" that I now declare? Who can foretell things to come? Nay, which of them can shew us former things? ch. xli. 22. They cannot so much as inspire an historian, much less a prophet; they are challenged to join issue upon this. "Let them bring forth their witnesses" to prove their omniscience and omnipotence; and, First. If they do prove them they shall be justified; the idols in demanding homage, and the idolaters in paying it. Secondly. If they do not prove them let them say, "It is truth;" that is, let them own the true God, and receive the truth concerning him, that he is God alone. The cause of God is not afraid to stand a fair trial; but it may reasonably be expected that those who cannot justify themselves in their irreligion should submit to the power of the truth and true religion.

14 Thus saith the LORD,
Your redeemer, the Holy One of Israel;
For your sake I have sent to Babylon,
And have brought down all their nobles,
And the Chaldeans, whose cry is in the ships.
15 I am the LORD, your Holy One,
The creator of Israel, your King.
16 Thus saith the LORD,
Which maketh a way in the sea,
And a path in the mighty waters;
17 Which bringeth forth the chariot and horse, the army and the power;
They shall lie down together, they shall not rise:
They are extinct, they are quenched as tow
18 Remember ye not the former things,
Neither consider the things of old.
19 Behold, I will do a new thing;
Now it shall spring forth; shall ye not know it?
I will even make a way in the wilderness,
And rivers in the desert.
20 The beast of the field shall honour me,
The dragons and the owls:
Because I give waters in the wilderness,
And rivers in the desert,
To give drink to my people, my chosen.
21 This people have I formed for myself;
They shall shew forth my praise.

To so low an ebb was the faith and hope of God's people in Babylon brought, that there needed line upon line to assure them that they should be released out of their captivity; and therefore, that they might have strong consolation, the assurances of it are often repeated, and here very expressly and encouragingly.

First. God here takes to himself such titles of his honour as were very encouraging to them. He is the Lord their Redeemer; not only that will redeem them, but will take it upon him as his office, and make it his business. If he be their God, he will be all to them which they need; and therefore, when they are in bondage, he will be their Redeemer. He is "the Holy One of Israel;" and again, ver. 15, their Holy One, and therefore will make good every word he hath spoken to them. He is "the Creator of Israel," that made them a people out of nothing, (for that is creation,) nay, worse than nothing; and he is their King, that owns them as his people, and presides among them.

Secondly. He assures them he would find out a way to break the power of their oppressors that held them captives, and filled up the measure of their own iniquity by their resolution never to let them go, ch. xiv. 17. God will take care to send a victorious prince and army to Babylon, that should bring down all their nobles, and lay their honour in the dust, and all their people too, even the Chaldeans, whose "cry is in the ships,"—for seamen use to be noisy,—or, whose cry is to the ships, as their refuge when the city is taken, that they may escape by the benefit of their great river. Note, The destruction of Babylon must make way for the enlargement of God's people; and in the prediction of the fall of the New Testament Babylon we meet with the cries and lamentations of the sailors, Rev. xviii. 17. And observe, it is for Israel's sake that Babylon is ruined, to make way for their deliverance.

Thirdly. He reminds them of the great things he did for their fathers when he brought them out of the land of Egypt; for so it may be read, ver. 16, 17, 'Thus saith the Lord, which did make a way in the sea, the Red sea, and did bring forth Pharaoh's chariot and horse that they might lie down together in the bottom of the sea, and never rise, but be extinct.' He that did this can, if he pleaseth, make a way for you in the sea when you return out of Babylon, and will do it, rather than leave you there. Note, For the encouragement of our faith and hope, it is good for us often to remember what God has done formerly for his people against his and their enemies. Think particularly what he did at the Red sea, how he made it, 1. A road to his people, a straight way, a near way; nay, a refuge to them, into which they fled and were safe, the waters being a wall unto them. 2. A grave to his enemies. The chariot and horse were drawn out by him who is Lord of all hosts, on purpose that they might fall together; howbeit, "they meant not so," Mic. iv. 11, 12.

Fourthly. He promiseth to do yet greater things for them than he had done in the days of old; so that they should have reason to ask in a way of complaint, as Gideon did, "Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of?" For they should see them repeated, nay, they should see them outdone; ver. 18, "Remember not the former things," from them to take occasion, as some do, to undervalue the present things, as if the former days were better than these; no, you may, if you will, comparatively forget them, and yet know enough by the events of your own day to convince you that the Lord is God alone; for, behold, the Lord will do a new thing, no way inferior both for the wonder and the worth of the mercy, to the things of old. The best exposition of this is Jer. xvi. 14, 15; xxiii. 7, 8, "It shall no more be said, The Lord liveth that brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt;" that is an old thing, the remembrance of which will be in a manner lost in the new thing, the new proof that the Lord liveth; for he "brought up the children of Israel out of the land of the north." Though former mercies must not be forgotten, fresh mercies must in a special manner be improved. Now it springs forth, as it were a surprise upon you; you are like them that dream. "Shall ye not know it?" and will ye not own God's hand in it?

Fifthly. He promiseth not only to deliver them out of Babylon, but to conduct them safely and comfortably to their own land; ver. 19, 20, "I will make a way in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert;" for it seems the way from Babylon to Canaan, as well as from Egypt, lay through a desert land; which while the returning captives passed through, God would provide for them, that might be mentioned, as high priests, priests in general, princes, or some one prince in particular. Perhaps the real sense is conveyed by "ancestors" or "forefathers," and so the phrase has been expounded by eminent critics.

xliii. 28. For "princes of the sanctuary" the margin has "holy princes," which is the rendering of the Latin Vulgate. If this is correct, as it may be, the spiritual directors of the people are intended, whether the priests in general or the high priests in particular.

xliv. 1—5. These verses belong to the prophecy of the previous chapter, with which they should have been reckoned. The name Jesurun given to Israel in verse 2 is only found elsewhere in Deuteronomy, where it occurs three times. In verse 3, "upon him that is thirsty" should be "upon that which is thirsty," as the allusion is to things, and not to persons.

xliv. 7. To "call" here means to order or bid an event to occur. Hence, to "declare" signifies the prediction of the event ordained their camp should be both well victualled, and under a good conduct. The same power that made a "way in the sea," ver. 16, can make a "way in the wilderness," and will force its passage through the greatest difficulties. And he that made dry land in the waters can produce waters in the driest land in such abundance as not only to give drink to his people, his chosen, but the beasts of the field, also the dragons and the ostriches, who are therefore said to honour God for it; that is, it is such a sensible refreshment, and yields them so much satisfaction, that if they were capable of doing it they would praise God for it, and shame man, who is made capable of praising his benefactor, and doth not. Now, 1. This looks back to what God did for Israel when he led them through the wilderness from Egypt to Canaan, and fetched water out of a rock to follow them. What God did for them formerly he would do again, for he is still the same. And though we do not find that the miracle was repeated in their return out of Babylon, yet the mercy was, in the common course of providence, for which they ought to be no less thankful to God. 2. It looks forward, not only to all the instances of God's care of the Jewish church in the latter ages of it, betwixt their return from Babylon and the coming of Christ, but to the grace of the Gospel, especially as it is manifested to the Gentile world, by which "a way is opened in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert;" that is, the world that lay like a desert, in ignorance and unfruitfulness, was blessed with a Divine conduct and Divine comforts, and, in order to both, with a plentiful effusion of the Spirit. The sinners of the Gentiles, that had been as the beasts of the field, running wild, fierce as the dragons, stupid as the owls or ostriches, shall be brought to honour God for the extent of his grace to his chosen among them.

Sixthly. He runs up all these promised blessings to their great original, the purposes and designs of his own glory; ver. 21, "This people have I formed for myself," and therefore I do all this for them, that they may "shew forth my praise." Note, 1. The church is of God's forming, and so are all the living members of it. The new heavens, the new earth, the new man, are the work of God's hand, and are no more, no better, than he makes them; they are fashioned according to his will. 2. He forms it for himself. He that is the first cause is the highest end, both of the first and of the new creation. "The Lord hath made all things for himself," his Israel especially, to be to him for "a people, and for a name, and for a praise;" and no otherwise can they be for him, or serviceable to him, but as his grace is glorified in them, Jer. xiii. 11; Eph. i. 6, 12, 14. 3. It therefore is our duty to shew forth his praise, not only with our lips, but in our lives, by giving up ourselves to his service. As he formed us, so he feeds us, and keeps us, and leads us, and all for himself. For every instance therefore of his goodness we must praise him, else we answer not the end of the beings and blessings we have.

22 But thou hast not called upon me, O Jacob;
But thou hast been weary of me, O Israel.
23 Thou hast not brought me the small cattle of thy burnt offerings;
Neither hast thou honoured me with thy sacrifices
I have not caused thee to serve with an offering,
Nor wearied thee with incense.
24 Thou hast bought me no sweet cane with money,
Neither hast thou filled me with the fat of thy sacrifices:
But thou hast made me to serve with thy sins,
Thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities.
25 I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake,
And will not remember thy sins.
26 Put me in remembrance: let us plead together:
Declare thou, that thou mayest be justified.
27 Thy first father hath sinned,
And thy teachers have transgressed against me.
28 Therefore I have profaned the princes of the sanctuary,
And have given Jacob to the curse,
And Israel to reproaches.

This charge, and a high charge it is, which is here exhibited against Jacob and Israel, God's professing people, comes in here, 1. To clear God's justice in bringing them into captivity, and to vindicate that. Were they not in covenant with him? Had they not his sanctuary among them? "Why then did the Lord deal thus with this land?" Deu. xxix, 24. Here is a good reason given. They had neglected God, and had cast him off, and therefore he justly rejected them, and gave them to the curse, ver. 28; and they must be brought to own this before they are prepared for deliverance; and they did so, Dan. ix. 5; Neh. ix. 33. 2. To advance God's mercy in their deliverance, and to make that appear more glorious. Many things are before observed to magnify the power of God in it; but this magnifies his goodness, that he should do such great and kind things for a people that had been so very provoking to him, and were now suffering the punishment of their iniquity. The pardoning of their sin was as great an instance of God's power, (for so Moses reckons it, Num. xiv. 17,) as the breaking of the yoke of their captivity. Now observe here,

First. What the sins are they are here charged with.

1. Omissions of the good which God had commanded; and this part of the charge is here much insisted upon. And observe how it comes in with a "but:" compare ver. 21, where God tells them what favours he had bestowed upon them, and what his just expectations were from them. He had formed them for himself, intending they should shew forth his praise; but they had not done so; they had frustrated God's expectations from them, and made very ill returns to him for his favours; for, 1st. They had cast off prayer. "Thou hast not called upon me, O Jacob." Jacob was a man famous for prayer, Hos. xii. 4; his seed bore his name, but did not tread in his steps, and therefore are justly upbraided with it. God takes it ill when children degenerate from the virtue and devotion of their pious ancestors. To boast of the name of Jacob, and yet live without prayer, is to mock God, and deceive ourselves. If Jacob doth not call upon God, who will? 2. They were grown sick of their religion. Thou art Israel, the seed not only of a praying, but of a prevailing father, that was a prince with God; and yet not valuing his experiences any more than his example, "Thou hast been weary of me." They had been in relation to God, employed in his service, and in communion with him; but they began to snuff at it, and to say, "Behold, what a weariness is it!" Note, Those who neglect to call upon God do in effect tell him they are weary of him, and have a mind to change their master. 3rd. They grudged the expense of their devotion, and were niggardly and penurious in it. They were for a cheap religion; and in those acts of devotion that were costly, they desired to be excused. They had not brought, no, not their small cattle, the lambs and kids, which God required for burnt offerings, ver. 23; much less did they bring their greater cattle, pretending they could not spare them, they must have them for the maintenance of their families. So little sense had they of the greatness of God, and their obligations to him, that they could not find in their hearts to part with a lamb out of their flock for his honour, though he called for it, and would graciously accept it. Sweet cane, or calamus, was used for the holy oil, incense, and perfume, but they were not willing to be at the charge of that, ver. 24; what they had must serve, though it was old and good for nothing; they would not buy fresh. Perhaps it was usual for devout, pious persons to bring freewill incense, as well as other freewill offerings, but they were not so generous. Nor did they fill the altar of God, nor moisten it abundantly, as they should have done, with the fat of their sacrifices; what sacrifices they did bring were of the lean and refuse of their cattle, that had no fat in them to regale the altar with. 4th. What sacrifices they did offer, they did not honour God with them, and so they were in effect as no sacrifices; ver. 23, "Neither hast thou honoured me with thy sacrifices." Some of them offered their sacrifices to false gods; others, that offered them to the true God, were either careless in the manner of it or hypocritical in their intentions, so that they might be truly said not to honour God with them, but rather to dishonour him. And that which aggravated their neglect of sacrificing was, that, as God had appointed it, it was no burthensome thing; it was not a service that they had any reason at all to complain of. "I have not caused thee to serve with an offering;" that is, I have not made it a task and drudgery to you, whatever you, through the corruption of your natures, have made it yourselves: "I have not wearied thee with incense." None of God's commandments are grievous, no, not those concerning sacrifice and incense. They were not more costly than might be afforded by them that lived in such a plentiful country; nor did their attendance on them require any more time than they could well spare; but that which especially forbade them to call it a wearisome service was, that they were required to be cheerful and pleasant, and to rejoice before God in all their approaches to him, Deu. xii. 12. They had many feasts and good days, but only one day in all the year in which they were to afflict their souls. The ordinances of the ceremonial law, though, in comparison with Christ's easy yoke, they are spoken of as heavy, Acts xv. 10, yet, in comparison with the service that idolaters did to their false gods, they were light, and not to be called services, or found fault with as wearisome. God did not require them to sacrifice their children, as Moloch did.

2. Commissions of the evil which God had forbidden; and omissions commonly make way for commissions. "Thou hast made me to serve with thy sins." When we make God's gifts the food and fuel of our lusts, and his providence to patronise our wicked projects, especially when we encourage ourselves to continue in sin, because grace hath abounded, then we make God to serve with our sins; or it may note what a grief and burthen sin is to God. It doth not only weary men, and make the creation groan, but it wearies my God also, ch. vii. 13, and makes the Creator complain that he is grieved, Ps. xcv. 10; that he is broken, Eze. vi. 9; that he is pressed with sinners, "as a cart is pressed that is full of sheaves," Am. ii. 13; and to cry out, "Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries," ch. i. 24. The antithesis is observable; God had not made them to serve with their sacrifices, but they had made him to serve with their sins. The master had not tired the servants with his commands, but they had tired him with their disobedience. Those are wicked servants indeed that carry it so ill to so good a master. God is tender of our comfort, but we are careless of his honour. Let this engage us to keep close to our duty, that it is easy, and reasonable, and no disparagement to us, nor too hard for us.

Secondly. What were the aggravations of their sin, ver. 27. 1. That they were children of disobedience; for their "first father," that is, their forefathers, "had sinned;" and they had not only sinned in their loins, but sinned like them. Ezra confesseth this, "Since the days of our fathers have we been in a great trespass," Ezr. ix. 7. But their forefathers are called their "first father," to put us in mind of the apostacy and rebellion of our "first father," Adam, to which corrupt fountain we must run up the streams of all our transgressions. 2. That they were scholars of disobedience too, for their teachers had transgressed against God; were guilty of gross, scandalous sins, and the people, no doubt, would learn to do as they did. It is ill with a people when their leaders cause them to err, and their teachers, that should reform them, corrupt them.

Thirdly. What were the tokens of God's displeasure against them for their sins, ver. 28. He brought ruin both upon church and state. 1. The honour of their church was laid in the dust, and trampled on. "I have profaned the princes of the sanctuary;" that is, the priests and Levites that presided with great dignity and power in the temple service: they profaned themselves, and made themselves vile by their enormities, and then God profaned them, and made them vile by their calamities, and the contempt they fell into, Mal. ii. 9. 2. The honour of their state was ruined likewise. "I have given Jacob to the curse;" that is, to be cursed, and hated, and abused by all their neighbours; "and Israel to reproach," to be insulted, ridiculed, and triumphed over by their enemies. They reproached them perhaps for that in them that was good; they mocked at their sabbaths, Lam. i. 7; but God gave them up to reproach, to correct them for what was amiss. Note, The dishonour which men at any time do us should humble us for the dishonour we have done to God; and therefore we must bear it patiently, because we suffer it justly, and must acknowledge that to us belongs confusion.

Fourthly. What were the riches of God's mercy towards them notwithstanding; ver. 25, "I, even I, am he who," for all this, "blotteth out thy transgressions." This gracious declaration of God's readiness to pardon sin comes in very strangely; the charge runs very high, "Thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities," ver. 24. Now one would think it should follow, 'I, even I, am he that will destroy thee, and burthen myself no longer with care about thee;' no, "I, even I, am he that will forgive thee;" as if the great God would teach us that forgiving injuries is the best way to make ourselves easy, and to keep ourselves from being wearied with them. This comes in here to encourage them to repent, because there is forgiveness with God, and to shew the freeness of Divine mercy. Where sin has been exceeding sinful, grace appears exceeding gracious. Apply this, 1. To the forgiving of the sins of Israel as a people, in their national capacity. When God stopped the course of threatening judgments, and saved them from utter ruin, even then when he had them under severe rebukes, then he might be said to blot out their transgressions; though he corrected them, he was reconciled to them again, and did not cut them off from being a people. This he did many a time, till they rejected Christ and his Gospel, which was a sin against the remedy, and then he would forgive them no more as a nation, but utterly destroy them. 2. To the forgiving of the sins of every particular believing penitent. Transgressions and sins; infirmities, though never so numerous; backslidings, though never so heinous. Observe here, 1st. How the pardon is expressed. He will blot them out, as a

The phrase rendered "ancient people" is also explained "eternal people" and "everlasting people," but it may simply signify "the people in olden time." Twelve or thirteen hundred years before Isaiah, God appointed the race of Abraham to be his people. Some, however, think the human race is intended. This is possibly correct, but we prefer to understand it of Israel.

xliv. 8. The Hebrew for "there is no God" is "there is no Rock." God is called a rock, as the foundation and stronghold of his people.

xliv. 12. "The smith" here is a blacksmith, who cuts off a piece of metal with a chisel (not "tongs"), and after heating it red-hot in the fire, hammers it into the proper shape. Some understand the description of making, not an idol, but an axe, which is, we think, quite erroneous. The verses which follow describe the making of wooden idols.

xliv. 14. Instead of "cypress" the ilex or holm oak may be meant. For "strengtheneth" we may render "chooses," but the real sense cloud is blotted out by the beams of the sun, ch. xliv. 22; as a debt is blotted out, not to appear against the debtor; the book is crossed, as if the debt were paid, because it is pardoned upon the payment which the Surety has made: or, as a sentence is blotted out when it is reversed; as the curse was blotted out with the waters of jealousy, which made it of no effect to the innocent, Num. v. 23. He will not remember the sin, which intimates not only that he will remit the punishment of what is past, but it shall be no diminution to his love for the future. When God forgives, he forgets. 2nd. What is the ground and reason of the pardon. It is not for the sake of any thing in us, but for his own sake, for his mercy's sake, his promise's sake, and especially for his Son's sake, and that he may himself be glorified in it. 3rd. How God glories in it. "I, even I, am he." He glories in it as his prerogative. None can forgive sin but God only, and he will do it; it is his settled resolution. He will do it willingly, and with delight. It is his pleasure, it is his honour, so he is pleased to reckon it.

Those words, ver. 26, "Put me in remembrance," may be understood either, First. As a rebuke to a proud Pharisee, that stands upon his own justification before God, and expects to find favour for his merits, and not to be beholden to free grace. If you have any thing to say in your own justification, any thing to offer, for the sake of which you should be pardoned, and not for my sake, "put me in remembrance of it;" I give you leave to plead your own cause with me; declare what your merits are, "that you may be justified" by them: but those who are thus challenged will be speechless. Or, Secondly. As a direction and encouragement to a penitent publican. Is God thus ready to pardon sin, and when he pardons it will he remember it no more? Let us then put him in remembrance, mention before him those sins which he has forgiven; for they must be ever before us to humble us, though they are pardoned, Ps. li. 3. Put him in remembrance of the promises he has made to the penitent, and the satisfaction his Son has made for them. Plead these with him in wrestling for pardon, and declare these things, in order "that thou mayest be justified" freely by his grace. This is the only way, and it is a sure way, to peace. "Only acknowledge thy transgression."

CHAPTER XLIV.

God by the prophet goes on in this chapter as before, I. To encourage his people with the assurance of great blessings he had in store for them at their return out of captivity; and those typical of much greater, which the Gospel church, his spiritual Israel, should partake of in the days of the Messiah: and hereby he proves himself to be God alone, against all pretenders, ver. 1—8. II. To expose the sottishness and amazing folly of idol makers, and idol worshippers, ver. 9—20. III. To ratify and confirm the assurances he had given to his people of those great blessings, and to raise their joyful and believing expectations of them, ver. 21—28.

YET now hear, O Jacob my servant;
And Israel, whom I have chosen:
2 Thus saith the LORD that made thee
And formed thee from the womb, which will help thee;
Fear not, O Jacob, my servant;
And thou, Jesurun, whom I have chosen.
3 For I will pour water upon him that is thirsty,
And floods upon the dry ground:
I will pour my spirit upon thy seed,
And my blessing upon thine offspring:
4 And they shall spring up as among the grass,
As willows by the water courses.
5 One shall say, I am the LORD's;
And another shall call himself by the name of Jacob;
And another shall subscribe with his hand unto the
And surname himself by the name of Israel. [LORD,
6 Thus saith the LORD the King of Israel,
And his redeemer the LORD of hosts;
I am the first, and I am the last;
And beside me there is no God.
7 And who, as I, shall call,
And shall declare it, and set it in order for me,
Since I appointed the ancient people?
And the things that are coming, and shall come,
Let them shew unto them.
8 Fear ye not, neither be afraid:
Have not I told thee from that time, and have declared
Ye are even my witnesses. [it?
Is there a God beside me?
Yea, there is no God; I know not any.

Two great truths are abundantly made out in these verses:

First. That the people of God are a happy people, especially upon account of the covenant that is between them and God. The people of Israel were so, as a figure of the gospel Israel. Three things complete their happiness:

1. The covenant relations wherein they stand to God, ver. 1, 2. Israel is here called "Jesurun," 'the upright one;' for those only, like Nathanael, are Israelites indeed, in whom is no guile; and those only shall have the everlasting benefit of these promises. Jacob and Israel had been represented in the close of the foregoing chapter as very provoking, and obnoxious to God's wrath, and already given to the curse, and to reproaches; but, as if God's bowels yearned towards him, and his repentings were kindled together, mercy steps in with a non obstante,—'notwithstanding,' to all these quarrels. "Yet now hear, O Jacob, my servant;" thou and I will be friends again for all this. God had said, ch. xliii. 25, "I am he that blotteth out thy transgression," which is the only thing that creates this distance, and when that is taken away the streams of mercy run again in their former channel. The pardon of sin is the inlet of all the other blessings of the covenant; So and so I will do for them, saith God, (Heb. viii. 12,) "For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness." Therefore "hear, O Jacob," hear these comfortable words; therefore, "fear not, O Jacob," fear not thy sins, for they are pardoned; fear not thy troubles, for by the pardon of sin the property of them too is altered. Now the relations wherein they stand to him are very encouraging: 1st. They are his servants; and those that serve him he will own and stand by, and see that they be not wronged. 2nd. They are his chosen, and he will abide by his choice. He knows them that are his, and whom he has chosen he takes under special protection. 3rd. They are his creatures. He made them, and brought them into being; he formed them, and cast them into shape; he began betimes with them, for he formed them from the womb; and therefore he will help them over their difficulties, and help them in their services.

2. The covenant blessings which he hath secured to them and theirs, ver. 3, 4. 1st. They that are sensible of their spiritual wants, and the insufficiency of the creature to supply them, shall have abundant satisfaction in God; "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty," that thirsts after righteousness, he shall be filled. Water shall be poured out to those who truly desire spiritual blessings above all the delights of sense. 2nd. They that are barren as the dry ground shall be watered with the grace of God, with floods of that grace, and God will himself give the increase. If the ground be never so dry, God has floods of grace to water it with. 3rd. The water God will pour out is his Spirit, Jno. vii. 39, which God will pour out without measure upon the seed, that is, Christ, Gal. iii. 16; and by measure upon all the seed of the faithful, upon all the praying, wrestling seed of Jacob, Lu. xi. 13. This is the great New Testament promise, that God having sent his servant Christ, and upheld him, will send his Spirit to uphold us. 4th. This gift of the Holy Ghost is the great blessing God has reserved the plentiful effusion of for the latter days; "I will pour my Spirit," that is, my blessing; for where God gives his Spirit he will give all other blessings. 5th. This is reserved for the seed and offspring of the church; for so the covenant of grace runs, "I will be a God to thee, and to thy seed;" and to all who are thus made to partake of the privileges of adoption God will give the Spirit of adoption. 6th. Hereby there shall be a great increase of the church; thus it shall be spread to distant places; thus it shall be propagated and perpetuated to after times; they shall spring up, and grow as fast as "willows by the watercourses," and in every thing that is virtuous and praiseworthy shall be eminent, and excel all about them, as the willows overtop the grass among which they grow, ver. 4. Note, It is a great happiness to the church, and a great pleasure to good men, to see the rising generation hopeful and promising. And it will be so if God pour his Spirit upon them, that blessing, that blessing of blessings.

3. The consent they cheerfully give to their part of the covenant, ver. 5. When the Jews returned out of captivity, they renewed their covenant with God, Jer. l. 5, particularly that they would have no more to do with idols, Hos. xiv. 2, 3, 8. Backsliders must thus repent, and do their first works; many of those that were without did at that time join themselves to them, invited by that glorious appearance of God for them, Zec. viii. 23, Est. viii. 17; and they say, We are the Lord's, and call themselves by the name of Jacob: for there was one law, one covenant, "for the stranger, and for those that were born in the land." And, doubtless, it looks farther yet, to the conversion of the Gentiles, and the multitudes of them which, upon the effusion of the Spirit after Christ's ascension, should be joined to the Lord, and added to the church. These converts are "one and another," very many, of different ranks and nations, and all welcome to God, Col. iii. 11. When one doth it, another shall, by his example, be invited to do it, and then another; thus the zeal of one may provoke many. 1st. They shall resign themselves to God. Not one in the name of the rest, but every one for himself shall say, "I am the Lord's;" he has an incontestable right to rule me, and I submit to him, to all his commands, to all his disposals; I am and will be his only, his wholly, his for ever; will be for his interests, will be for his praise; living and dying I will be his. 2nd. They shall incorporate themselves with the people of God, "call themselves by the name of Jacob," forgetting their own people, and their father's house, and desirous to wear the character and livery of God's family. They shall love all God's people, shall associate with them, give them the right hand of fellowship, espouse their cause, seek the good of the church in general, and of all the particular members of it, and be willing to take their lot with them in all conditions. 3rd. They shall do this very solemnly. Some of them "shall subscribe with their hand unto the Lord," as, for the confirming of a bargain, a man sets his hand to it, and delivers it as his act and deed. The more express we are in our covenanting with God the better, Ex. xxiv. 7; Jos. xxiv. 26, 27; Neh. ix. 38. Fast bind, fast find.

Secondly. That, as the Israel of God are a happy people, so the God of Israel is a great God, and he is God alone. And this also, as the former, speaks abundant satisfaction to all that trust in him, ver. 6—8. Observe here, to God's glory and our comfort,

1. That the God we trust in is a God of incontestable sovereignty, and irresistible power. He is the Lord Jehovah, self-existent, and self-sufficient; and he is the Lord of hosts, of all the hosts of heaven and earth, of angels and men.

2. That he stands in relation to, and hath a particular concern for, his church. He is the "King of Israel, and his Redeemer;" therefore his Redeemer, because his King; and those that take God for their King shall have him for their Redeemer. When God would assert himself God alone, he proclaims himself Israel's God, that his people may be encouraged both to adhere to him and to triumph in him.

3. That he is eternal; the first and the last; that is, he is God from everlasting, before the worlds were, and will be so to everlasting, when the world shall be no more. If there were not a God to create, nothing had ever been; and if there were not a God to uphold, all would soon come to nothing again. He is all in all; is the first cause, from whom are all things; and the last end, to and for whom are all things, Rom. xi. 36. The alpha and the omega, Rev. i. 11.

4. That he is God alone; ver. 6, "Besides me there is no God;" and, ver. 8, "Is there a God besides me?" We will appeal to the greatest scholars, did they ever, in all their reading, meet with any other? To those that have had the largest acquaintance with the world, did they ever meet with any other? "There are gods many," 1 Cor. viii. 5, 6, called gods, and counterfeit gods; but is there any besides our God, that is infinite and eternal? Any besides him that is the creator of the world, and the protector and benefactor of the whole creation? Any besides him that can do that for their worshippers which he can and will do for his? "Ye are my witnesses;" I have been a nonsuch to you. You have tried other gods, have you found any of them all-sufficient to you, or any of them like me? "Yea, there is no God;" no rock, so the word is; none but he that can be a rock for a foundation to build on, a rock for shelter to flee to. God is "the rock," and "their rock is not as ours," Deu. xxxii. 4, 31. "I know not any;" as if he had said, I never met with any that offered to stand in competition with me, or that durst bring their pretensions to a fair trial. If I did know any that could befriend you better than I can, I would recommend you to them; but "I know not any." There is no is uncertain. The so-called "ash" is otherwise explained "pine" and "fig." In any case it is not our ash tree, the existence of which in Palestine is unknown, though it may be a sort of mountain ash, which the Arabs call by a similar name.

xliv. 18. By the words rendered "he hath shut their eyes" our translators probably understood that their blindness was in some sense the work of God. But it is maintained by distinguished critics that the Hebrew words do not refer to any agent, and that the Septuagint correctly renders them as a plural passive—"they were blinded." It favours this view to appeal to verse 20, in which the spiritual blindness of the idolater is traced to a deceived heart, a disposition and understanding so perverted that the most evident truths are unperceived and unfelt.

xliv. 24. This verse is by some regarded as commencing a new prophecy relating to Cyrus, and others take it as a continuation of the subject of the foregoing verses; but see verse 28.

God besides Jehovah. He is infinite, and therefore there can be no other; he is all-sufficient, and therefore there needs no other. This is designed for the confirming of the hopes of God's people in the promise of their deliverance out of Babylon, and in order to that for the curing them of their idolatry; when the affliction had done its work, it should be removed. They are minded of the first and great article of their creed, that the Lord their God is one Lord, Deu. vi. 4. And therefore, 1st. They needed not to hope in any other God. Those on whom the sun shines, need neither moon nor stars, nor the light of their own fire. 2nd. They needed not to fear any other god. Their own God was more able to do them good than all the false and counterfeit gods of their enemies were to do them hurt.

5. That none but he could foretell these things to come, which God now by his prophet gave notice of to the world, above two hundred years before they came to pass; ver. 7, "Who, as I, shall call," shall call Cyrus to Babylon, shall call Israel out of Babylon? Is there any but God that can call effectually, and has every creature, every heart, at his beck? Who shall declare it, how it shall be, and by whom, as I do. Nay, God goes farther; he not only sees it in order, as having the foreknowledge of it, but sets it in order, as having the sole management and direction of it. Can any other pretend to this? He hath always set things in order, according to the counsel of his own will, ever since he "appointed the ancient people," that is, the people of Israel, who could give a truer and fuller account of the antiquities of their own nation than any kingdom in the world could. Ever since he appointed that people to be his peculiar people, his providence was particularly conversant about them, and he told them before the events that should be concerning them, their bondage in Egypt, their deliverance out, their settlement in Canaan, &c. All was set in order in the Divine predictions, as well as in the Divine purposes. Could any other have done so? Would any other have been so far concerned for them? He challengeth the pretenders to shew the things that shall come hereafter; let them, if they can, tell us the name of the man that shall destroy Babylon, and deliver Israel? Nay, if they cannot pretend to tell us the things that shall come hereafter, let them tell us the things that are coming, that are nigh at hand, and at the door; let them tell us what shall come to pass to-morrow; but they cannot do that. Fear them not, therefore, nor be afraid of them; what harm can they do you? What hindrance can they give to your deliverance, when I have told thee it shall be accomplished in its season, and I have solemnly declared it? Note, Those who have the word of God's promise to depend upon need not to be afraid of any adverse powers or policies whatsoever.

9 They that make a graven image are all of them vanity;
And their delectable things shall not profit;
And they are their own witnesses;
They see not, nor know;
That they may be ashamed.
10 Who hath formed a god,
Or molten a graven image that is profitable for nothing?
11 Behold, all his fellows shall be ashamed:
And the workmen, they are of men:
Let them all be gathered together, let them stand up;
Yet they shall fear, and they shall be ashamed together.
12 The smith with the tongs
Both worketh in the coals, and fashioneth it with hammers,
And worketh it with the strength of his arms:
Yea, he is hungry, and his strength faileth:
He drinketh no water, and is faint.
13 The carpenter stretcheth out his rule; he marketh it out with a line;
He fitteth it with planes,
And he marketh it out with the compass
And maketh it after the figure of a man,
According to the beauty of a man;
That it may remain in the house.
14 He heweth him down cedars,
And taketh the cypress and the oak,
Which he strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest:
He planteth an ash, and the rain doth nourish it.
15 Then shall it be for a man to burn:
For he will take thereof, and warm himself;
Yea, he kindleth it, and baketh bread;
Yea, he maketh a god, and worshippeth it;
He maketh it a graven image, and falleth down thereto.
16 He burneth part thereof in the fire;
With part thereof he eateth flesh;
He roasteth roast, and is satisfied:
Yea, he warmeth himself, and saith,
Aha, I am warm, I have seen the fire:
17 And the residue thereof he maketh a god, even his graven image:
He falleth down unto it, and worshippeth it,
And prayeth unto it, and saith,
Deliver me; for thou art my god.
18 They have not known nor understood:
For he hath shut their eyes, that they cannot see;
And their hearts, that they cannot understand.
19 And none considereth in his heart,
Neither is there knowledge nor understanding to say,
I have burned part of it in the fire;
Yea, also I have baked bread upon the coals thereof;
I have roasted flesh, and eaten it:
And shall I make the residue thereof an abomination?
Shall I fall down to the stock of a tree?
20 He feedeth on ashes: a deceived heart hath turned him aside,
That he cannot deliver his soul, nor say,
Is there not a lie in my right hand?

Often before, God, by the prophet, had mentioned the folly and strange sottishness of idolaters; but here he enlargeth upon that head, and very fully and particularly exposeth it to contempt and ridicule. And this discourse is intended, 1. To arm the people of Israel against the strong temptation they would be in to worship idols, when they were captives in Babylon, in compliance with the custom of the country, they being far from the city of their own solemnities, and to humour those who were now their lords and masters. 2. To cure them of their inclination to idolatry, which was the sin that did most easily beset them, and to reform them from which they were sent into Babylon. As the rod of God is of use to enforce the word, so the word of God is of use to explain the rod, that the voice of both together may be heard and answered. 3. To furnish them with something to say to their Chaldean taskmasters, when they insulted over them. When they asked, "Where is your God?" they might from hence ask them, What are your gods? 4. To take off their fear of the gods of their enemies, and to encourage their hope in their own God, that he would certainly appear against those who set up such scandalous competitors as these with him for the throne. Now here, for the conviction of idolaters, we have,

First. A challenge given to them to clear themselves, if they can, from the imputation of the most shameful folly and senselessness imaginable, ver. 9—11. They set their wits on work to contrive, and their hands on work to frame, graven images, and they call them "their delectable things;" extremely fond they are of them, and mighty things they expect from them. Note, Through the corruption of men's nature, those things that should be detestable to them are desirable and delectable; but those are far gone in a distemper to whom that which is the food and fuel of it is most agreeable. Now, 1. We tell them that they that do so are all vanity, they deceive themselves and one another, and put a great cheat upon those for whom they make these images. 2. We tell them that "their delectable things shall not profit" them, nor make them any return for the pleasure they take in them; they can neither supply them with good nor protect them from evil. The graven images are profitable for nothing at all, nor will they ever get any thing by the devoirs they pay to them. 3. We appeal to themselves, whether it be not a silly, sottish thing to expect any good from gods of their own making. "They are their own witnesses," witnesses against themselves, if they would but give their own consciences leave to deal faithfully with them, that they are blind and ignorant in doing thus; "they see not, nor know," and let them own it, "that they may be ashamed." If men would but be true to their own convictions, ordinarily we might be sure of their conversion, particularly idolaters; for "who hath formed a god?" Who but a madman, or one out of his wits, would think of forming a god? of making that which, if he make it a god, he must suppose to be his maker. 4. We challenge them to plead their own cause, with any confidence or assurance He that has the front to say he hath formed a god, when all his fellows come together, to declare what each of them has done towards the making of this god, they will all be ashamed of the cheat they have put upon themselves, and laugh in their sleeves at those whom they have imposed upon; for the workmen that formed this god, they are of men, weak and impotent, and therefore cannot possibly make a being that shall be omnipotent, nor without blushing pretend to it. "Let them all be gathered together," as Demetrius and the craftsmen were, to support their sinking trade, "let them stand up" to plead their own cause, and make the best they can of it, with hand joined in hand, yet they shall fear to undertake it when it comes to the setting to, as conscious to themselves of the weakness and badness of their cause; and they shall be ashamed of it, not only when they appear singly, but when by appearing together they hope to keep one another in countenance. Note, Idolatry and impiety are things which men may justly both tremble and blush to appear in the defence of.

Secondly. A particular narrative of the whole proceeding in making a god, and there needs no more to expose it but to describe it, and tell the story of it.

1. The persons employed about it are handicraft tradesmen, the meanest of them, the very same that you would employ in making the common utensils of your husbandry, a cart or a plough. You must have a smith, a blacksmith, that with the tongs works in the coals; and it is hard work, for he works with the strength of his arms till he is hungry, and his strength fails, so eager is he, and so hasty are those who set him on work to get it despatched. He cannot allow himself time to eat or drink, for he drinks no water, and therefore is faint, ver. 12. Perhaps it was a piece of superstition among them for the workman not to eat or drink while he was making a god. The plates with which the smith was to cover the image, or whatever iron work was to be done about it, he fashioned it with hammers, and made it all very nice, according to the model given him. Then comes the carpenter, and he takes as much care and pains about the timber-work, ver. 13. He brings his box of tools, for he hath occasion for them all. He "stretcheth out his rule" upon the piece of wood, "marks it with a line," where it must be sawed or cut off; "he fits it," or polisheth it "with planes," the bigger first, and then the lesser. He "marks it out with the compass," what must be the size and then shape of it; and it is just what he pleaseth.

2. The form in which it is made is that of a man, a poor, weak, dying creature, but it is the noblest form and figure that he is acquainted with, and, being his own, he hath a peculiar fondness for it, and is willing to put all the reputation he can upon it. He makes it "according to the beauty of a man," in comely proportion, with those limbs and lineaments that are the beauty of a man, but are altogether unfit to represent the beauty of the Lord. God put a great honour upon man, when, in respect of the powers and faculties of his soul, he made him after the image of God; but man doth a great dishonour to God, xliv. 25. "The tokens of the liars" are the prognostications of deceitful prophets and soothsayers. The diviners are said to be made mad, because they are proved to be insane or foolish.

xliv. 28. Cyrus is here mentioned by name long before he was born. The circumstance has led some to think that the passage was not written until after the captivity, but believers in divine prophetic inspiration have no difficulty in accepting it as genuine. It is God and not Cyrus who says to Jerusalem, "Thou shalt be built," and to the Temple, "Thy foundation shall be laid." Josephus says this passage was brought to the notice of Cyrus.

xlv. 1. "The two leaved gates" referred to here are no doubt the gates of Babylon, by which Cyrus entered the city when he took it. Herodotus mentions the fact of the gates being left unfastened, so that the Persians had free access to the city.

xlv. 2. Herodotus says there were a hundred massy gates of brass in the walls of Babylon.

when he makes him (in respect of bodily parts and members) after the image of man. Nor will it at all atone for the affront, so far to compliment his god, as to take the fairest of the children of men for his original, from whence to take his copy, and to give him all the beauty of a man that he can think of; for all the beauty of the body of a man, when pretended to be put upon him who is an infinite Spirit, is a deformity and diminution to him. And when the goodly piece is finished, it must "remain in the house," in the temple or shrine prepared for it; or, perhaps in the dwelling house, if it be one of the household gods, the lares, or penates.

3. The matter of which it is mostly made is even sorry stuff to make a god of; it is the stock of a tree.

1st. The tree itself was fetched out of the forest, where it grew among other trees, of no more virtue or value than its neighbours. It was a cedar, it may be, or a cypress, or an oak, ver. 14. Perhaps he had an eye upon it some time before for this use, and "strengthened it for himself;" used some art or other to make it stronger, and better grown than other trees were; or, as some read it, 'which hath strengthened or lifted up itself among the trees of the forest,' the tallest and strongest he can pick out. Or, it may be, it likes his fancy better to take an ash, which is of a quicker growth, and which was of his own planting, for this use, and which has been nourished with rain from heaven. See what a fallacy he puts upon himself, in making that his refuge which was of his own planting, and which he not only gave the form to, but prepared the matter for; and what an affront he puts upon the God of heaven, in setting up that as a rival with him, which was nourished by his rain, that rain which falls "on the just and unjust?"

2nd. The boughs of this tree were good for nothing but for fuel; to that use were they put, and so were the chips that were cut off from it in the working of it. They are "for a man to burn," ver. 15, 16. And, to shew that that tree has no innate virtue in it for its own protection, it is as capable of being burnt as any other tree; and, to shew that he who chose it had no more antecedent value for it than for any other tree, he makes no difficulty of throwing part of it into the fire as common rubbish, asking no question for conscience sake. First. It serves him for his parlour fire. He will "take thereof, and warm himself," ver. 15; and he finds the comfort of it, and is so far from having any regret in his mind for it, that he saith, "Aha, I am warm, I have seen the fire." And certainly that part of the tree which served him for fuel, the use for which God and nature designed it, doth him a much greater kindness, and yields him more satisfaction, than ever that will which he makes a god of. Secondly. It serves him for his kitchen fire. He eats flesh with it, that is, he dresseth the flesh with it which he is to eat; "he roasteth roast, and is satisfied" that he has not done amiss to put it to this use. Nay, Thirdly. It serves him to heat the oven with, in which we use that fuel which is of least value. He kindleth it, and bakes bread with the heat of it, and none saith, Wrong he doth.

3rd. Yet, after all, the stock or body of the tree shall serve to make a god of, when it might as well have served to make a bench. As one of themselves even a poet of their own, upbraids them; Horat. Sat. i. 8.

Olim truncus eram ficulnus, inutile lignum,
Quum faber, incertus scamnum faceretne Priapum,
Maluit esse deum; deus inde ego,—

'In days of yore our godship stood,
A very worthless log of wood,
The joiner, doubting how to shape us
Into a stool or a Priapus,
At length resolved, for reasons wise,
Into a god to bid me rise.'—Francis.

And another of them threatens the idol to whom he had committed the custody of his woods, that if he did not preserve them to be fuel for his fire, he should himself be made use of for that purpose:

Furaces moneo manus repellas,
Et sylvam domini focis reserves,
Si defecerit hæc, et ipse lignum es,—

'Drive the plunderers away, and preserve the wood for thy master's hearth, or thou thyself shalt be converted into fuel.'—Martial.

When the besotted idolater hath thus served the meanest purposes with part of his tree, and the rest hath had time to season, he maketh that a god in his imagination, while that is in the doing, and worships it. He "maketh it a graven image, and falls down thereto," ver. 15; that is, ver. 17, "The residue thereof he maketh a god, even his graven image," according to his fancy and intention. "He falls down to it and worshippeth it;" gives Divine honours to it; prostrates himself before it in the most humble, reverent posture, as a servant, as a supplicant. He "prays unto it," as having a dependence upon it, and great expectations from it; he saith, "Deliver me, for thou art my god." There where he pays his homage and allegiance he justly looks for protection and deliverance. What a strange infatuation is this, to expect help from gods that cannot help themselves! But it is this praying to them that makes them gods, not what the smith or the carpenter did at them. What we place our confidence in for deliverance, that we make a god of:

Qui fingit sacros, auro vel marmore, vultus
Non facit ille deos; qui rogat, ille facit,—

'He who supplicates the figure, whether it be of gold or of marble, makes it a god, and not he who merely constructs it.'—Martial.

Thirdly. Here is judgment given upon this whole matter, ver. 18—20. In short, it is the effect and evidence of the greatest stupidity and sottishness that one could ever imagine rational beings to be guilty of, and shews that man is become worse than the beasts that perish; for they act according to the dictates of sense, but man acts not according to the dictates of reason; ver. 18, "They have not known, nor understood," common sense. Men that act rationally in other things in this act most absurdly; though they have some knowledge and understanding, yet they are strangers to, nay, they are rebels against, the great law of consideration; ver. 19, "None considereth in his heart," nor hath so much application of mind as to reason thus with himself, which one would think he might easily do, though there were none to reason with him: "I have burnt part" of this tree "in the fire," for baking and roasting; and now "shall I make the residue thereof an abomination?" that is, an idol; for that is an abomination to God, and to all wise and good men. Shall I ungratefully choose to do, or presumptuously dare to do, what the Lord hates? Shall I be such a fool, as to "fall down to the stock of a tree," a senseless, lifeless, helpless thing? Shall I so far disparage myself, and make myself like that I bow down to? A growing tree may be a beautiful, stately thing; but the stock of a tree has lost its glory; and he has lost his that gives glory to it. Upon the whole matter, the sad character given of these idolaters, ver. 20, is,

1. That they put a cheat upon themselves; "they feed on ashes." They feed themselves with hopes of advantage by worshipping these idols, but they will be disappointed as much as a man that would expect nourishment by feeding on ashes. Feeding on ashes is an evidence of a depraved appetite, and a distempered body; and it is a sign the soul is overpowered by very ill habits, when men in their worships go no farther than the sight of their eyes will carry them. They are wretchedly deluded, and it is their own fault; "A deceived heart" of their own, more than the deceiving tongue of others, "hath turned them aside" from the faith and worship of the living God to dumb idols. "They are drawn away of their own lusts, and enticed." The apostacy of sinners from God is owing purely to themselves, and to the evil heart of unbelief that is in their own bosom. A revolting and rebellious heart is "a deceived heart."

2. That they wilfully persist in their self-delusion, and will not be undeceived. There is none of them that can be persuaded so far to suspect himself as to say, "Is there not a lie in my right hand?" and so to think of delivering his soul. Note, 1st. Idolaters have a lie in their right hand; for an idol is a lie, is not what it pretends, performs not what it promiseth; and it is a teacher of lies, Hab. ii. 18. 2nd. It highly concerns those that are secure in an evil way seriously to consider whether there be not a lie in their right hand. Is not that a lie which, with a complacency, we hold fast as our chief good? Are our hearts set upon the wealth of the world, and the pleasures of sense? They will certainly prove a lie in our right hand. And is not that a lie which, with confidence we hold fast by, as the ground on which we build our hopes for heaven? If we trust to our external professions and performances, as if those would save us, we deceive ourselves with a lie in our right hand, with a house built on the sand. 3rd. Self-suspicion is the first step towards self-deliverance. We cannot be faithful to ourselves unless we are jealous of ourselves. He that would deliver his soul must begin with the putting of this question to his own conscience; "Is there not a lie in my right hand?" 4th. Those that are given up to believe a lie are under the power of strong delusions, which it is hard to get clear of, 2 Thes. ii. 11.

21 Remember these, O Jacob and Israel;
For thou art my servant:
I have formed thee; thou art my servant:
O Israel, thou shalt not be forgotten of me.
22 I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions,
And, as a cloud, thy sins:
Return unto me; for I have redeemed thee.
23 Sing, O ye heavens; for the LORD hath done it:
Shout, ye lower parts of the earth:
Break forth into singing, ye mountains,
O forest, and every tree therein:
For the LORD hath redeemed Jacob,
And glorified himself in Israel.
24 Thus saith the LORD, thy redeemer,
And he that formed thee from the womb,
I am the LORD that maketh all things;
That stretcheth forth the heavens alone;
That spreadeth abroad the earth by myself;
25 That frustrateth the tokens of the liars,
And maketh diviners mad;
That turneth wise men backward,
And maketh their knowledge foolish;
26 That confirmeth the word of his servant,
And performeth the counsel of his messengers,
That saith to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be inhabited;
And to the cities of Judah, Ye shall be built,
And I will raise up the decayed places thereof:
27 That saith to the deep, Be dry,
And I will dry up thy rivers:
28 That saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd,
And shall perform all my pleasure:
Even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built;
And to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid.

In these verses we have,

First. The duty which Jacob and Israel, now in captivity, are called to, that they might be qualified and prepared for the deliverance designed them. Our first care must be to get good by our afflictions, and then we may hope to get out of them. The duty is expressed in two words, Remember and return, as in the counsel to Ephesus, Rev. ii. 4, 5. 1. "Remember these, O Jacob;" remember what thou hast been told of the folly of idolatry, and let the convictions thou art now under be ready to thee, whenever thou art tempted to that sin. Remember that "thou art my servant," and therefore must not serve other masters. "Return unto me," ver. 22. It is the great concern of those who have backslidden from God to hasten their return to him; and this is that which he calls them to when they are in affliction, and when he is returning to them in a way of mercy.

Secondly. The favours which Jacob and Israel, now in captivity, are assured of; and what is here promised to them upon their remembering and returning to God is, in a spiritual sense, promised to all that in like manner return to God. It is a very comfortable word, for more is implied in it than is expressed, ver. 21, "O Israel, thou shalt not be forgotten of me," though for the present thou seem to be so. When we begin to remember God, he will begin to remember us; nay, it is he that remembers us first. Now observe here,

1. The grounds upon which God's favourable intentions to his people were built, and on which they might build their expectations from him. He will deliver them out of captivity; for, 1st. They are his servants, and therefore he hath a just quarrel with those that detain them; "Let my people go, that they may serve me." The servants of the King of kings are under special protection. 2nd. He formed them into a people, formed them "from the womb," ver. 24. From the first beginning of their increase into a nation they were under his particular care and government, more than any other people; their national constitution was of his framing, and his covenant wit them was the

xlv. 7. Here light and darkness mean the same as peace and evil. Light and peace denote prosperity, and darkness and evil signify adversity. The notion that evil is here put for sin is quite erroneous, being at once inconsistent with the scope of the verse and opposed to Scripture doctrine, by making God the author of sin. The idea is, prosperity and adversity are under the control of God.

xlv. 8. The words "Drop down, ye heavens, from above," refer to the letting fall of rain from the clouds.

xlv. 11. The latter half of this verse may be somewhat differently expressed: "Ask me of things to come; ye may command me concerning my sons, and concerning the work of my hands." Some take the last clause as a question: "Will ye command me?" &c. To decide in such a case is not easy, and we therefore simply mention the difficulty.

xlv. 13. This verse refers to Cyrus, who employed his great authority in favour of the Jews. (Compare Ezra i., ii., &c.)

charter by which they were incorporated. They are his, and he will save them. 3rd. He hath redeemed them formerly, has many a time redeemed them out of great distress; and he is still the same, in the same relation to them, hath the same concern for them; therefore, "Return unto me, for I have redeemed thee," ver. 22. Whither wilt thou go, but to me? Having redeemed them, as well as formed them, he hath acquired a farther title to them, and propriety in them, which is a good reason why they should dutifully return to him, and why he will graciously return to them. "The Lord hath redeemed Jacob," that is, he is about to do it, ver. 23; he hath determined to do it, for he is the Lord their Redeemer, ver. 24. Note, The work of redemption, which God hath by his Son wrought for us, encourageth us to hope for all promised blessings from him. He that hath redeemed us at so vast an expence will not lose his purchase. 4th. He hath glorified himself in them, ver. 23, and therefore will do so still, Jno. xii. 28. It is matter of comfort to us to see God's glory interested in the deliverances of the church; for therefore he will certainly redeem Jacob, because thus he will glorify himself. And this assures us that he will perfect the redemption of his saints by Jesus Christ, because there is a day set when he will be glorified and admired in them all. 5th. He hath pardoned their sins, which were the cause of their calamity, and the only obstruction to their deliverance, ver. 22; therefore he will break the yoke of captivity from off their necks, because he hath blotted out, as a thick cloud, their transgressions. Note, First. Our transgressions and our sins are as a cloud, a thick cloud. They interpose between heaven and earth, and for a time suspend and intercept the correspondence between the upper and lower world. Sin separates between us and God, ch. lix. 2. They threaten a storm, a deluge of wrath, as thick clouds do, which God will rain upon sinners, Ps. xi. 6. Secondly. When God pardons sin he blots out this cloud, this thick cloud, so that the intercourse with heaven is laid open again. God looks down upon the soul with favour, the soul looks up to him with pleasure. The cloud is scattered by the influence of the Sun of righteousness. It is only through Christ that sin is pardoned. When sin is pardoned, like a cloud that is scattered, it appears no more, it is quite gone; the "iniquity of Jacob shall be sought for, and not found," Jer. l. 20. And the comforts that flow into the soul when sin is pardoned are like clear shining after clouds and rain.

2. The universal joy which the deliverance of God's people should bring along with it; ver. 23, "Sing, O ye heavens!" This intimates, 1st. That the whole creation shall have cause for joy and rejoicing in the redemption of God's people. To that it is owing, both that it subsists, that it is rescued from the curse which the sin of man brought upon the ground, and that it is again put into a capacity of answering the ends of its being; and is assured that, though now it groans, being burthened, it shall at last be delivered from the bondage of corruption. The greatest establishment of the world is the kingdom of God in it, Ps. xc. 11, 13; xcviii. 7, 9. 2nd. That the angels shall rejoice in it, and the inhabitants of the upper world. The heavens shall sing, for the Lord has done it; and there is joy in heaven when God and man are reconciled, Lu. xv. 7; joy when Babylon falls, Rev. xviii. 20. 3rd. That those who lay at the greatest distance, even the inhabitants of the Gentile world, should join in these praises, as sharing in these joys. The "lower parts of the earth," the forest and the trees there, shall bring in the tribute of thanksgiving for the redemption of Israel.

3. The encouragement we have to hope that, though great difficulties, and such as have been thought insuperable, lie in the way of the church's deliverance, yet, when the time for it is come, they shall all be got over with ease; for thus saith Israel's Redeemer, "I am the Lord that maketh all things," did make them at first, and am still making them; for providence is a continued creation,—all being, power, life, motion, and perfection are from him. He "stretcheth forth the heavens alone," hath no help, nor needs any; and the earth too he spreads abroad by himself, and by his own power. Man was not by him when he did it. Job xxxviii. 4, nor did any creature advise or assist,—only his own eternal Wisdom and Word was by him then, as one brought up with him, Pr. viii. 30. His stretching out the heavens by himself speaks the boundless extent of his power. The strongest man, if he be to stretch a thing out, must get somebody or other to lend a hand; but God stretched out the vast expanse, and keeps it still upon the stretch, himself, by his own power. Let not Israel be discouraged then, nothing is too hard for him to do that made the world, Ps. cxxiv. 8, and, having made all, he can make what use he pleaseth of all, and has it in his power to serve his own purposes by them.

4. The confusion which this would put upon the oracles of Babylon, by the confutation it would give them, ver. 25. God, by delivering his people out of Babylon, would "frustrate the tokens of the liars," of all the lying prophets, that said the Babylonian monarchy had many ages yet to live, and pretended to ground their predictions upon some token, some sign or other, which, according to the rules of their art, foreboded its prosperity. How will these conjuror grow mad with vexation when they see their skill fails them, and that the contrary happens to that which they so coveted, and were so confident of. Nor would it only baffle their pretended prophets, but their celebrated politicians too; he turns the "wise men backward." Finding they cannot go on with their projects, they are forced to quit them, and so he makes the judges fools, and makes "their knowledge foolish." Those that are brought acquainted with Christ see all the knowledge they had before to be foolishness, in comparison with the knowledge of him. And those that are adversaries to him will find all their counsels, like Ahithophel's, turned into foolishness, and themselves taken in their own craftiness, 1 Cor. iii 19.

5. The confirmation which this would give to the oracles of God, which the Jews had distrusted, and their enemies despised; God "confirmeth the word of his servant," ver. 26. He confirms it, by accomplishing it in its season, and "performeth the counsel of the messengers." He hath many a time sent to his people, to tell them what great blessings he had in store for them. Note, The exact fulfilling of the prophecies of Scripture is a confirmation of the truth of the whole book, and an incontestable evidence of its Divine original and authority.

6. The particular favours God designed for his people that were now in captivity, ver. 26—28. And these were foretold long before they went into captivity, that they might see reason to expect a correction, but no reason to fear a final destruction.

1st. It is here supposed that Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, shall for a time lie in ruins, dispeopled and uninhabited; but it is promised that they shall be rebuilt, and repeopled. When Isaiah lived, Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, were full of inhabitants; but they will be emptied, burnt, and destroyed. It was then hard to believe that concerning such strong and populous cities. But the justice of God will do that; and when that is done, it will be hard to believe that ever they will recover themselves again, and yet "the zeal of the Lord of hosts" will do that too. God hath said to Jerusalem, "Thou shalt be inhabited;" for while the world stands God will have a church in it; and therefore he will raise up those who shall say to Jerusalem, "Thou shalt be built;" for if it be not built it cannot be inhabited, Ps. lxix. 35, 36. When God's time is come for the building up of his church, let him alone to find both houses for his people, for they shall not lie exposed, and people for his houses, for they shall not stand empty. The cities of Judah too shall again be built. The Assyrian army, under Sennacherib, only took them, and then upon the defeat of that army they returned undamaged to the right owners; but the Chaldean army demolished them, and by carrying away the inhabitants left them to go to decay of themselves; for if lesser judgments prevail not to humble and reform men, God will send greater. Yet these desolations shall not be perpetual: God will raise up the wastes and decayed places thereof; for he will not contend for ever. The city of strangers, when it is ruined, shall never be built, ch. xxvi. 2; but the city of God's own children is but discontinued for a time.

2nd. It is here supposed that the temple too shall be destroyed, and lie for a time rased to the foundations; but it is promised, that the foundation of it shall again be laid, and, no doubt, built upon. As the desolation of the sanctuary was to all the pious Jews the most mournful part of the destruction, so the restoration and re-establishment of it would be the most joyful part of the deliverance. What joy can they have in the rebuilding of Jerusalem, if the temple there be not rebuilt? for that is it that makes it a holy city, and truly beautiful. This, therefore, was the chief thing that the Jews had at heart, and had in view in their return; therefore they would go back to Jerusalem, to build the house of the Lord God of Israel there, Ezr. i. 3.

3rd. It is here supposed that very great difficulties would lie in the way of this deliverance, which it would be impossible for them to wade through. But it is promised, that by a Divine power they should all be removed; ver. 27, "God saith to the deep, Be dry." So he did when he brought Israel out of Egypt; and so he will again, when he brings them out of Babylon, if there be occasion. "Who art thou, O great mountain?" Dost thou stand in the way? "Before Zerubbabel," the commander-in-chief of the returning captives, "thou shalt become a plain," Zec. iv. 7. So, "Who art thou, O great deep?" Dost thou retard their passage, and think to block it up? Thou shalt be dry, and thy rivers (that supply thee) shall be dried up. When Cyrus took Babylon, by draining the river Euphrates into many channels, and so making it passable for his army, this was fulfilled. Note, Whatever obstructions lie in the way of Israel's redemption, God can remove them with a word speaking.

4th. It is here supposed, that none of the Jews themselves would be able, by might and power, to force their way out of Babylon; but it is promised that God will raise up a stranger from afar off that shall fairly open the way for them; and now at length he names the very man, many scores of years before he was born or thought of; ver. 28, "That saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd." Israel is his people, and the sheep of his pasture. These sheep are now in the midst of wolves, in the hands of the thief and robber; they are impounded for trespass. Now Cyrus shall be his shepherd, employed by him to release these sheep, and to take care of their return to their own green pastures again. And in this "he shall perform all my pleasure;" shall bring about what is purposed by me, and will be highly pleasing to me. Note, First. The most contingent things are certain to the Divine prescience. He knew who was the person, and what his name, that should be the deliverer of his people; and when he pleased could let his church know it; that when they heard of such a name beginning to be talked of in the world, they might lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption drew nigh. Secondly. It is the greatest honour of the greatest men to be employed for God, as instruments of his favour to his people. It was more the praise of Cyrus to be God's shepherd than to be emperor of Persia. Thirdly. God makes what use he pleaseth of men, of mighty men, of those that act with the greatest freedom; and when they think to do as they please, he can overrule them, and make them do as he pleaseth. Nay, in those very things wherein they are serving themselves, and look no farther than that, God is serving his own purposes by them, and making them to perform all his pleasure. Rich princes shall do what poor prophets have foretold.

CHAPTER XLV.

Cyrus was nominated in the foregoing chapter to be God's shepherd: more is said to him, and more of him, in this chapter; not only because he was to be instrumental in the release of the Jews out of their captivity, but because he was to be therein a type of the grat Redeemer, and that release typical of the great redemption from sin and death; for that was the salvation of which all the prophets witnessed. We have here, I. The great things which God would do for Cyrus, that he might be put into a capacity to discharge God's people, ver. 1—4. II. The proof God would hereby give of his eternal power and godhead, and his universal, incontestable sovereignty, ver. 5—7. III. A prayer for the hastening of this deliverance, ver. 8. IV. A check to the unbelieving Jews, who quarrelled with God for the lengthening out of their captivity. V. Encouragement given to the believing Jews who trusted in God, and continued instant in prayer; assuring them that God would, in due time, accomplish this work by the hand of Cyrus, ver. 11—15. VI. A challenge given to the worshippers of idols, and their doom read; and satisfaction given to the worshippers of the true God, and their comfort secured; with an eye to the Mediator, who is made of God to us both righteousness and sanctification, ver. 16—25. And here, as in other parts of this prophecy, there is much of Christ, and gospel grace.

THUS saith the LORD to his anointed,
To Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden,
To subdue nations before him;
And I will loose the loins of kings,
To open before him the two leaved gates;
And the gates shall not be shut;
2 I will go before thee,
And make the crooked places straight:
I will break in pieces the gates of brass,
And cut in sunder the bars of iron:
3 And I will give thee the treasures of darkness,
And hidden riches of secret places,
That thou mayest know that I, the LORD,
Which call thee by thy name,
Am the God of Israel
4 For Jacob my servant's sake,
And Israel mine elect,
I have even called thee by thy name:
I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me.

xlv. 14. Most critics think the Jews are the favoured subjects of this verse, but Grotius thought Cyrus was meant. The safest explanation regards it as a prediction of the accessions which God's Church would receive from various parts of the world. Of course it does not mean that nations and kings would be slaves and tributaries, but altogether and willingly obedient. The nations here mentioned received the Gospel at an early date, and Christianity is still professed among them.

xlv. 17. It is difficult to limit this promise to the literal Israel and a temporary deliverance, and therefore we prefer the opinion of those who take it to include the universal Church and eternal salvation.

xlv. 20. This appeal to those of the nations—i.e., heathen, or Gentiles—who had escaped, can scarcely be confined to those who escaped from Cyrus; something greater is intended, and verse 22 favours the view that the conversion of the heathen nations to

Cyrus was a Mede, descended, as some say, from Astyages, king of Media. The pagan writers are not agreed in their accounts of his original. Some tell us that in his infancy he was an outcast, left exposed, and was saved from perishing by a herdsman's wife. However, it is agreed that, being a man of an active genius, he soon made himself very considerable. Especially when Crœsus, king of Lydia, made a descent upon his country, which he not only repulsed, but revenged; prosecuting the advantages he had gained against Crœsus with such vigour, that in a little time he took Sardis, made himself master of the rich kingdom of Lydia, and the many provinces that then belonged to it. This made him very great, (for Crœsus was rich to a proverb,) and enabled him to pursue his victories in many countries. But it was near ten years after, that, in conjunction with his uncle Darius, and with the forces of Persia, that he made this famous attack upon Babylon, which is here foretold, and which we have the history of, Dan. v. Babylon was now grown exorbitantly rich and strong; it was forty-five miles in compass, some say more; the walls thirty-two feet thick, and a hundred cubits high. Some say they were so thick that six chariots might drive abreast upon them; some say they were fifty cubits thick, and two hundred high. Cyrus seems to have had a great ambition to make himself master of this place, and to have projected it long; and at last he performed it. Now here (two hundred and ten years before it came to pass) we are told,

First. What great things God would do for him, that he might put it into his power to release his people. In order to this he shall be a mighty conqueror, and a wealthy monarch, and nations shall become tributaries to him, and help him both with men and money. Now that which God here promised to do for Cyrus he could have done for Zerubbabel, or some of the Jews themselves. But the wealth and power of this world God has seldom seen fit to intrust his own people with much of, so many are the snares and temptations that attend it. But if there has been occasion, for the good of the church, to make use of it, God has been pleased rather to put it into the hands of others to be employed for them, than to venture it into their own hands. Cyrus is here called God's anointed, because he was both designed and qualified for this great service by the counsel of God, and was to be herein a type of the Messiah. God engageth to hold his right hand; not only to strengthen and sustain him, but to direct his motions and intentions; as Elisha put his hands upon the king's hands when he was to shoot his arrow against Syria, 2 Kin. xiii. 16. Being under such a conduct,

1. He shall extend his conquests very far, and shall make nothing of the opposition that will be given him. Babylon is too strong a place for a young hero to begin with; and therefore, that he may be able to deal with that, great additions shall be made to his strength by other conquests. 1st. Populous kingdoms shall yield to him. God will "subdue nations before him." When he is in the full career of his successes, he shall make nothing of a nation's being born to him at once; yet it is not he that subdues them, it is God that subdues them for him. The battle is his; and therefore his is the victory. 2nd. Potent kings shall fall before him. "I will loose the loins of kings;" either the girdle of their loins, divest them of their power and dignity; or the strength of their loins. And then it was literally fulfilled in Belshazzar; for when he was struck into a panic fear, by the handwriting on the wall, "the joints of his loins were loosed," Dan. v. 6. 3rd. Great cities shall surrender themselves into his hands without giving him or themselves any trouble. God will incline the keepers of the city to "open before him the two-leaved gates;" not treacherously, or timorously, but from a full conviction that it is to no purpose to contend with him. And therefore "the gates shall not be shut," to keep him out as an enemy, but thrown open, to admit him as a friend. 4th. The longest and most dangerous marches shall be made easy and ready to him. I will go before thee, to clear the way, and to conduct thee in it; and then the crooked places shall be made straight; or, as some read it, the hilly places shall be levelled and made even. Those will find a ready road that have God going before them. 5th. No opposition shall stand before him. He that gives him his commission "will break in pieces the gates of brass" that are shut against him, and "cut in sunder the bars of iron" wherewith they are fastened. This was fulfilled in the letter, if it be true which Herodotus reports, that the city of Babylon had a hundred gates, all of brass, with posts and hooks of the same metal.

2. He shall replenish his coffers very much; ver. 3, "I will give thee the treasures of darkness." Treasures of gold and silver, that have been long kept close under lock and key, and had not seen the light many years; or had been buried under ground by the inhabitants, in their fright, upon the taking of the city. The riches of many nations had been brought to Babylon, and Cyrus seized all together. "The hidden riches of secret places," which belonged either to the crown or to private persons, shall all be a prey to Cyrus. Thus God, designing him to do a piece of service to his church, paid him richly for it beforehand. And Cyrus very honestly owned God's goodness to him, and, in consideration of that, released the captives; Ezr. i. 2, "God has given me all the kingdoms of the earth," and thereby has obliged "me to build him an house at Jerusalem."

Secondly. We are here told what God designed in doing all this for Cyrus. What Cyrus aimed at in undertaking his wars we may easily guess; but what God aimed at, in giving him such wonderful success in his wars, we are here told:

1. It was that the God of Israel might be glorified; 'That thou mayest know by all this, that I the Lord am the God of Israel; for I have called thee by thy name, long before thou wast born.' When Cyrus should have this prophecy of Isaiah shewed him, and should find there his own name, and his own achievements particularly described, so long before, he should thereby be brought to acknowledge that the God of Israel is the Lord Jehovah, the only living and true God, and continued to own his Israel, though now in captivity. It is well when thus men's prosperity and success brings them to the knowledge of God; for too often it makes them forget him.

2. It was that the Israel of God might be released, ver. 4. Cyrus had not known God as the God of Israel; having been trained up in the worship of idols, the true God was to him an unknown God. But, though he knew not God, God not only knew him when he came into being, but foreknew him, and bespoke him for his shepherd; he called him by his name, Cyrus. Nay, which was yet a greater honour, he surnamed him, and called him his Anointed. And why did God do all this for Cyrus? Not for his own sake, be it known to him. Whether he was a man of virtue or no, is questioned. Xenophon, indeed, when he would describe the heroic virtues of an excellent prince, made use of Cyrus' name, and many of the particulars of his story, in his Cyropædia; but other historians represent him as haughty, cruel, and bloodthirsty. The reason therefore why God preferred him was for Jacob his servant's sake. Note, 1st. In all the revolutions of states and kingdoms the sudden falls of the great and strong, and the surprising advancements of the weak and obscure, God is designing the good of his church. 2nd. It is therefore the wisdom of those to whom God has given wealth and power to use it for his glory, by being kind with it to his people. Cyrus is preferred that Israel may be released; he shall have a kingdom only that God's people may have their liberty: for their kingdom is not of this world; that is yet to come. In all this Cyrus was a type of Christ, who was made victorious over principalities and powers, and intrusted with unsearchable riches, for the use and benefit of God's servants, his elect. "When he ascended on high, he led captivity captive;" took those captives that had taken others captives, and "opened the prison to those that were bound."

5 I am the LORD, and there is none else,
There is no God beside me:
I girded thee, though thou hast not known me:
6 That they may know from the rising of the sun,
And from the west, that there is none beside me.
I am the LORD, and there is none else.
7 I form the light, and create darkness:
I make peace, and create evil:
I the LORD do all these things.
8 Drop down, ye heavens, from above,
And let the skies pour down righteousness:
Let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation,
And let righteousness spring up together;
I the LORD have created it.
9 Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker!
Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth.
Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou?
Or thy work, He hath no hands?
10 Woe unto him that saith unto his father, What begettest thou?
Or to the woman, What hast thou brought forth?

God here asserts his sole and sovereign dominion, as that which he designed to prove and manifest to the world, in all the great things he did for Cyrus, and by him. Observe,

First. How this doctrine is here laid down, concerning the sovereignty of the great Jehovah, in two things:

1. That he is God alone, and there is no God besides him. This is here inculcated as a fundamental truth, which, if it were firmly believed, would abolish idolatry out of the world. With what an awful, commanding air of majesty and authority, bidding defiance as it were to all pretenders, doth the great God here proclaim it to the world? "I am the Lord;" 'I the Lord Jehovah;' "and there is none else, there is no God besides me;" no self-existent, self-sufficient being; none infinite and eternal, but I. And again, ver. 6, "There is none besides me." All that are set up in competition with me are counterfeits, they are all vanity and a lie; for "I am the Lord, and there is none else." This is here said to Cyrus, not only to cure him of the sin of his ancestors, which was worshipping idols, but to prevent his falling into the sin of some of his predecessors in victory and universal monarchy, which was, setting up themselves for gods, and being idolized; to which some attribute much of the origin of idolatry. Let Cyrus, when he is become thus rich and great, remember that he is still a man, and there is no God but one.

2. That he is Lord of all, and there is nothing done without him; ver. 7, "I form the light," which is grateful and pleasing; "and I create darkness," which is grievous and unpleasing. "I make peace," put here for all good; "and I create evil;" not the evil of sin, God is not the author of that, but the evil of punishment. "I the Lord" order and direct and "do all these things." Observe, 1st. The very different events that are concerning the children of men. Light and darkness, opposite to each other, and yet in the ocurse of providence sometimes intermixed; like the morning and evening twilights, neither day nor night, Zec. xiv. 6; a mixture of joys and sorrows in the same cup, allays to each other. Sometimes they are counterchanged, as noonday light and midnight darkness in the revolution of every day; each takes its turn, and there are short transitions from the one to the other; witness Job's case. 2nd. The self-same cause of both, and that is he that is the first cause of all. I the Lord, the fountain of all being, am the fountain of all power. He that formed the natural light, Gen. i. 3, still forms the providential light; that at first made peace among the jarring seeds and principles of nature, makes peace in the affairs of men. He that allowed the natural darkness, which was a mere privation, creates the providential darkness; for concerning troubles and afflictions he gives positive orders. Note, The wise God has the ordering and disposing of all our comforts and all our crosses in this world.

Secondly. How this doctrine is here proved and published: 1. It is proved by that which God did for Cyrus. "There is no God besides me;" for, ver. 5, "I girded thee, though thou hast not known me." It was not thine own idol, which thou didst know and worship, that girded thee for this expedition, that gave thee authority and ability for it. No; it was I that girded thee; I, whom thou didst not know, nor seek to. By this it appears that the God of Israel is the only true God; that he manageth and maketh what use he pleaseth, even of those that are strangers to him, and pay their homage to other gods. 2. It is published to all the world, both by the word of God, and by his providence, and by the testimony of the suffering Jews in Babylon; that all may know, from the east and from the west, sunrise and sunset, that the Lord is God, and there is none else. The wonderful deliverance of the Israel of God proclaimed to all the world that "there is none like unto the God of Jesurun, that rides on the heavens for their help."

Thirdly. How this doctrine is here improved and applied:

1. For the comfort of those that earnestly longed, and yet quietly waited for, the redemption of Israel; ver. 8, "Drop down, ye heavens, from above." Some take this as the saints' prayer for deliverance; I rather take it as God's precept concerning it; for he is said to command deliverance, Ps. xliv. 4. Now the precept is directed to heaven and earth, and all the hosts of both, as royal precepts commonly run, To all officers, civil and military. All the creatures shall be made, in their places, to contribute to the carrying on of this great work, when God will have it done. If men will not be aiding and assisting, God will produce it without them; as he doth the dews of heaven, and the grass of the earth, which tarry not for man, nor wait for the sons of men, Mic. v. 7. Observe, 1st. The method of this great deliverance that is to be wrought for Israel. Righteousness must first be wrought in them; that is, they must be brought to repent of their sins, to renounce their idolatries, to return to God, and reform their lives; and then the salvation shall be wrought for them, and not till then. We must not expect salvation without righteous-the faith and service of God is meant. They are invited to abandon error and receive the truth.

xlv. 24. The ancient versions are somewhat different. Thus, the Syriac is, "And they shall say, In the Lord is righteousness: and the strong men shall come to him; and all that hate thee shall be ashamed." The Greek connects this verse with the foregoing: "Every tongue shall swear to God, saying, Righteousness and glory shall come to him; and all who make distinctions among them," &c.

xlvi. 1. Bel was the Babylonian Baal, an idol god which, under various forms, was extensively worshipped in Western Asia. Nebo was another divinity especially honoured among the Chaldeans. Bel is said to have corresponded with the Latin Jupiter, and Nebo is compared with Mercury. Their names are introduced into such forms as Belshazzar, Nebuchadnezzar, &c. These helpless deities were to be carried away upon the beasts of burden employed by the conquerors of Babylon. The word "carriages" properly means burdens, or what ness; they spring up together, and together the Lord hath created them. What he has joined together let us not therefore put asunder: see Ps. lxxxix. 9—11. Christ died to save us from our sins, not in our sins; and is made redemption to us, by being made to us righteousness and sanctification. 2nd. The means of this great deliverance. Rather than it shall fail when the set time for it is come, "the heavens shall drop down righteousness," and the earth shall open to bring forth salvation, and both concur to the reformation, and so to the restoration, of God's Israel. It is from heaven, from above the skies, that righteousness drops down; for every grace and good gift is from above. Nay, since the more plentiful effusion of the Spirit, it is now poured down; and if our hearts be open to receive it, the product will be the fruits of righteousness, and the great salvation.

2. For reproof to those of the church's enemies that opposed this salvation, or those of her friends that despaired of it; ver. 9, "Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker." God is the maker of all things, and therefore our maker, which is a reason why we should always submit to him, and never contend with him. 1st. Let not the proud oppressors, in the elevation of their spirits, oppose God's designs concerning the deliverance of his people, nor think to detain them any longer, when the time is come for their release. Woe to the insulting Babylonians, that set God at defiance, as Pharaoh did, and will not let his people go. 2nd. Let not the poor oppressed, in the dejection of their spirits, murmur and quarrel with God for the prolonging of their captivity, as if he dealt unjustly or unkindly with them, or think to force their way out before God's time is come. Note, Those will find themselves in a woful condition that strive with their Maker; for none ever hardened his heart against God and prospered. Sinful man is indeed a quarrelsome creature; but "let the potsherds strive with the potsherds of the earth." Men are but earthen pots, nay, they are broken potsherds, and are made so very much by their mutual contentions; they are dashed in pieces one against another. And if they are disposed to strive, let them strive with one another, let them meddle with their match; but let them not dare to contend with him that is infinitely above them; which is as senseless and absurd as, First. For the clay to find fault with the potter; "Shall the clay say to him that formeth it, What makest thou?" Why dost thou make me of this shape, and not that? Nay, it is as if the clay should be in such a heat and passion with the potter as to tell him he has no hands, or that he works as awkwardly as if he had none. Shall the clay pretend to be wiser than the potter, and therefore to advise him? Or mightier than the potter, and therefore to control him? He that gave us being, that gave us this being, may design concerning us and dispose of us as he pleaseth; and it is impudent presumption for us to prescribe to him. Shall we impeach God's wisdom, or question his power, who are ourselves so curiously, so wonderfully made? Or say, He has no hands, whose hands made us, and in whose hands we are? The doctrine of God's sovereignty has enough in it to silence all our discontents and objections against the methods of his providence and grace, Rom. ix. 20, 21. Secondly. It is as unnatural as for the child to find fault with the parents; to say to the father, "What begettest thou?" or to the mother, "What hast thou brought forth?" Why was I not begotten and born an angel, exempt from the infirmities of the human nature, and the calamities of human life? Must not those who are children of men expect to share in the common lot, and to fare as others fare? If God is our father, where is the honour we owe to him, by submitting to his will?

11 Thus saith the LORD,
The Holy One of Israel, and his Maker,
Ask me of things to come concerning my sons,
And concerning the work of my hands command ye me.
12 I have made the earth,
And created man upon it:
I, even my hands, have stretched out the heavens,
And all their host have I commanded 13 I have raised him up in righteousness,
And I will direct all his ways:
He shall build my city, and he shall let go my captives,
Not for price nor reward,
Saith the LORD of hosts.
14 Thus saith the LORD,
The labour of Egypt, and merchandise of Ethiopia
And of the Sabeans, men of stature,
Shall come over unto thee, and they shall be thine:
They shall come after thee; in chains they shall come over,
And they shall fall down unto thee, they shall make supplication unto thee,
Saying, Surely God is in thee; and there is none else,
There is no God.
15 Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself,
O God of Israel, the Saviour.
16 They shall be ashamed, and also confounded, all of them:
They shall go to confusion together
That are maker of idols. [ing salvation:
17 But Israel shall be saved in the LORD with an everlast-
Ye shall not be ashamed nor confounded world without end.
18 For thus saith the LORD that created the heavens;
God himself that formed the earth and made it; he hath established it,
He created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited:
I am the LORD; and there is none else.
19 I have not spoken in secret, in a dark place of the earth:
I said not unto the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain:
I the LORD speak righteousness, I declare things that are right

The people of God in captivity, that reconciled themselves to the will of God in their affliction, and were content to wait his time for their deliverance, are here assured that they should not wait in vain.

First. They are invited to inquire concerning the issue of their troubles; ver. 11, "The Holy One of Israel and his Maker," though he doth not allow them to strive with him, yet encourageth them, 1. To consult his word; "Ask me of things to come;" have recourse to the prophets and their prophecies, and see what they say concerning these things. Ask the watchman, "What of the night?" ask them, "How long." "Things to come," as far as they are revealed, belong to us and to our children, and we must not be strangers to them. 2. To seek unto him by prayer; "Concerning my sons, and concerning the work of my hands," that, as becomes them, submit to the will of their father, the will of their potter, "command ye me;" not by way of prescription, but by way of petition. Be earnest in your requests and confident in your expectations, as far as both are guided by, and grounded upon, the promise. We may not strive with our Maker by passionate complaints, but we may wrestle with him by faithful and fervent prayer; 'My sons and the work of my hands, commend ye to me,' so some read it; bring them to me, and leave them with me. See the power of prayer and its prevalency with God: "Thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here am I;" "What would ye that I should do unto you?" Some read it with an interrogation, as carrying on the reproof, ver. 9, 10, 'Do ye question me concerning things to come? and am I bound to give you an account? And concerning my children, even concerning the work of my hands, will you command me?' or prescribe to me? Dare you do so? "Shall any teach God knowledge," or give law to him? Those that complain of God do in effect assume an authority over him.

Secondly. They are encouraged to depend upon the power of God when they were brought very low, and were utterly incapable of helping themselves, ver. 12. Their "help stands in the name of the Lord, who made heaven and earth;" which he mentions here not only for his own glory, but for their comfort. The heavens and earth shall contribute, if he pleaseth, to the deliverance of the church, ver. 8, for he created both, and therefore hath both at command. 1. He "made the earth, and created man upon it," for it was intended to be a habitation for man, Ps. cxv. 16. He hath therefore not only authority, but wisdom and power sufficient to govern man here on this earth, and to make what use he pleaseth of him. 2. His hands have stretched out the heavens, and all their hosts he commanded into being at first, and therefore still governs all their motions and influences. It is good news to God's Israel, that their God is the Creator and governor of the world.

Thirdly. They are particularly told what God would do for them, that they might know what to depend upon; and this shall lead them to expect a more glorious Redeemer and redemption, of whom and of which Cyrus, and their deliverance by him, were types and figures.

1. Liberty shall be proclaimed to them, ver. 13; Cyrus is the man that shall do it. And in order hereunto God will put power into his hands: "I have raised him up in righteousness; that is, in pursuance and performance of my promises, and to plead my people's just but injured cause. He will give him success in all his enterprises, particularly that against Babylon: "I will direct all his ways;" and then it follows he will prosper him, for those must needs speed well that are under a Divine conduct. And whom God designs to employ for him he will make their way plain. Two things Cyrus must do for God: 1st. Jerusalem is God's city, but it is now in ruins, and he must rebuild it; that is, he must give orders for the rebuilding of it, and give wherewithal to do it. 2nd. Israel is God's people, but they are now captives, and he must release them freely and generously, not demanding any ransom, or compounding with them for price or reward. And Christ is anointed to do that for poor captived souls, which Cyrus was to do for the captive Jews, "to proclaim the opening of the prisons to them that are bound," ch. lxi. 1, enlargement from a worse bondage than that in Babylon.

2. Provision shall be made for them. They went out poor, and unable to bear the expenses of their return and re-establishment, and therefore it is promised that the labour of Egypt and other nations should come over to them and be theirs, ver. 14. Cyrus, having conquered those countries, out of their spoils provided for the returning Jews, and he ordered his subjects to furnish them with necessaries, Ezr. i. 4, so that they did not go out empty from Babylon no more than from Egypt. Those that are redeemed by Christ shall be not only provided for but enriched. Those whose spirits God stirs up to go to the heavenly Zion may depend upon him to bear their charges. The world is theirs as far as is good for them.

3. Proselytes shall be brought over to them; "Men of stature shall come after thee in chains; they shall fall down to thee, saying, Surely God is in thee." This was in part fulfilled when "many of the people of the land became Jews," Esth. viii. 17; "and said, We will go with you," humbly begging leave to do so, "for we have heard that God is with you," Zec. viii. 23. Their restoration would be a means of the conviction of many, and the conversion of some. Perhaps many of the Chaldeans, who were now themselves conquered by Cyrus, when they saw the Jews going back in triumph, came and begged pardon for the affronts and abuses they had given him, owned that God was among them, and that he was God alone, and therefore desired to join themselves to them. But this promise was to have its full accomplishment in the gospel church, when the Gentiles should become obedient, by word and deed, to the faith of Christ, Rom. xv. 18, as willing captives to the church, Ps. cx. 3, glad to wear her chains; when an infidel, beholding the public worship of Christians, shall own himself convinced that God is with them of a truth, 1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25, and shall essay to join himself to them; and when those that had been of the synagogue of Satan shall come and worship before the church's feet, and be made to know that God has loved her, Rev. iii. 9; and the kings of the earth and the nations shall bring their glory into the gospel Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 24. Note, It is good to be with those, though it be in chains, that have God with them.

Fourthly. They are taught to trust God farther than they can see him. The prophet puts this word into their mouths, and goes before them in saying it, ver. 15, "Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself." 1. God hid himself when he brought them into the trouble, hid himself, and was wroth, ch. lvii. 17. Note, Though God be his people's God and Saviour, yet sometimes, when they provoke him, he hides himself from them in displeasure, suspends his favours, and lays them under his frowns. But let them wait upon the Lord that hides his face, ch. viii. 17. 2. He hid himself when he was bringing them out of the trouble. Note, When God is acting as Israel's God and Saviour, commonly his way is in the sea, Ps. lxxvii. 19. The salvation of the church is carried on is carried as a load. The number and weight of the idols would be an incumbrance.

xlvi. 5—7. The attempts of men to imitate God are ignominious failures, even when the most costly materials are employed.

xlvi. 8. "Show yourselves men" is a single verb in Hebrew, and means play the man, act as men, or be manly.

xlvi. 11. The "ravenous bird from the east" is "the man that executeth God's counsel," that is to say, Cyrus.

xlvi. 12. The word "stout-hearted" properly signifies those who are stubborn and obstinate, or refractory. The exhortation of this verse may be taken as an appendage to the one before it, warning the very unbeliever that it would be fulfilled.

xlvii. 1. The phrase "virgin daughter of Babylon" probably is simply equivalent to Babylon, though it may be a personification of the inhabitants of Babylon. In like manner, the "daughter of the Chaldeans" may be equivalent to Chaldea. The whole verse in a mysterious way, by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts working on men's spirits, Zec. iv. 6; by weak and unlikely instruments, small and accidental occurrences, and not wrought till the last extremity. But this is our comfort: though God hide himself, we are sure he is the God of Israel, the Saviour, Job xxxv. 14.

Fifthly. They are instructed to triumph over idolaters and all the worshippers of other gods; ver. 16, "They that are makers of idols," not only that frame them, but that make gods of them by praying to them, they "shall be ashamed and confounded" when they shall be convinced of their mistakes, and shall be forced to acknowledge that the God of Israel is the only true God, and when they shall be disappointed in their expectations from their idols, under whose protection they had put themselves. "They shall go to confusion" when they shall find that they can neither excuse the sin nor escape the punishment of it, Ps. xcvii. 7. It is not here and there one, more timorous than the rest, that shall thus sneak and give up the cause, but all of them; nay, though they appear in a body, though hand join in hand, and they do all they can to keep one another in countenance, yet "they shall go to confusion together;" "Bind them in bundles to burn them."

Sixthly. They are assured that those who trust in God shall never be made ashamed of their confidence in him, ver. 17. Now God was about to deliver them out of Babylon, he directed them by his prophets, 1. To look up to him as the author of their salvation, "Israel shall be saved in the Lord." Not only their salvation shall be wrought out by his power, but it shall be treasured up for them in his grace and promise, and so secured to them: they shall be saved in him, for his name shall be their strong tower, into which they shall run, and in which they shall be safe. 2. To look beyond this temporal deliverance to that which is spiritual, and has reference to another world; to think of that salvation by the Messiah which is an everlasting salvation, the salvation of the soul, a rescue from everlasting misery, and a restoration to everlasting bliss. Give diligence to make that sure, for it may be made sure, so sure that "ye shall not be ashamed nor confounded world without end." Ye shall not only be delivered from that everlasting shame and contempt which will be the portion of idolaters, Dan. xii. 2, but ye shall have everlasting honour and glory. There is a world without end, and it will be well or ill with us according as it will be with us in that world. They that are saved with the everlasting salvation shall never be ashamed of what they did or suffered in the hopes of it, for it will so far outdo their expectations, as to be a more abundant reimbursement. The returning captives owned that to them did belong confusion of face, Dan. ix. 7, 8. Yet God tells them they shall not be confounded, but shall have assurance for ever. They that are confounded as penitents for their own sin shall not be confounded as believers in God's providence and power.

Seventhly. They are engaged for ever to cleave to God and never to desert him, never to distrust him. What had been often inculcated before is here again repeated, for the encouragement of his people to continue faithful to him, and to hope that he will be so to them, "I am the Lord, and there is none else." That the Lord we serve and trust in is God alone, appears by the two great lights, that of nature and that of revelation.

1. It appears by the light of nature, for he made the world, and therefore may justly demand its homage; ver. 18, "Thus saith the Lord that created the heavens and formed the earth, I am the Lord," the sovereign Lord of all, "and there is none else." The gods of the heathen did not do this, nay, they did not pretend to do it. He here mentions the creation of the heavens, but enlargeth more upon that of the earth, because that is the part of the creation which we have the nearest view of, and are most conversant with. It is here observed, 1st. That he formed it. It is not a rude and undigested chaos, but cast into the most proper shape and size by Infinite Wisdom. 2nd. That he fixed it. When he had made it he established it, founded it on the seas, Ps. xxiv. 2; hung it on nothing, Job xxvi. 7, as at first he made it of nothing, and yet made it substantial, and hung it fast; ponderibus librata suis,—'poised by its own weight.' 3rd. That he fitted it for use and for the service of man, to whom he designed to give it. "He created it not in vain," merely to be a proof of his power; but "he formed it to be inhabited" by the children of men, and for that end he drew the waters off it with which it was at first covered, and made the dry land appear, Ps. civ. 6, 7. Be it observed here to the honour of God's wisdom, that he made nothing in vain, but intended for some end and every way fitted to answer the intention. If any man prove to have been made in vain, it is his own fault; and to the honour of God's goodness and his favour to man, that he reckoned that not made in vain which serves for his use and benefit, to be a habitation and maintenance for him.

2. It appears by the light of revelation. As the works of God abundantly prove that he is God alone, so doth his word, and the discovery he hath made of himself and of his mind and will by it. His oracles far exceed those of the pagan deities, as well as his operations, ver. 19. The preference is here placed in three things; all that God hath said is plain, satisfactory, and just: 1st. In the manner of the delivery of it it is plain and open; "I have not spoken in secret, in a dark place of the earth." The pagan deities delivered their oracles out of dens and caverns, with a low and hollow voice and in ambiguous expressions; those that had familiar spirits whispered and muttered, ch. viii. 19. But God delivered his law from the top of mount Sinai, before all the thousands of Israel, in distinct, audible, and intelligent sounds; wisdom cries in the chief places of concourse, Pr. i. 20, 21; viii. 1—3. The vision is written and made plain, so that he that runs may read it; if it be obscure to any they may thank themselves. Christ pleaded in his own defence what God saith here, "In secret have I said nothing," Jno. xviii. 20. 2nd. In the use and benefit of it it was highly satisfactory; "I said not unto the seed of Jacob," who consulted these oracles and governed themselves by them, "Seek ye me in vain," as the false gods did to their worshippers, who sought for the living to the dead, ch. viii. 19. This includes all the gracious answers that God gave both to those that consulted him, (his word is to them a faithful guide,) and to those that prayed to him. The seed of Jacob are a praying people; it is the generation of them that seek him, Ps. xxiv. 6. And as he has in his word invited them to seek him, so he never denied their believing prayers, nor disappointed their believing expectations; he said not to them, to any of them, "Seek ye me in vain;" for if he did not think fit to give them the particular thing they prayed for, yet he gave them that grace sufficient and that comfort and satisfaction of soul which was equivalent. It is true of prayer what we say of winter, It never rots in the skies. God not only gives a gracious answer to, but will be the bountiful rewarder of, those that diligently seek him. 3rd. In the matter of it it was incontestably just, and there was no iniquity in it; "I the Lord speak righteousness, I declare things that are right," and consonant to the eternal rules and reasons of good and evil. The heathen deities dictated those things to their worshippers which were the reproach of the human nature, and tended to the extirpation of virtue. But God speaks righteousness, dictates that which is right in itself, and tends to make men righteous; and therefore he is God, and there is none else.

20 Assemble yourselves and come;
Draw near together, ye that are escaped of the nations:
They have no knowledge that set up the wood of their graven image,
And pray unto a god that cannot save.
21 Tell ye, and bring them near;
Yea, let them take counsel together:
Who hath declared this from ancient time?
Who hath told it from that time? [me;
Have not I the LORD? and there is no God else beside
A just God and a Saviour; there is none beside me.
22 Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth:
For I am God, and there is none else.
23 I have sworn by myself,
The word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness,
And shall not return,
That unto me every knee shall bow,
Every tongue shall swear.
24 Surely, shall one say,
In the LORD have I righteousness and strength:
Even to him shall men come;
And all that are incensed against him shall be ashamed.
25 In the LORD shall all the seed of Israel be justified,
And shall glory.

What is here said is intended as before,

First. For the conviction of idolaters, to shew them their folly in worshipping gods that cannot help them, and neglecting a God that can. Let all "that are escaped of the nations," not only the people of the Jews, but those of other nations that were by Cyrus released out of captivity in Babylon, let them come and hear what is to be said against their worshipping idols, that they may be cured of it as well as the Jews, that Babylon, which had of old been the womb of idolatry, might now become the grave of it. Let the refugees assemble themselves and come together; God hath something to say to them for their own good, and it is this, That idolatry is a foolish, sottish thing, upon two accounts:

1. It is setting up a refuge of lies for themselves. They "set up the wood of their graven image," for that is the substratum; though they overlay it with gold, deck it with ornaments, and make a god of it, yet still it is but wood. They "pray to a god that cannot save," for he cannot hear, he cannot help, he can do nothing. How do they disparage themselves, that give honour to that as a god which cannot as a god give good to them! How do they deceive themselves, who pray for relief to that which is in no capacity at all to relieve them! Certainly they have no knowledge, or are brutish in their knowledge, who take so much pains, and do so much penance, in seeking the favour of a god that has no power.

2. It is setting up a rival with God, the only living and true God, ver. 21. Summon them all, tell them the great cause shall again be tried, though once adjudged, between God and Baal; "bring them near, and let them take counsel together," what to say in defence of themselves and their idols. It shall, as before, be put upon this issue: let them shew when any of their gods did with any certainty foretell future events, as the God of Israel hath done, and it shall be acknowledged they have some colour for their pretensions; but none of them ever did. Their prophets were lying prophets; but "I the Lord have told it from that time," long before it came to pass; therefore you must own "there is no God else besides me." 1st. There is none but he that is fit to rule; he is a just God, and rules in justice, and will execute justice for those that are oppressed. 2nd. There is none but he that is able to help; as he is a just God, so he is the Saviour, that can save without the assistance of any, but without whom none can save. Those therefore have no sense of truth and falsehood, good and evil, no, nor of their own interest, that set up any in competition with him.

Secondly. For the comfort and encouragement of all God's faithful worshippers, whoever they are, ver. 22. They that worship idols, pray to gods that cannot save; but the God of Israel saith, saith it to all the ends of the earth, to his people, though they are scattered into the utmost corners of the world, and seem to be lost and forgotten in their dispersion, Let them but look to me by faith and prayer, look above instruments and second causes, look off from all pretenders, and look up to me, and they shall be saved. It seems to refer farther, to the conversion of the Gentiles, that live in the ends of the earth, the most distant nations, when the standard of the Gospel is set up; "to it shall the Gentiles seek." When Christ is lifted up from the earth, as the brazen serpent upon the pole, he shall draw the eyes of all men to him, they shall all be invited to look unto him, as the stung Israelites did to the brazen serpent; and so strong is the eye of faith, that by Divine grace it will reach the Saviour, and fetch in salvation by him, even from the ends of the earth; for "he is God, and there is none else." Two things are here promised, for the abundant satisfaction of all that by faith look to the Saviour:

1. That the glory of the God they serve shall be greatly advanced; and this will be good news to all the Lord's people, that how much soever they and their names are depressed, God will be exalted, ver. 23. This is confirmed by an oath that we might have strong consolation; "I have sworn by myself," (and God can swear by no greater, Heb. vi. 13,) "the word is gone out of my mouth," and shall neither be recalled nor return empty; it is gone forth in righteousness; for it is the most reasonable, equitable thing in the world, that he that made all should be Lord of all; that, since all beings are derived from him, they should all be devoted to him. He hath said it, and it shall be made good, "I will be exalted," Ps. xlvi. 10. He hath here assured us, 1st. That he will be universally submitted to, that the kingdoms of the world shall become his kingdom, they shall do him homage, "Unto me every knee shall bow;" and they shall bind themselves by an oath of allegiance to him, Unto me "every tongue shall swear." This is applied to the dominion of our Lord Jesus, Rom. xiv. 10, 11; "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ," and give account to him, "for it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God;" and it seems to be referred to Ps. ii. 9, 10. If the heart be brought into obedience to Christ, and made willing in the day of his power, the knee will bow to him in humble adorations and addresses, in a cheer-

xlvii. 5. The pomp and pride of Babylon are well known to have been great, and the greatness of its fall is equally known. That the one should be described is in accordance with all history, but that the other should be foretold by Isaiah is evidence of his divine inspiration. The frequent references to the superstitions of the Babylonians are in perfect harmony with all the records which have come down to us, and show the accuracy of the sacred writer.

xlvii. 12, 13. The Babylonians were, from very early times, greatly given to astrology and other forms of divination. The words "stand now with thine enchantments" are variously understood. Lowth, Hitzig, &c., explain them "persist in thine enchantments;" others "come near with thine enchantments;" others "stand up," &c., as in the next verse. The enchantments alluded to were perhaps the ful obedience to his commands, submission to his disposals, and compliance with his will in both; and the tongue will swear to him, will lay a bond upon the soul to engage it for ever to him; for he that bears an honest mind doth never startle at assurances. 2nd. That he will be universally sought unto, and application made unto him from all parts of the world. Unto him shall men of distant countries come to implore his favour; Unto thee shall all flesh come with their requests, Ps. lxiv. 2; and when Christ was lifted up from the earth he drew all men to him. 3rd. That it shall be to no purpose to make opposition to him. "All that are incensed against him," that rage at his bonds and cords, the nations that are angry because he hath taken to himself his great power, and hath reigned, that have been incensed at the strictness of his laws, the success of his Gospel, and the spiritual nature of his kingdom, they "shall be ashamed;" some shall be brought to a penitential shame for it, others to a remediless ruin. One way or other, sooner or later, all that are uneasy at Christ's government and victories will be made ashamed of their folly and obstinacy. Blessed be God for the assurance here given us, that, whatever becomes of us and our interests, "the Lord will reign for ever."

2. That the welfare of the souls they are concerned for shall be effectually secured; "Surely, shall one say," and another shall learn by his example to say the same, so that all the seed of Israel according to the Spirit shall say and stand to it, 1st. That God hath a sufficiency for them, and that in Christ there is enough to supply all their needs. 'In the Lord is all righteousness and strength,' so the margin reads it; he is himself righteous and strong, he can do everything, and yet will do nothing but what is unquestionably just and equitable. He hath also wherewithal to supply the needs of those that seek to him, and depend upon him, upon the equity of his providence, and the treasures of his grace. Nay, we may say, not only he hath it, but in him we have it, because he hath said he will be to us a God. In the Lord, the captive Jews had righteousness, that is, grace, both to sanctify their afflictions to them and to qualify them for deliverance; and strength for their support and escape. In the Lord Jesus we have righteousness to recommend us to the good will of God towards us, and strength to begin and carry on the good work of God in us; he is the fountain of both, and on him we must depend for both, must go forth in his strength, and make mention of his righteousness, Ps. lxxi. 16. 2nd. That they shall have an abundant bliss and satisfaction in this. First. The people of the Jews shall in the Lord be justified before men, and openly glory in their God. The oppressors reproached them, loaded them with calumny, and boasted even of a right to oppress them, as abandoned of their God; but when God shall work out their deliverance, that shall be their justification from these hard censures, and therefore they shall glory in it. Secondly. All true Christians, that depend upon Christ for strength and righteousness, in him shall be justified, and shall glory in that. Observe, 1*st.* All believers are the seed of Israel, an upright, praying seed. 2*nd.* The great privilege they enjoy by Jesus Christ is, that in him, and for his sake, they are justified before God, Christ being made of God to them righteousness. All that are justified will own it is in Christ that they are justified, nor could they be justified by any other; and those who are justified, shall be glorified. And therefore, 3*rd.* The great duty believers owe to Christ is to glory in him, and to make their boast of him. Therefore he is made all in all to us, that whoso glories may glory in the Lord; and let us comply with this intention.

CHAPTER XLVI.

God by the prophet here designing shortly to deliver them out of their captivity, prepares them for that deliverance, by possessing them with a detestation of idols, and with a believing confidence in God, even their own God. I. Let them not be afraid of the idols of Babylon, as if they could any way obstruct their deliverance, for they should be defaced, ver. 1, 2. But let them trust in that God who had often delivered them to do it still, to do it now, ver. 3, 4. II. Let them not think to make idols of their own, images of the God of Israel, by them to worship him, as the Babylonians worshipped their gods, ver. 5—7. Let them not be sottish, ver. 8, but have an eye to God in his word, not in an image; let them depend upon that, and upon the promises and predictions of it, and God's power to accomplish them all, ver. 9—11. And let them know that the unbelief of man shall not make the word of God of none effect, ver. 12, 13.

BEL boweth down, Nebo stoopeth,
Their idols were upon the beasts, and upon the cattle:

BABYLONISH IDOLS.

Your carriages were heavy loaden;
They are a burden to the weary beast.
2 They stoop, they bow down together;
They could not deliver the burden,
But themselves are gone into captivity.
3 Hearken unto me, O house of Jacob,
And all the remnant of the house of Israel,
Which are borne by me from the belly,
Which are carried from the womb:
4 And even to your old age I am he;
And even to hoar hairs will I carry you
I have made, and I will bear;
Even I will carry, and will deliver you

We are here told,

First. That the false gods will certainly fail their worshippers, then when they have most need of them, ver. 1, 2. Bel and Nebo were two celebrated idols of Babylon; some make Bel to be a contraction of Baal; others rather think not, but that it was Belus, one of their first kings, who after his death was deified. As Bel was a deified prince, so, some think, Nebo was a deified prophet, for so Nebo signifies; so that Bel and Nebo were their Jupiter and their Mercury, or Apollo. Barnabas and Paul passed at Lystra for Jupiter and Mercury. The names of these idols were taken into the names of their princes: Bel into Belshazzar's, Nebo into Nebuchadnezzar's, and Nebuzaradan's, &c. These gods they had long worshipped, and in their revels praised them for their successes, as appears, Dan. v. 4, and insulted over Israel as if Bel and Nebo were too hard for Jehovah, and should detain them in captivity in defiance of their God. Now, that this might be no discouragement to the poor captives, God here tells them what shall become of these idols which they threatened them with: when Cyrus takes Babylon, down go the idols. It was usual then with conquerors to destroy the gods of the places and people they conquered, and to put the gods of their own nation in the room of them, ch. xxxvii. 19. Cyrus will do so; and then Bel and Nebo, that were set up on high, and looked great, bold, and erect, stoop and bow down at the feet of the soldiers that plunder the temples. And because there is a great deal of gold and silver upon them, which was intended to adorn them, but proves to expose them, they carry them away with the rest of the spoil; the carriers' horses or mules are laden with them and their other idols, to be sent among other lumber, for so it seems they accounted them, rather than treasure, into Persia. So far are they from being able to support their worshippers, that they are themselves a heavy load in the wagons, and a burthen to the weary beast. The idols cannot help one another, ver. 2; "They stoop, they bow down together," they are all alike tottering things, and their day is come to fall. Their worshippers cannot help them; they could not deliver the burthen out of the enemies' hand, but themselves, both the idols and the idolaters, are gone into captivity. Let not therefore God's people be afraid of either. When God's ark was taken prisoner by the Philistines, it proved a burthen, not to the beasts, but to the conquerors, who were forced to return it; but when Bel and Nebo are gone into captivity their worshippers may even give their good word with them, they will never recover themselves.

Secondly. That the true God will never fail his worshippers; You hear what is become of Bel and Nebo, now "hearken to me, O house of Jacob," ver. 3, 4. Am I such a God as these? No; though you are brought low, and the house of Israel is but a remnant, your God hath been, is, and ever will be, your powerful and faithful protector.

1. Let God's Israel do him the justice to own that he hath hitherto been kind to them, careful of them, tender over them, and hath all along done well for them. Let them own, 1st. That he bore them at first; "I have made." Out of what womb came they, but that of his mercy, and grace, and promise? He formed them into a people, and gave them their constitution. Every good man is what God makes him. 2nd. That he bore them up all along; You have been "borne by me from the belly, and carried from the womb." God began betimes to do them good; as soon as ever they were formed into a nation, nay, when as yet they were very few and strangers, God took them under a special protection, and "suffered no man to do them wrong," Ps. cv. 12—14. In the infancy of their state, when they were not only foolish and helpless as children, but froward and peevish, God carried them in the arms of his power and love, bore them as upon eagles' wings, Ex. xix. 4; Deut. xxxii. 11. Moses had not patience to carry them, "as the nursing father doth the sucking child," Num. xi. 12. But God bore them, and bore their manners, Acts xiii. 18. And as God began early to do them good, "When Israel was a child then I loved him," so he had constantly continued to do them good; he had carried them from the womb to this day. And we may all witness for God, that he hath been thus gracious to us; we have been borne by him from the belly, from the womb, else we had died from the womb, and given up the ghost when we came out of the belly; we have been the constant care of his kind providence, carried in the arms of his power, and in the bosom of his love and pity. The new man is so; all that is in us that is born of God is borne up by him, else it would soon fail. Our spiritual life is sustained by his grace, as necessarily and constantly as our natural life by his providence. The saints have acknowledged that God has carried them from the womb, and have encouraged themselves with the consideration of it in their greatest straits, Ps. xxii. 9, 10; lxxi. 5, 6, 17.

2. He will then do them the kindness to promise that he will never leave them; he that was their first will be their last, that was the author will be the finisher of their well-being, ver. 4. You have been borne by me from the belly, nursed when you were children, and "even to your old age, I am he," when, by reason of your decays and infirmities, you will need help as much as in your infancy. Israel was now growing old, so was their covenant by which they were incorporated, Heb viii. 13, "grey hairs were here and there upon them," Hos. vii. 9, and they had hastened their old age, and the calamities of it, by their irregularities; but God will not cast them off now, will not fail them when their strength fails; he is still their God, will still carry them in the same everlasting arms that were laid under them in Moses's time, Deut. xxxiii. 27. He has made them, and owns his interest in them, and therefore he will bear, will bear with their infirmities, and bear them up under their afflictions; "Even I will carry, and will deliver them;" will now bear them upon eagles' wings out of Babylon, as in their infancy I bore them out of Egypt. This promise to aged Israel is applicable to every aged Israelite. God hath graciously engaged to support and comfort his faithful servants, even in their old age. Even to your old age, when you grow unfit for business, when you are compassed with infirmities, and perhaps your relations begin to grow weary of you, yet I am he, he that I am, he that I have been, the very same by whom you have been borne from the belly, and carried from the womb. You change, but I am the same. I am he that I have promised to be, he that you have found me, he that you would have me to be. I will carry you, I will bear, will bear you up, and bear you out, and will carry you on in your way, and carry you home at last.

5 To whom will ye liken me, and make me equal,
And compare me, that we may be like?
6 They lavish gold out of the bag,
And weigh silver in the balance,
And hire a goldsmith; and he maketh it a god:
They fall down, yea, they worship.
7 They bear him upon the shoulder, they carry him, explanations of signs and tokens, while sorceries would be what is usually understood by magic. "Counsels," in verse 13, would perhaps be correctly explained of "consultations." The people consulted the augurs and soothsayers, who themselves consulted the stars, &c. The Hebrew rendered "astrologers" is not "viewers of the heavens," as the margin says, but "dividers of the heavens;" the reference being, as it would seem, to the division of the starry firmament into sections for astrological purposes. "Star-gazers" are those who observe the planets, &c., in the practice of divination. For "monthly prognosticators" the Hebrew is, "who make known at new moons," or "at months," meaning that they either gave their oracles at the new moon or by means of the moon, including perhaps all its changes. The Syriac version thus renders the latter clause: "Let the Chaldeans stand up and deliver thee, those who gaze on heaven, and on the stars, and made known to thee by the moon what is coming upon thee."

And set him in his place, and he standeth;
From his place shall he not remove:
Yea, one shall cry unto him, yet can he not answer,
Nor save him out of his trouble.
8 Remember this, and shew yourselves men:
Bring it again to mind, O ye transgressors.
9 Remember the former things of old:
For I am God, and there is none else;
I am God, and there is none like me,
10 Declaring the end from the beginning,
And from ancient times the things that are not yet done,
Saying, My counsel shall stand,
And I will do all my pleasure:
11 Calling a ravenous bird from the east,
The man that executeth my counsel from a far country:
Yea, I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass;
I have purposed it, I will also do it.
12 Hearken unto me, ye stouthearted,
That are far from righteousness:
13 I bring near my righteousness; it shall not be far off,
And my salvation shall not tarry:
And I will place salvation in Zion
For Israel my glory.

The deliverance of Israel by the destruction of Babylon (the general subject of all these chapters) is here insisted upon, and again promised, for the conviction both of idolaters, who set up rivals with God, and of oppressors, that were enemies to the people of God.

First. For the conviction of those that made and worshipped idols, especially those of Israel that did so, that would have images of their God, as the Babylonians had of theirs:

1. He challengeth them either to frame an image that should be thought a resemblance of him, or set up any being that should stand in competition with him, ver. 5; "To whom will ye liken me?" It is absurd to think of representing an infinite and eternal Spirit by the figure of any creature whatsoever; it is to change his truth into a lie, and to turn his glory into shame. None ever saw any similitude of him, nor can see his face and live; to whom then can we liken God? ch. xl. 18, 25. It is likewise absurd to think of making any creature equal with the Creator, who is infinitely above the noblest creatures; yea, or to make any comparison between the creature and the Creator, since between infinite and finite there is no proportion.

2. He exposeth the folly of those that made idols, and then prayed to them, ver. 6, 7. 1st. They were at great charge upon their idols, and spared no cost to fit them for their purpose; "They lavish gold out of the bag." No little will serve, and they do not care how much goes, though they pinch their families, and weaken their estates by it. How doth the profuseness of idolaters shame the niggardliness of many who call themselves God's servants, but are for a religion that will cost them nothing. Some lavish gold out of the bag to make an idol of it in the house, while others hoard up gold in the bag to make an idol of it in the heart; for covetousness is idolatry, as dangerous, though not so scandalous, as the other. "They weigh silver in the balance," either to be the matter of their idol,—for even they that were most sottish, had so much sense as to think God should be served with the best they had, the best they could possibly afford; they that represented him by a calf made it a golden one;—or to pay the workmen's wages,—the service of sin often proves very expensive. 2nd. They were in great care about their idols, and took no little pains about them, ver. 7. "They bear him upon their own shoulders," and do not hire porters to do it; "they carry him, and set him in his place," more like a dead corpse than a living god. They set him on a pedestal, and he standeth; they take a great deal of pains to fasten him, and from his place he shall not remove, that they may know where to find him, though at the same time they know he can neither move a hand nor stir a step to do them any kindness. 3rd. After all, they paid great respect to their idols, though they were but the works of their own hands, and the creatures of their own fancies. When the goldsmith has made it, that which they please to call "a god, they fall down, yea, they worship it." If they magnified themselves too much in pretending to make a god, as if they would atone for that, they vilified themselves as much in prostrating themselves to a god that they knew the original of. And if they were deceived by the custom of their country in making such gods as those, they did no less deceive themselves when they cried unto them, though they knew they could not answer them, could not understand what they said to them, nor so much as reply, Yea or No, much less could they save them out of their trouble. Now, shall any that have some knowledge of, and interest in, the true and living God, thus make fools of themselves?

3. He puts it to themselves, and their own reason; let that judge in the case, ver. 8, "Remember this" that hath been often told you, what senseless helpless things idols are, "and shew yourselves men;" men, and not brutes; men, and not babes. Act with reason, act with resolution, act for your own interest. Do a wise thing, do a brave thing, and scorn to disparage your own judgment, as you do when you worship idols. Note, Sinners would become saints, if they would but shew themselves men; if they would but support the dignity of their nature, and use aright the powers and capacities of it. Many things you have been minded of; bring them again to mind, recall them into your memories, and revolve them there. "O ye transgressors consider your ways;" "Remember whence ye are fallen, and repent," and so recover yourselves.

4. He again produceth incontestable proofs that he is God; that he, and none but he, is so; ver. 9, "I am God, and there is none else," none beside me; "I am God, and there is none like me." This is that which we have need to be minded of again and again. For proof of it, he refers,

1st. To the sacred history: "Remember the former things of old," what the God of Israel did for his people in their beginnings; whether he did not that for them which no one else could, and which the false gods did not, nor could do for their worshippers. Remember those things, and you will own that "I am God, and there is none else;" and this is a good reason why we should give glory to him as a nonsuch, and why we should not give that glory to any other which is due to him alone, Ex. xv. 11.

2nd. To the sacred prophecy. He is God alone; for it is he only that declares "the end from the beginning," ver. 10. From the beginning of time he declared the end of time, the end of all things, in the prophecy of Enoch: "Behold the Lord comes." From the beginning of a nation he declares what the end of it will be. He told Israel what should befall them in the latter days, what their end should be, and wished they were so wise as to consider it, Deu. xxxii. 20, 29. From the beginning of an event he declares what the end of it will be, "Known unto God are all his works;" and when he pleaseth he makes them known. Farther than prophecy guides us, it is impossible for us to "find out the work that God makes from the beginning to the end," Eccl. iii. 11; he "declares from ancient times the things that are not yet done." There are many Scripture prophecies, which were delivered long ago, but are not yet accomplished; but the accomplishing of some in the meantime is an earnest of the accomplishment of the rest in due time; and by this it appears he is God and none else. It is he, and none but he, that can say, and make his words good; "My counsel shall stand," and all the powers of hell and earth cannot control or disannul it, nor all their policies correct or countermine it. As God's operations are all according to his counsels, so his counsels shall all be fulfilled in his operations; and none of his measures shall be broken, none of his designs shall miscarry. This yields abundant satisfaction to those that have bound up all their comforts in God's counsels, that his counsel shall undoubtedly stand; and if we are come to this, that whatever pleaseth God pleaseth us, nothing can contribute more to make us easy than to be assured of this, that God will do all his pleasure, Ps. cxxxv. 6.

The accomplishment of this particular prophecy, which relates to the elevation of Cyrus, and his agency in the deliverance of God's people out of their captivity is instanced in, for the confirmation of this truth, that "the Lord is God, and there is none else;" and this is a thing which shall shortly come to pass, ver. 11. God doth by his counsel "call a ravenous bird from the east," a bird of prey, Cyrus; who, they say, had a nose like the beak of a hawk, or eagle, to which some think this alludes; or, as others say, to the eagle which was his standard, as it was afterwards that of the Romans, to which there is supposed to be a reference, Mat. xxiv. 28. Cyrus came from the east at God's call; for he is Lord of hosts, and of those that have hosts at command; and if God give him a call he will give him success. He is the man that shall execute God's counsel, though he comes from a far country, and knows nothing of the matter. Note, Even those that know not and mind not God's revealed will, yet are made use of to fulfil the counsels of his secret will, which shall all be punctually accomplished in their season by what hand he pleaseth. That which is here added, to ratify this particular prediction, may abundantly shew to the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel. "I have spoken" by my servants the prophets; and what I have spoken is just the same with what "I have purposed." For though God has many things in his purposes which are not in his prophecies, he has nothing in his prophecies but what are in his purposes; and he will do it, for he will never change his mind; he will bring it to pass, for it is not in the power of any creature to control him. Observe with what a majesty he saith it, as one having authority; "I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass;" dictum factum,—'no sooner said than done.' "I have purposed it," and he doth not say, 'I will take care it shall be done,' but "I will do it." Heaven and earth shall pass away sooner than one tittle of the word of God.

Secondly. For the conviction of those that daringly opposed the counsels of God, assurance is here given, not only that they shall be accomplished, but they shall be accomplished very shortly, ver. 12, 13. This is addressed to the stout-hearted; that is, either, 1. The proud and obstinate Babylonians, that are far from righteousness, far from doing justice, or shewing mercy to those they have power over, that say they will never let the oppressed go free, but will still detain them in spite of their petition, or God's predictions, that are far from any thing of clemency or compassion to the miserable. Or, 2. The unhumbled Jews, that have been long under the hammer, long in the furnace, but are not broken, are not melted; that, like the unbelieving murmuring Israelites in the wilderness, think themselves far from God's righteousness, (that is, from the performance of his promise, and his appearing to judge for them,) and by their distrusts set themselves at yet a farther distance from it, and keep good things from themselves, as their fathers, who could not enter into the land of promise, because of unbelief. This is applicable to the Jewish nation, when they rejected the Gospel of Christ; though they followed after the law of righteousness, yet attained not to righteousness, because they sought it not of faith, Rom. ix. 31, 32; they perished far from righteousness, and it was because they were stout-hearted, Rom. x. 3.

Now to them God saith that, whatever they think, the one in presumption, the other in despair, 1st. Salvation shall be certainly wrought for God's people. If men will not do them justice, God will; and his righteousness shall effect that for them which men's righteousness would not reach to. He will "place salvation in Zion;" that is, he will make Jerusalem a place of safety and defence to all those that will plant themselves there. Thence shall salvation go forth for Israel his glory. God glories in his Israel; and he will be glorified in the salvation he designs to work out for them, it shall redound greatly to his honour. This salvation shall be in Zion, for thence the Gospel shall take rise, ch. ii. 3; thither the Redeemer comes, Isa. lix. 20; Rom. xi. 26; and it is Zion's king that hath salvation, Zec. ix. 9. 2nd. It shall be very shortly wrought. This is especially insisted on to those who thought it at a distance; "I bring near my righteousness," nearer than you think of. Perhaps it is nearest of all when your straits are greatest, and your enemies most injurious. "It shall not be far off," when there is occasion for it, Ps. lxxxv. 9. "Behold, the Judge stands before the door." "My salvation shall not tarry" any longer than till it is ripe, and you are ready for it; and therefore, though it tarry, wait for it; wait patiently. For "he that shall come will come, and will not tarry."

CHAPTER XLVII.

Infinite Wisdom could have ordered things so as that Israel might have been released, and yet Babylon unhurt; but if they will harden their hearts, and will not let the people go, they must thank themselves that their ruin is made to pave the way to Israel's release; and therefore that ruin is here in this chapter largely foretold, not to gratify a spirit of revenge in the people of God, that had been used barbarously by them, but to encourage their faith and hope concerning their own deliverance, and to be a type of the downfal of that great enemy of the New Testament church which in the Revelation goes under the name of Babylon. In this chapter we have, I. The greatness of the ruin threatened: that Babylon shall be brought down to the dust, and made completely miserable; should fall from the height of prosperity, into the depth of adversity, ver. 1—5. II. The sins that provoked God to bring this ruin upon them: 1. Their cruelty to the people of God, ver. 6; 2. Their pride and carnal security, ver. 7—9; 3. Their confidence in themselves, and contempt of God, ver. 10; 4. Their use of magic arts, and their dependence upon enchantments and sorceries, which should be so far from standing them in any stead, that they should but hasten their ruin, ver. 11—15.

xlvii. 15. The "merchants" here seem to be the men who carried on the traffic of deceit mentioned in the preceding note. Some, however, think ordinary traders are intended, or those with whom business was transacted.

xlviii. 4. For "an iron sinew" some render an iron rod, or an iron bar. The sense is that of stiff-necked, or stubborn.

xlviii. 7. The words, "They are created now," &c., signify that the declarations made to them by the Lord were altogether new revelations, not based upon calculations and phenomena like heathen oracles, but originating in the divine mind itself, and directly given by him.

xlviii. 8. "Yea, from that time that thine ear was not opened" should rather be "Yea, from then (i.e., of old) thine ear was not opened."

xlviii. 9. "For my praise will I refrain for thee:" rather, "For my praise will I refrain (or restrain) it (i.e., my anger) from thee."

COME down, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon,
Sit on the ground: there is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans:
For thou shalt no more be called tender and delicate
2 Take the millstones, and grind meal:
Uncover thy locks, make bare the leg,
Uncover the thigh, pass over the rivers.
3 Thy nakedness shall be uncovered,
Yea, thy shame shall be seen:
I will take vengeance,
And I will not meet thee as a man.
4 As for our redeemer, the LORD of hosts is his name,
The Holy One of Israel.
5 Sit thou silent, and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans:
For thou shalt no more be called, The lady of kingdoms.
6 I was wroth with my people,
I have polluted mine inheritance,
And given them into thine hand:
Thou didst shew them no mercy;
Upon the ancient hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke.

In these verses God by the prophet sends a message even to Babylon, like that of Jonah to Nineveh; the time is at hand when Babylon shall be destroyed. Fair warning is thus given her that she may by repentance prevent the ruin, and there may be a lengthening of her tranquillity. We may observe here,

First. God's controversy with Babylon. We will begin with that, for there all the calamity begins. She hath made God her enemy, and then who can befriend her? Let her know that the righteous Judge to whom vengeance belongs, hath said, ver. 3, "I will take vengeance." She has provoked God, and shall be reckoned with for it, when the measure of her iniquities is full. Woe to those on whom God comes to take vengeance; for "who knows the power of his anger," and what a fearful thing it is to fall into his hands? Were it a man like ourselves that would be revenged on us, we might hope to be a match for him, either to make our escape from him or to make our part good with him; but he saith, "I will not meet thee as a man," not with the compassions of a man; but I will be unto thee as a lion, and a young lion, Hos. v. 14; or rather, not with the strength of a man, which is easily resisted, but with the power of a God which cannot be resisted. Not with the justice of a man, which may be bribed or biassed, or mollified by a foolish pity, but with the justice of a God, which is strict and severe, and can never be evaded. As in pardoning the penitent, so in punishing the impenitent, he is God and not man, Hos. xi. 9.

Secondly. The particular ground of this controversy. We are sure there is cause for it, and it is a just cause; it is the vengeance of his temple, Jer. l. 28; it is for violence done to Zion, Jer. li. 35. God will plead his people's cause against them. It is acknowledged, ver. 6, that God had in wrath delivered his people into the hands of the Babylonians; had made use of them for the correction of his children, and had by their means polluted his inheritance; had left his peculiar people exposed to suffer in common with the rest of the nations; had suffered the heathen, who should have been kept at a distance, to come into his sanctuary, and defile his temple, Ps. lxxix. 1. Herein God was righteous, but the Babylonians carried the matter too far; and when they had them in their hands, triumphing to see a people that had been so much in reputation for wisdom, holiness, and honour, brought thus low, with a base and servile spirit they trampled upon them, and shewed them no mercy; no, not the common instances of humanity, which the miserable are entitled to purely by their misery. They used them barbarously, and with an air of contempt, nay, and of complacency in their calamities. They were brought under the yoke; but, as if that were not enough, they laid the yoke on very heavily, adding affliction to the afflicted. Nay, they laid it on the ancient, the elders in years, who were past their labour, and must sink under a yoke which those in their youthful strength would easily bear. The elders in office, those that had been judges and magistrates, and persons of the first rank, they took a pride in putting them to the meanest, hardest drudgery; Jeremiah laments this, that the faces of elders were not honoured, Lam. v. 12. Nothing brings a surer and sorer ruin upon any people than cruelty, especially to God's Israel.

Thirdly. The terror of this controversy. She has reason to tremble, when she is told who it is that has this quarrel with her, ver. 4. As for our Redeemer, our God, that undertakes to plead our cause, as the avenger of our blood, he hath two names which speak not only comfort to us, but terror to our adversaries. 1. He is the Lord of hosts, that has all the creatures at his command, and therefore has all power both in heaven and in earth. Woe to those against whom the Lord fights, for the whole creation is at war with them. 2. He is the Holy One of Israel, a God in covenant with us, who has his residence among us, and will faithfully perform all the promises he hath made to us. God's power and holiness are engaged against Babylon, and for Zion. This may fitly be applied to Christ, our great Redeemer; he is both Lord of hosts and the Holy One of Israel.

Fourthly. The consequences of it to Babylon. She is called a virgin, because so she thought herself, though she was "the mother of harlots;" beautiful as a virgin, and courted by all about her; she had been called "tender and delicate," ver. 1; and "the lady of kingdoms," ver. 5; but now the case is altered.

1. Her honour is gone, and she must bid farewell to all her dignity. She that had sat at the upper end of the world, sat in state, and sat at ease, must now "come down, and sit in the dust," as very mean, and a deep mourner; "must sit on the ground," for she shall be so emptied and impoverished that she shall not have a seat left her to sit upon.

2. Her power is gone, and she must bid farewell to all her dominion. She shall rule no more as she has done, nor give law as she has done to her neighbours; "There is no throne," none for thee, "O daughter of the Chaldeans." Note, Those that abuse their honour and power provoke God to deprive them of it, and to make them "come down and sit in the dust."

3. Her ease and pleasure is gone. She shall "no more be called tender and delicate," as she has been, for she shall not only be deprived of all those things with which she pampered herself, but shall be put to hard service, and made to feel both want and pain, which should be more than doubly grievous to her that when time was "would not venture to set so much as the sole of her foot to the ground for tenderness and for delicacy," Deu. xxviii. 56. It is our wisdom not to use ourselves to be tender and delicate, because we know not how hardly others may use us before we die, nor what straits we may be reduced to.

4. Her liberty is gone, and she is brought into a state of servitude, and as sore a bondage as she in her prosperity had brought others to. Even the great men of Babylon must now receive the same law from the conquerors that they used to give to the conquered; "take the millstones, and grind meal," ver. 2. Set to work, to hard labour, like beating hemp in Bridewell, which will make thee sweat so as that thou must throw of all thy head dresses, and "uncover thy locks." When they were driven from one place to another, at the capricious humour of their masters, they must be forced to wade up to the middle through the waters; to "make bare the leg and uncover the thigh," that they might "pass over the rivers," which would be a great mortification to them that used to ride in state. But let them not complain, for when time was, just thus they had used their captives; and "with what measure they then meted, it is now measured to them again." Let those that have power use it with temper and moderation, considering that the spoke that is uppermost will be under.

5. All her glory, and all her glorying, is gone. Instead of glory, she has ignominy; ver. 3; "Thy nakedness shall be uncovered, and thy shame shall be seen," according to the base and barbarous usage they commonly gave their captives, to whom, for covetousness of their clothes, they did not leave rags sufficient to cover their nakedness, so void were they of the modesty, as well as of the pity, due to the human nature. Instead of glorying, she sits silent, and gets into darkness, ver. 5; ashamed to shew her face, for she has quite lost her credit, and "shall no more be called the lady of kingdoms." Note, God can make those sit silent that used to make the greatest noise in the world; and send those into darkness that used to make the greatest figure. Let him that glories therefore glory in a God that changeth not, and not in any worldly wealth, pleasure, or honour, which is subject to change.

7 And thou saidst, I shall be a lady for ever:
So that thou didst not lay these things to thy heart,
Neither didst remember the latter end of it.
8 Therefore hear now this, thou that art given to pleasures,
That dwellest carelessly,
That sayest in thine heart,
I am, and none else beside me;
I shall not sit as a widow,
Neither shall I know the loss of children:
9 But these two things shall come to thee in a moment in one day,
The loss of children, and widowhood:
They shall come upon thee in their perfection
For the multitude of thy sorceries,
And for the great abundance of thine enchantments.
10 For thou hast trusted in thy wickedness:
Thou hast said, None seeth me.
Thy wisdom and thy knowledge, it hath perverted thee;
And thou hast said in thine heart, I am, and none else beside me.
11 Therefore shall evil come upon thee;
Thou shalt not know from whence it riseth:
And mischief shall fall upon thee;
Thou shalt not be able to put it off:
And desolation shall come upon thee suddenly, which thou shalt not know.
12 Stand now with thine enchantments,
And with the multitude of thy sorceries,
Wherein thou hast laboured from thy youth;
If so be thou shalt be able to profit,
If so be thou mayest prevail.
13 Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsels.
Let now the astrologers, the stargazers,
The monthly prognosticators,
Stand up, and save thee
From these things that shall come upon thee.
14 Behold, they shall be as stubble;
The fire shall burn them; they shall not deliver themselves from the power of the flame:
There shall not be a coal to warm at,
Nor fire to sit before it.
15 Thus shall they be unto thee with whom thou hast laboured,
Even thy merchants, from thy youth:
They shall wander every one to his quarter;
None shall save thee.

Babylon, now doomed to ruin, is here justly upbraided with her pride, luxury, and security in the day of her prosperity, and the confidence she had in her own wisdom and forecast, and particularly in the prognostications and counsels of xlviii. 10. "Not with silver" is by many understood to mean "not like silver," or "not as silver," for another purpose and in another way.

xlviii. 14. "The Lord hath loved him:" this is often explained to mean, "He whom the Lord loves will do," &c., in reference to Cyrus. It is held by others that the sense is, "Jehovah loves him," i.e., Israel, and to show his love "he will do all his pleasure in Babylon, and his arm" (i.e., the arm of the Lord) "shall be on the Chaldeans." The Syriac renders it, "The Lord loves to do his will on Babylon, and on the land of the Chaldeans." The Greek also differs from the Hebrew, and may have followed a various reading. The next verse seems to favour the opinion that Cyrus is meant here as God's agent in executing his purposes.

xlviii. 18, 19. The two comparisons in verse 18 suggest similar ideas. Peace like a river means constant quiet and prosperity. Righteousness like the waves means continued spiritual excellence.

the astrologers. And these things are mentioned both to justify God in bringing these judgments upon her, and to mortify her, and put her to so much the greater shame under these judgments; for when God comes forth to take vengeance, glory belongs to him, but confusion to the sinner.

First. The Babylonians are here upbraided with their pride and haughtiness, and the mighty conceit they had of themselves, because of their wealth and power, and the vast extent of their dominion. It was the language, both of the government and of the body of the people, "Thou sayest in thine heart," and God, who searcheth all hearts, can tell men what they say there, though they never speak it out,) "I am, and none else besides me," ver. 8; and the same again, ver. 10. The repetition of this part of the charge intimates, that they said it often, and that it was very offensive to God. It is the very word that God had often said concerning himself; "I am, and none else besides me;" speaking his self-existence, his infinite and incomparable perfections, and his sole supremacy; and all this Babylon pretends to. And no wonder, if she that assumed a power to make what gods and goddesses she pleased, for the people to worship, made herself one among the rest. It is presumption to say of any creature, It is, and there is not its like, there is none besides it; for creatures stand pretty much upon a level with one another. But it is insufferable arrogance for any to say so of themselves, and an evidence of their self-ignorance.

Secondly. They are upbraided with their luxury and love of ease; ver. 8, "Thou that art given to pleasures," art a slave to them, art in them as in thine element; and that thou mayest enjoy them without disturbance or interruption, "dwellest carelessly," and layest nothing to heart. Great wealth and plenty is a great temptation to sensuality; and where there is fulness of bread there is commonly abundance of idleness. But if those that are given to pleasures, and dwell carelessly, would but hear this, that for all these things God shall bring them into judgment, it would be a damp to their mirth, an allay to their pleasure, and would find them something to be in care about.

Thirdly. They are upbraided with their carnal security, and their vain confidence of the perpetuity of their pomps and pleasures. This is much insisted on here. Observe,

1. The cause of their security. They therefore thought themselves safe and out of danger; not because they were ignorant of the uncertainty of all earthly enjoyments, and the inevitable fate that attends states and kingdoms as well as particular persons, but because "they did not lay this to heart," did not apply it to themselves, nor give it a due consideration. They lulled themselves asleep in ease and pleasure, and dreamt of nothing else but that "to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant." They did not remember the latter end of it; not the latter end of their prosperity, that that is a fading flower, and will wither; not the latter end of their iniquity, that it will be bitterness; that the day will come, when their injustice and oppression must be reckoned for and punished. She did not remember her latter end, so some read it: she forgat that her day will come to fall, and what would be in the end hereof. It was the ruin of Jerusalem, Lam. i. 9, "She remembered not her last end, therefore she came down wonderfully:" and it was Babylon's ruin too. Therefore the children of men are easy, and think themselves safe in their sinful ways, because they never think of death and judgment, and their future state.

2. The ground of their security. They trusted in their wickedness, and in their wisdom, ver. 10. 1st. Their power and wealth, which they had gotten by fraud and oppression, was their confidence. Thou hast trusted in thy wickedness, as Doeg, Ps. lii. 7. Many have so debauched their own consciences, and are got to such a pitch of daring wickedness, that they stick at nothing; and this they trust to carry them through those difficulties which embarrass men that make conscience of what they say and do. They doubt not but they shall be too hard for all their enemies, because they dare lie, and kill, and forswear themselves, and do any thing for their interest. Thus they trust in their wickedness to secure them, which is the only thing that will ruin them. 2nd. Their policy and craft, which they called their wisdom, was their confidence. They thought they could outwit all mankind, and therefore might set all their enemies at defiance; but their wisdom and knowledge perverted them, and turned them out of the way; made them forget themselves, and the preparation necessary to be made for hereafter.

3. The expressions of their security. Three things this proud and haughty monarchy said, in her security: 1st. "I shall be a lady for ever." She looked upon the patent of her honour to be, not during the pleasure of the Sovereign Lord, the fountain of honour, or during her own good behaviour, but to be perpetual to the present generation, and their heirs and successors for ever. She is not only proud that she is a lady, but confident she "shall be a lady for ever." Thus the New-Testament Babylon saith, "I sit as a queen, and shall see no sorrow," Rev. xviii. 7. Those ladies mistake themselves, and consider not their latter end, who think they shall be ladies for ever; for death will shortly lay their honour with them in the dust. Saints shall be saints for ever, but lords and ladies will not be so for ever. 2nd. "I shall not sit as a widow," in solitude and sorrow; shall never lose that power and wealth I am thus wedded to. The monarchy shall never want a monarch to espouse and protect it, and be a husband to the state; nor shall I "know the loss of children." She was as confident of the continuance of the numbers of her people, as of the dignity of her prince; and had no fear of being either deposed or depopulated. Those that are in a height of prosperity are apt to fancy themselves out of the reach of adverse fate. 3rd. None seeth me when I do amiss; and therefore there will be none to call me to an account. It is common for sinners to promise themselves impunity, because they promise themselves secrecy in their wicked ways. They trust to their wicked arts and designs to stand them in stead; because they think they have carried them on so plausibly, as that none can discern the wickedness and deceit of them.

4. The punishment of their security. It shall be their ruin; and it will be, 1st. A complete ruin, the ruin of all their comforts and confidences; "These two things shall come upon thee," the very two things that thou didst set at defiance, "loss of children and widowhood." Both thy princes and thy people shall be cut off, so that thou shalt be no more a government, no more a nation. Note, God often brings upon secure sinners those very mischiefs which they least feared, and thought themselves in least danger of. They shall come upon thee in their perfection, with all their aggravating circumstances, and without any thing to allay or mitigate them. Afflictions to God's children are not afflictions in perfection; widowhood is not to them a calamity in perfection, for they have this to comfort themselves with, that their Maker is their husband. Loss of children is not, for he is better to them than ten sons. But on his enemies they come in perfection. Widowhood and loss of children are either of them great griefs, but both together great indeed. Naomi thinks she may well be called Marah, when she is left both of her sons and of her husband, Ru. i. 5. And yet on her these evils did not come in perfection, for she had two daughters-in-law left, that were comforts to her. But on Babylon they come in perfection; she has no comfort remaining. 2nd. It shall be a sudden and surprising ruin. The evil shall come in one day, nay, in a moment; which will make it much the more terrible, especially to those that were so very secure. "Evil shall come upon thee," and thou shalt neither have time nor way to provide against it, or to prepare for it; for "thou shalt not know from whence it riseth," and therefore shalt not know where to stand upon thy guard. 'Thou shalt not know the morning thereof,' so the Hebrew phrase is: we know just when and where the day will break, and the sun rise, but we know not what the day when it is come will bring forth, nor when or where trouble will arise. Perhaps the storm may come from that point of the compass which we little thought of. Babylon pretended to great wisdom and knowledge, ver. 10, but with all her knowledge cannot foresee, nor with all her wisdom prevent, the ruin threatened. "Desolation shall come upon thee suddenly" as a thief in the night, "which thou shalt not know;" that is, which thou little thought of. Fair warning was indeed given them by this and other prophets of the Lord, of this desolation; but they slighted that notice, and would give no credit to it; and therefore justly is it so ordered that they should have no other notice of it, but that, partly through their own security, and partly through the swiftness and subtlety of the enemy, when it came, it should be a perfect surprise to them. Those that slight the warnings of the written word let them not expect any other premonitions. 3rd. It shall be an irresistible ruin, and such as they should have no fence against; "Mischief shall come upon thee" so suddenly that thou shalt have no time to turn thee in; so strongly, that "thou shalt not be able" to make head against it, and "to put it off," and save thyself. There is no opposing the judgments of God, when they come with commission. Babylon herself, with all her wealth, and power, and multitude, is not able to put off the mischief that comes.

Fourthly. They are upbraided with their divinations, their magical and astrological arts and sciences; which the Chaldeans, above any other nation, were notorious for, and from them other nations borrowed all their learning of that kind.

1. This is here spoken of as one of their provoking sins, which would bring the judgments of God upon them, ver. 9. These evils shall come upon thee, to punish thee "for the multitude of thy sorceries, and the great abundance of thine enchantments." Witchcraft is a sin in its own nature exceeding heinous; it is giving that honour to the devil, which is due to God only; making God's enemy our guide, and the father of lies our oracle. In Babylon it was a national sin, and had the protection and countenance of the government. Conjurors, for aught appears, were their privy counsellors and prime ministers of state. And shall not God visit for these things? Observe what a multitude, what a great abundance, of sorceries and enchantments there were among them. Such a bewitching sin this was, that when it was once admitted it spread like wildfire, and they never knew any end of it. The deceived and the deceivers both increased strangely.

2. It is here spoken of as one of their vain confidences, which they relied much upon, but should be deceived in, for it would not serve so much as to give them notice of the judgments coming, much less to guard against them.

1st. They are here upbraided with the mighty pains they had taken about their sorceries and enchantments. Thou hast "laboured in them from thy youth." They trained up their young men in these studies; and those that applied themselves to them were indefatigable in their labours about them, reading books, making observations, trying experiments. Well, let them "stand up now with their enchantments," and try their skill in the critical moment. Let them make a stand, if they can, in opposition to the invading enemy. Let them stand to offer their service to their country; but to what purpose? "Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsellors" of this kind; hast advised with them all, but hast received no satisfaction from them. The different schemes they have erected, and the different judgments they have given, have but increased thy perplexity, and tired thee out. In multitude of such counsellors there is no safety.

2nd. They are upbraided with the variety they had of such kind of people among them, ver. 13. They had their astrologers, or viewers of the heavens; that did not consider them, as David, to behold the wisdom and power of God in them, but under pretence of foretelling future events by them. They viewed the heavens, and forgot Him that made them and set their dominion on the earth, Job xxxviii. 33, and hath himself dominion over them, for he rides on the heavens. They had their stargazers, who, by the motions of the stars, their conjunctions and oppositions, read the doom of states and kingdoms. They had their monthly prognosticators, their almanac makers, that told what weather it should be, or what news they should have each month. The great stock they had of these was what they valued themselves much upon; but they were all cheats, and their art a sham. I confess, I see not how the judicial astrology, which some now pretend to, by the rules of which they undertake to prophesy concerning things to come, can be distinguished from that of the Chaldeans, and therefore how it can escape the censure and contempt which this text lays that under. Yet I fear there are some who study their almanacs, and pay more regard to them and their prognostications, than to their Bibles and the prophecies there.

3rd. They are upbraided with the utter inability and insufficiency of all these pretenders to do them any kindness in the day of their distress. Let them see whether, with the help of their enchantments, they can prevail against their enemies or profit themselves, spirit their own forces or dispirit those that came against them, ver. 12. Let them see what service those can do them who make a trade of divination; let them stand up, and either by their power save thee from these evils that are coming upon thee, or by their foresight make such a discovery of them beforehand, as that thou mayest, by needful precautions, save thyself; as Elisha, by notifying to the king of Israel the motions of the Syrian army, enabled him to save himself, not once, nor twice, 2 Kin. vi. 10. This baffling of the diviners was literally fulfilled, when that night that Babylon was taken, and Belshazzar slain, all his astrologers, soothsayers and wise men, were quite nonplussed with the handwriting on the wall that pronounced the fatal sentence, Dan. v. 8.

4th. They are upbraided with the fall of the wise men themselves in the common ruin, ver. 14. They are unlikely to stand their friends in any stead who cannot secure themselves. They are as stubble at the best, worthless and useless; and they shall be as stubble before a consuming fire. The Persians, to make room for their own wise men, will cut off those of Babylon; that fire shall burn them, and they shall not deliver themselves from the power of the flame. They can expect no other but to be devoured, who, by their sins, make themselves fuel to a devouring fire. When God kindles a fire among them, it shall not be a coal to warm at, and a fire to sit before, but a coal to burn them. Or rather it notes, that they shall be utterly consumed by the judgments of God, burnt quite to ashes, and there shall not remain one live coal to do any body any service. For when God judgeth, he will overcome.

5th. They are upbraided with their merchants, and those they dealt with, ver. 15. Such as they dealt with from their youth; either, First. In a way of consultation. These astrologers that dealt in the black art they always loved to be dealing with, and they were in effect their merchants. Fortune-telling was one of the best trades in Babylon; and those that followed that trade probably lived as great, and got as much money, as the richest merchants. Yet when some of them were devoured, others run their country, every one to his quarter; and there was none to save Babylon. Miserable comforters are they all. Or, Secondly. In a way of commerce. As their astrologers failed them

The two comparisons in verse 19 must also be regarded as analogous, if not identical. For "gravel" some give "bowels," but our version may stand.

xlviii. 20. This verse commences a new paragraph or section, and is a prophetic exhortation to Israel, who is to leave Babylon with exultant recollections of the former great deliverance out of Egypt: "The Lord redeemed his servant Jacob." Having spoken of all Israel as Jacob, the style changes, and the people are spoken of in the plural.

xlix. 1. It is quite true that the word for "isles" or "islands" sometimes means maritime districts, or countries beyond the sea, and hence some render it here "distant lands." Some explain it to mean "nations" or "distant nations." J. D. Michaelis understands it of Europe and Asia Minor, while Ewald and others prefer to explain it of "coasts," and some abide by the common signification. The question is not of prime importance, as foreign parts must be meant. The word "people," as frequently happens in the common with whom they had laboured, so did their merchants; they took care to secure their own effects, and then valued not what became of Babylon. They wandered "every one to his own quarter;" each man shifted for his own safety, but none would offer to lend a helping hand, no, not to a city by which they had got so much money. Every one for himself, but few for his friends. The New Testament Babylon is lamented by the merchants that were made rich by her; but they very prudently stand afar off to lament her, Rev. xviii. 15; not willing to attempt any thing for her succour. Happy they who, by faith and prayer, deal with One that will be "a very present help in time of trouble."

CHAPTER XLVIII.

God having in the foregoing chapter reckoned with the Babylonians, and shewed them their sins, and the desolation that was coming upon them for their sins, to shew that he hates sin wherever he finds it, and will not connive at it in his own people, comes in this chapter to shew the house of Jacob their sins; but, withal, the mercy God had in store for them notwithstanding; and he therefore sets their sins in order before them, that by their repentance and reformation, they might be prepared for that mercy. I. He chargeth them with hypocrisy in that which is good, and obstinacy in that which is evil; especially in their idolatry, notwithstanding the many convincing proofs God had given them that he is God alone, ver. 1—8. II. He assures them that their deliverance would be wrought purely for the sake of God's own name, and not for any merit of theirs, ver. 9—11. III. He encourageth them to depend purely upon God's power and promise for this deliverance, ver. 12—15. IV. He shews them that, as it was by their own sin that they brought themselves into captivity, so it would be only by the grace of God that they would obtain the necessary preparations for their enlargement, ver. 16—19. V. He proclaims their release; yet with a proviso, that the wicked shall have no benefit by it, ver. 20—22.

HEAR ye this, O house of Jacob,
Which are called by the name of Israel,
And are come forth out of the waters of Judah,
Which swear by the name of the LORD,
And make mention of the God of Israel,
But not in truth, nor in righteousness.
2 For they call themselves of the holy city.
And stay themselves upon the God of Israel;
The LORD of hosts is his name.
3 I have declared the former things from the beginning;
And they went forth out of my mouth, and I shewed them;
I did them suddenly, and they came to pass
4 Because I knew that thou art obstinate,
And thy neck is an iron sinew,
And thy brow brass;
5 I have even from the beginning declared it to thee;
Before it came to pass I shewed it thee:
Lest thou shouldest say, Mine idol hath done them,
And my graven image, and my molten image, hath commanded them.
6 Thou hast heard, see all this;
And will not ye declare it?
I have shewed thee new things from this time,
Even hidden things, and thou didst not know them.
7 They are created now, and not from the beginning;
Even before the day when thou heardest them not;
Lest thou shouldest say, Behold, I knew them.
8 Yea, thou heardest not; yea, thou knewest not;
Yea, from that time that thine ear was not opened:
For I knew that thou wouldest deal very treacherously,
And wast called a transgressor from the womb.

We may observe here,

First. The hypocritical profession which many of the Jews made of religion, and relation to God. To those who made such a profession the prophet is here ordered to apply himself, for their conviction and humiliation; that they might own God's justice in what he had brought upon them. Now observe here,

1. How high their profession of religion soared. What a fair show they made in the flesh, and how far they went towards heaven; what a good livery they wore, and what a good face they put upon a very bad heart. 1st. They were the house of Jacob; they had a place and a name in the visible church; "Jacob have I loved." Jacob is God's chosen; and they are not only retainers to his family, but descendants from him. 2nd. They were "called by the name of Israel," an honourable name. They were of that people "to whom pertained both the giving of the law and the promises." Israel signifies 'a prince with God;' and they prided themselves in being of that princely race. 3rd. "They came forth out of the waters of Judah," and thence were called Jews. They were of the royal tribe, the tribe of which Shiloh was to come; the tribe that adhered to God when the rest revolted. 4th. They "sware by the name of the Lord," and thereby owned him to be the true God, and their God, and gave glory to him as the righteous Judge of all. They 'sware to the name of the Lord,' so it may be read; they took an oath of allegiance to him as their king, and joined themselves to him in covenant. 5th. They made mention of the God of Israel in their prayers and praises; they often spoke of him, observed his memorials, and pretended to be very mindful of him. 6th. They called "themselves of the holy city;" and when they were captives in Babylon, purely from a principle of honour and jealousy for their native country, they valued themselves upon their interest in it. Many that are themselves unholy are proud of their relation to the church, the holy city. 7th. They stayed "themselves upon the God of Israel," and boasted of his promises, and his covenant with them. They "leaned on the Lord," Mic. iii. 11. And if they were asked concerning their God, they could say, "The Lord of hosts is his name," the Lord of all. Happy we, therefore, and very great, that have relation to him.

2. How low their profession of religion sunk for all this. It was all in vain, for it was all a jest, it was not in truth and righteousness. Their hearts were not true nor right in these professions. Note, All our religious professions avail nothing farther than they are made in truth and righteousness. If we be not sincere in them we do but take the name of the Lord our God in vain.

Secondly. The means God used, and the method he took, to keep them close to himself, and to prevent their turning aside to idolatry. The many excellent laws he gave them, with their sanctions, and the hedges about them, it seems would not serve to restrain them from that sin which did most easily beset them; and therefore to those God added remarkable prophecies and remarkable providences in pursuance of those prophecies, which were all designed to convince them that their God was the only true God, and that it was therefore both their duty and interest to adhere to him.

1. He both dignified and favoured them with remarkable prophecies; ver. 3, "I have declared the former things from the beginning." Nothing material happened to their nation from its original, but it was prophesied of before: their bondage in Egypt, their deliverance thence, the situation of their tribes in Canaan, &c.; all these things went forth out of God's mouth, and he shewed them. Herein they were honoured above any nation, and even their curiosity gratified; their prophecies were such as they could rely upon, and such as concerned themselves and their own nation. And they were all verified by the accomplishment of them. "I did them suddenly," when they were least expected by themselves or others, and therefore could not be foreseen by any but a Divine prescience; "I did them, and they came to pass;" for what God doth he doth effectually. These very calamities they were now groaning under in Babylon God did from the beginning declare to them by Moses, as the certain consequences of their apostacy from God, Lev. xxvi. 31, &c., and Deu. xxviii. 36, &c.; xxix. 28. He also declared to them their return to God and to their own land again, Deu. xxx. 4, &c.; Lev. xxvi. 44, 45. Thus he shewed them how he would deal with them long before it came to pass. Let them compare their present state, together with the deliverance they had now in prospect, with what was written in the law, and they would find the Scripture exactly fulfilled.

2. He both dignified and favoured them with remarkable providences; ver. 6, "I have shewed thee new things from this time." Besides the general view given them from the beginning of God's proceedings with them, he shewed them new things by the prophets of their own day, and created them; they were hidden things, which they could not otherwise know, as the prophecy concerning Cyrus, and the exact time of their release out of Babylon; these things God created now. Their restoration was in effect their creation, and they had a promise of it, not from the beginning, but of late; for, to prevent their apostacy from God, or to recover them, prophecy was kept up among them. Yet it was told them when they could not come to the knowledge of it any other way than by Divine revelation. Consider, saith God, how much soever it is talked of now among you and expected, it was told you by the prophets, when it was the farthest thing in your thoughts, when you had not heard it, when you had not known it, nor had any reason to expect it, and when your ear was not opened concerning it, ver. 7, 8; when the thing seemed utterly impossible, and you would scarcely have given any one the hearing that should have told you of it. God had shewed them hidden things which were out of the reach of their knowledge, and done for them great things, out of the reach of their power; Now, saith he, ver. 6, "thou hast heard, see all this." Thou hast heard the prophecy; see the accomplishment of it, and observe whether the word and works of God do not exactly agree. "And will ye not declare it," that, as you have heard, so you have seen? Will you not own that the Lord is the true God, the only true God; that he has that knowledge and power which no creature has, and which none of the gods of the nations can pretend to? Will you not own that your God hath been a good God to you? Declare this to his honour and your own shame, who have dealt so deceitfully with him, and preferred others before him.

Thirdly. The reasons why God would take this method with them:

1. Because he would anticipate their boastings of themselves and their idols. 1st. God, by his prophets, told them beforehand of their deliverance, lest they should attribute the doing of it to their idols. Thus he saw it necessary to secure the glory of it to himself, which otherwise would have been given by some of them to their graven images; I spoke of it, saith God, "lest thou shouldest say, Mine idol hath done it," or hath commanded it to be done, ver. 5. There were those that would be apt to say so, and so would be confirmed in their idolatry by that which was intended to cure them of it. But they would now be for ever precluded from saying this, for if the idols had done it the prophets of the idols would have foretold it; but, the prophets of the Lord having foretold it, no doubt it was the power of the Lord that effected it. 2nd. God foretold it by his prophets, lest they should assume the foresight of it to themselves. Those that were not so profane as to have ascribed the thing itself to an idol, yet were so proud as to have pretended that by their own sagacity they foresaw it, if God had not been beforehand with them and spoken first: "Lest thou shouldest say, Behold, I knew them." Thus, vain men, that would be thought wise, commonly undervalue a thing which is really great and surprising, with this suggestion, that it was no more than they expected, and they knew it would come to this. To anticipate this, and that this boasting might for ever be excluded, God told them of it before the day, when as yet they dreamed not of it. God has said and done enough to prevent men's boastings of themselves, and that no flesh may glory in his presence; which, if it have not the intended effect, it will aggravate the sin and ruin of the proud, and sooner or later "every mouth shall be stopped," and "all flesh shall become silent before God."

2. Because he would leave them inexcusable in their obstinacy. Therefore he took this pains with them, because he knew they were obstinate, ver. 4. He knew they were so obstinate and perverse that, if he had not supported the doctrine of providence by prophecy, they would have had the impudence to deny it, and would have said their idol had done that which God did. He knew very well, 1st. How wilful they would be, and how fully bent they would be upon that which is evil. 'I knew that thou wast hard,' so the word is; there were prophecies as well as precepts which God gave them, because of the hardness of their hearts. "Thy neck is an iron sinew," unapt to yield, and submit to the yoke of God's commandments, unapt to turn and look back upon his dealings with thee, or look up to his displeasure against thee; not flexible to the will of God, not pliable to his intentions, not manageable by his word or providence. "Thy brow is brass," that is, thou art impudent, and canst not blush; insolent, and wilt not fear or give back, but thrust on in the way of thine heart. God useth means to bring sinners to comply with him, though he knows they are obstinate. 2nd. How deceitful they would be, and insincere in that which is good, ver. 8. God sent his prophets to them, but they did not hear, they would not know; and it was no more than was expected, considering what they had been; "Thou wast called," and not miscalled, "a transgressor from the womb." Ever since they were first formed into a people, they were translation, stands for a plural Hebrew word, meaning "peoples." As to who is the speaker, it may be observed that verse 3 shows it to be Israel, though some think it is the Messiah, who is in some sense identified with Israel. Very much has been written on the subject, but only one thing seems certain, which is, that the prediction contains Messianic elements, as is most apparent in such places as verses 6 and 7.

xlix. 5. A very different version of part of this verse appears in the margin, where for "though Israel be not gathered, yet shall," &c., we have, "that Israel may be gathered to him, and I may," &c. This is owing to a various reading, the words "not" and "to him" having the same sound (lo) in the Hebrew, although somewhat differently written. The ancient Greek, Arabic, Chaldee, and Syriac versions all have "to him," but the Latin has "not." The Jews have "not" in most copies of the text, but "to him" in the margin, as the proper reading. Critics are divided in opinion, both prone to idolatry; they brought with them out of Egypt a strange addictedness to that sin, and they were murmurers as soon as ever they began their march to Canaan; they were justly upbraided with it then, Deu. ix. 7, 24. Therefore "I knew that thou wouldest deal very treacherously." God foresaw their apostacy, and gave this reason for it, that he had always found them false and fickle, Deu. xxxi. 16, 27, 29. This is applicable to particular persons; we are all born children of disobedience, we are called transgressors from the womb, and therefore it is easy to foresee that we will deal treacherously, very treacherously. Where original sin is, actual sin will follow of course. God knows it, and yet deals not with us according to our deserts.

And for my praise will I refrain for thee,
That I cut thee not off.

The deliverance of God's people out of their captivity in Babylon was a thing upon many accounts so improbable, that there was need of line upon line for the encouragement of the faith and hope of God's people concerning it. Two things were discouraging to them: their own unworthiness that God should do it for them, and the many difficulties in the thing itself. Now in these verses both these discouragements are removed, for here is,

First. A reason why God would do it for them, though they were unworthy; not for their sake be it known to them, but for his name's sake, for his own sake, ver. 9—11.

1. It is true they had been very provoking, and God had been justly angry with them. Their captivity was the punishment of their iniquity; and if when he had them in Babylon he had left them to pine away and perish there, and made the desolations of their country perpetual, he had but dealt with them according to their sins, and it was what such a sinful people might expect from an angry God. But, saith God, "I will defer mine anger," or rather, stifle and suppress it; I will make it to appear I am slow to wrath, and will refrain from thee, not pour upon thee what I justly might, that I should cut thee off from being a people. And why will God thus stay his hand? "For my name's sake," because this people was called by his name, and made profession of his name; and if they were cut off the enemies would blaspheme his name. It is "for my praise," because it would redound to the honour of his mercy to spare and reprieve them; and if he continued them to be to him a people they might be to him for a name and a praise.

2. It is true they were very corrupt and ill-disposed, but God would himself refine them and make them fit for the mercy he intended for them; "I have refined thee," that thou mightest be made a vessel of honour. Though he doth not find them meet for his favour, he will make them so. And this accounts for his bringing them into the trouble and continuing them in it so long as he did; it was not to cut them off, but to do them good. It was to refine them, "but not as silver," or, with silver; not so thoroughly as men refine their silver, which they continue in the furnace till all the dross is separated from it. But if God should take that course with them they would be always in the furnace, for they are all dross, and as such might justly be put away, Ps. cxix. 119; as reprobate silver, Jer. vi. 30. He therefore takes them as they are, refined in part only, and not thoroughly; "I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction," that is, made thee a choice one by the good which the affliction has done thee, and then designed thee for great things. Many have been brought home to God as chosen vessels, and a good work of grace been begun in them, in the furnace of affliction. Affliction is no bar to God's choice, but subservient to his purpose.

3. It is true they could not pretend to merit at God's hand so great a favour as their deliverance out of Babylon, which would put such an honour upon them, and bring them so much joy; Therefore, saith God, "for mine own sake, even for mine own sake, will I do it," ver. 11. See how the emphasis is laid upon that, for it is a reason that cannot fail, and therefore the resolution grounded upon it cannot fall to the ground. God will do it, not because he owes them such a favour, but to save the honour of his own name, that that may not be polluted by the insolent triumphs of the heathen, who, in triumphing over Israel, thought they triumphed over the God of Israel, and imagined their gods were too hard for him. This was plainly the language of Belshazzar's revels, when he profaned the holy vessels of God's temple, at the same time when he praised his idols, Dan. v. 2; and of the Babylonians' demand, Ps. cxxxvii. 3, "Sing us one of the songs of Zion." God will therefore deliver his people, because he will not suffer his glory to be thus given to another. Moses pleaded this often with God: Lord, what will the Egyptians say? Note, God is jealous for the honour of his own name, and will not suffer the wrath of man to proceed any farther than he will make it turn to his praise. And it is matter of comfort to God's people that, whatever comes of them, God will secure his own honour, and as far as is necessary to that God will work deliverance for them.

Secondly. Here is a proof that God could do it for them, though they were unable to help themselves, and the thing seemed altogether impracticable. Let Jacob and Israel hearken to this, and believe it, and take the comfort of it. They are God's called, called according to his purpose, called by him out of Egypt, Hos. xi. 1, and now out of Babylon; a people whom, with a distinguishing favour, he calleth by name, and calls to; they are his called, for they are called to him, called by his name, and called his. And therefore he will look after them, and they may be assured that, as he will deliver them for his own sake, so he will deliver them by his own strength; they need not fear then, for,

1. He is God alone and the eternal God, ver. 12. I am he that can do what I will, and will do what is best; he whom none can compare with, much less contend with; "I am the first, I also am the last." Who can be too quick for him that is the first, or prevent him? Who can be too hard for him that is the last, and will keep the field against all opposers, and will reign till they are all made his footstool? What room, then, is left to doubt of their deliverance, when he undertakes it, whose designs cannot but be all well laid, for he is the first; and well executed, for he is the last? As for this God his work is perfect.

2. He is the God that made the world, and he that did that can do any thing, ver. 13. Look we down, we see the earth firm under us, and feel it so; it was his hand that laid the foundations of it. Look we up, we see the heavens spread up as a canopy over our heads, and it was his hand that spread them, that spanned them, that stretched them out, and did it by an exact measure, as the workman sometimes metes out his work by spans. This intimates that God hath a vast reach, and can compass designs of the greatest extent. If 'the palm of his right hand' (so the margin reads it) hath gone so far as to stretch out the heavens, what will he do with his outstretched arm? Yet this is not all; he hath not only made the heavens and the earth, and therefore he in whom our hope and help are is omnipotent, Ps. cxxiv. 8; but he hath the command of all the hosts of both. When he calls them into his service, to go on his errand, they stand up together, they come at the call, they answer to their names, Here we are, "what wilt thou have us to do?" They stand up not only in reverence to their Creator, but in a readiness to execute his orders; they stand up together unanimously, concurring and helping one another in the service of their Maker. Therefore, if God will deliver his people, he cannot be to seek for instruments to be employed in it.

3. He hath already foretold it; and, having such an infinite knowledge that he could foresee it, no doubt he has an almighty power to effect it. "All ye" of the house of Jacob, "assemble yourselves and hear" this for your comfort, which among them, among the gods of the heathen, or their wise men, hath declared these things, or could declare them? ver. 14. They had no foresight of them at all, but those who consulted them were very confident that Babylon should be a lady for ever, and Israel a perpetual slave, and their oracles did not give them the least hint to the contrary to undeceive them; whereas God, by his prophets, had given notice to the Jews long before of their captivity and the destruction of Jerusalem, as he had now likewise given them notice of their release, ver. 15. "I, even I, have spoken;" and he would not have spoken it if he could not have made it good. None could outsee him, and therefore we may be sure none could outdo him.

4. The person is pitched upon that is to be employed in this service, and the measures concerted in the Divine councils, which are unalterable. Cyrus is the man that must do it; and it tends much to strengthen our assurance that a thing shall be done when we are particularly informed how and by whom. It is not left at an uncertainty who shall do it, but the matter is fixed. 1st. It is one whom God is well pleased in upon this account, because he is designed for this service, "The Lord hath loved him," ver. 14; that is, he has done him this favour, this honour, to make him an instrument of the redemption of his people, and therein a type of the great Redeemer, God's beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased. Those God doth a great kindness to, and has a great kindness for, whom he makes serviceable to his church. 2nd. It is one whom God will give authority and commission to; "I have called him," have given him a sufficient warrant, and therefore will bear him out. 3rd. It is one whom God will, by a series of providences, lead to this service; I have brought him from a far country, brought him to engage against Babylon, brought him step by step, quite beyond his own intentions. Whom God calls he will bring, will cause them to come, (so the word is,) to come at the call. 4th. It is one whom God will own and give success to. Cyrus will do God's pleasure on Babylon; that which it is his pleasure should be done, and which he will be pleased with the doing of, though Cyrus has ends of his own to serve, and hath no regard either to the will of God, or to his favour in the doing of it. His arm, that is, Cyrus' army, and in it God's arm, shall come and be upon the Chaldeans, to bring them down, ver. 14; for if God call him and bring him he will certainly make his way prosperous, ver. 15. Then we may hope to prosper in our way when we follow a Divine call and conduct.

16 Come ye near unto me, hear ye this;
I have not spoken in secret from the beginning;
From the time that it was, there am I:
And now the Lord GOD, and his Spirit, hath sent me.
17 Thus saith the LORD,
Thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel;
I am the LORD thy God which teacheth thee to profit,
Which leadeth thee by the way that thou shouldest go.
18 O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments!
Then had thy peace been as a river,
And thy righteousness as the waves of the sea:
19 Thy seed also had been as the sand,
And the offspring of thy bowels like the gravel thereof
His name should not have been cut off nor destroyed
20 Go ye forth of Babylon, [from before me.
Flee ye from the Chaldeans, with a voice of singing Declare ye, tell this,
Utter it even to the end of the earth;
Say ye, The LORD hath redeemed his servant Jacob.
21 And they thirsted not when he led them through the deserts:
He caused the waters to flow out of the rock for them:
He clave the rock also, and the waters gushed out.
22 There is no peace, saith the LORD, unto the wicked.

as to the reading and as to the interpretation. The Jews say there are fifteen texts in all where לא (not) stands for לו (to him), the two forms having the same sound, as stated already.

xlix. 6. The margin here suggests a different translation, but one which is not based on a various reading, and is very doubtful.

xlix. 7. Instead of "to him whom man despiseth," the margin gives "to him that is despised in soul," which is more literal. The word rendered "nation" usually means "heathen," but it may mean "people" generally, whether Israelites or others. Professor Alexander says the phrase may be translated in four different ways: "whom the nation abhorreth," "who abhorreth the nation," "who excites the abhorrence of the nation," and "the nation which excites abhorrence." We have no doubt the first is correct as to sense, though the third may be more literal. The words, "kings shall see and arise, princes also shall worship," signify that kings shall see what God performs, and shall rise or stand up in honour thereof, and even princes shall

Here, as before, Jacob and Israel are summoned to nearken to the prophet speaking in God's name, or rather to God, speaking in and by the prophet, and that as a type of the great Prophet, by whom God has in these last days spoken unto us, and that is sufficient; Come ye near, therefore, and hear this. Note, Those that would hear and understand what God saith must come near and approach to him. Let them come as near as they can; let those that have hearkened to the tempter now come near and hear this, that they may be confirmed in their resolutions to serve God. Those that draw nigh to God may depend upon this, that his secret shall be with them. Here,

First. God refers them to what he had both said to them and done for them formerly, which, if they would reflect upon, they might from thence fetch great encouragement to trust in God at this time. 1. He had always spoken plainly to them, from the beginning, by Moses and all the prophets. I have not spoken in secret, but publicly, from the top of mount Sinai, and in the chief places of concourse, the solemn assemblies of their tribes. He did not deliver his oracles obscurely and ambiguously, but so as they might be understood, Hab. ii. 2. 2. He had always acted wonderfully for them; "From the time that it was," that they were first formed into a people, "there am I," there have I been, resident among them, and presiding in their affairs. He sent them prophets, raised them up judges, and frequently appeared for them; and therefore there I will be still. He that has been with his people hitherto will be to the end.

Secondly. The prophet himself, as a type of the great Prophet, asserts his own commission to deliver this message; "Now the Lord God (the same that spoke from the beginning, and did not speak in secret,) "hath by his Spirit sent me," ver. 16. The Spirit of God is here spoken of as a person, distinct from the Father and the Son, and having a Divine authority to send prophets. Note, Whom God sends the Spirit sends. Those whom God commissions for any service, the Spirit in some measure qualifies for it; and those may speak boldly, and must be heard obediently, whom God and his Spirit send. As that which the prophet saith to the same purpose with this, ch. lxi. 1, is applied to Christ, Lu. iv. 21, so may this be. The Lord God sent him, and he had the Spirit without measure.

Thirdly. God by the prophet sends them a gracious message for their support and comfort under their affliction. The preface to this message is both awful and encouraging; ver. 17, "Thus saith Jehovah," the eternal God, "thy Redeemer," that hath often been so, that hath engaged to be so, and will be faithful to the engagement, for he is the Holy One, that cannot deceive, the Holy One of Israel, that will not deceive them. The same words that introduce the law, and give authority to that, introduce the promise, and give validity to that; "I am the Lord thy God," whom thou mayest depend upon, as in relation to thee, and in covenant with thee.

1. Here is the good work God undertakes to fulfil in them. He that is their Redeemer, in order to that will be, 1st. Their instructor; "I am thy God that teacheth thee to profit," that is, teacheth thee such things as are profitable for thee, things that belong to thy peace. By this God shews himself to be a God in covenant with us, by his teaching us, Heb. viii. 10, 11, and none teacheth like him, for he gives an understanding. Whom God redeems he teacheth; whom he designs to deliver out of their afflictions he first teacheth to profit by their afflictions, makes them partakers of his holiness; for that is the profit for which he chastens us, Heb. xii. 10. 2nd. Their guide. He leads them to the way and in the way by which they should go. He not only enlightens their eyes, but directs their steps. By his grace he leads them in the way of duty, by his providence he leads them in the way of deliverance. Happy they that are under such a conduct!

2. Here is the good will God declares he had for them, by his good wishes concerning them, ver. 18, 19. He had indeed brought them into captivity, but it was long of themselves, nor did he afflict them willingly. 1st. As when he gave them his law he earnestly wished they might be obedient, ("O that there were such a heart in them," Deu. v. 29; "O that they were wise," Deu. xxxii. 29,) so, when he punished them for the breach of his law, he wished they had been obedient; "O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments," as Ps. lxxxi. 13, "O that my people had hearkened unto me!" This confirms what God hath said and sworn, that "he hath no pleasure in the death of sinners." 2nd. He assures them that if they had been obedient that would not only have prevented their captivity, but would have advanced and perpetuated their prosperity. He had abundance of good things ready to bestow upon them, if their sins had not turned them away, ch. lix. 1, 2. First. They should have been carried on in a constant, uninterrupted stream of prosperity; "Thy peace should have been as a river," thou shouldest have enjoyed a series of mercies, one continually following another, as the waters of a river, which always last. Labitur et labetur in omne volubilis ævum,—'It flows, and will for ever flow;' not like the waters of a land-flood, which are soon gone. Secondly. Their virtue and honour, and the justice of their cause, should in all cases have borne down opposition by their own strength,—as the waves of the sea, such should their righteousness have been, nothing should have stood before it; whereas now, they having been disobedient, the current of their prosperity was interrupted, and their righteousness overpowered. Thirdly. The rising generation should have been very numerous, and very prosperous; whereas they were now very few, as appears by the small number of the returning captives, Ezr. ii. 64, not so many as of one tribe when they came out of Egypt, they should have been numberless as the sand, according to the promise, Gen. xxii. 17, which they had forfeited the benefit of. "The offspring of thy bowels" had been innumerable like the gravel of the sea, if thy righteousness had been irresistible and unconquerable as the waves of the sea. Fourthly. The honour of Israel had still been unstained, untouched. His name should not have been cut off, as now it is in the land of Israel, which is either desolate, or inhabited by strangers; nor should it have been destroyed from before God. And we cannot reckon a name either of a family or of a kingdom destroyed till it is destroyed from before God, till it ceaseth to be a name in his holy place. Now God thus tells them what he would have done for them, if they had persevered in their obedience, 1*st.* That they might be the more humbled for their sins, by which they had forfeited such rich mercies. Note, This should engage us, I might say, enrage us, against sin, that it has not only lost us the good things we have enjoyed, but prevented the good things God had in store for us. It will make the misery of the disobedient the more intolerable, to think how happy they might have been. 2*nd.* That his mercy might appear the more illustrious in working deliverance and salvation for them, though they had forfeited and rendered themselves unworthy of it. Nothing but a prerogative of mercy would have saved them.

3. Here is assurance given of the great work which God designed to work for them, even their salvation out of their captivity, when he had accomplished his work in them.

1st. Here is a commission granted them to leave Babylon. God proclaimed it long before Cyrus did, that whoever would might return to his own land, ver. 20. You have a full discharge sent you, "Go ye forth out of Babylon;" the prison doors are thrown open, and the trumpet sounded proclaiming a release. Perhaps with this word, as a means, the Spirit of the Lord stirred up the spirits of those that did take the benefit of Cyrus's proclamation, Ezr. i. 5. 'Flee ye from the Chaldeans," not with an ignominious, stolen flight, as Jacob fled from Laban, but flee with a holy disdain, as scorning to stay any longer among them. Flee ye, not silently and sorrowfully, but with a voice, with a voice of singing, as they fled of old out of Egypt, Ex. xv. 1.

2nd. Here is the news of this sent to all parts. Let it be declared, let it be told, let it be uttered, make it to be heard by the most remote, by the most remiss; send the tidings of it by word of mouth, send it by writing, from city to city, from kingdom to kingdom, even to the utmost regions, "to the ends of the earth." This was a figure of the publishing of the Gospel to all the world; but that brings glad tidings which all the world is concerned in, this only that which it is fit all should take notice of, that they may be invited by it to forsake their idols, and come into the service of the God of Israel. Let them all know then, First. That those whom God owns for his are such as he has dearly bought and paid for; "The Lord hath redeemed his servant Jacob;" he has done it formerly, when he brought them out of Egypt, and now he is about to do it again. Jacob was God's servant, and therefore he redeemed him; for what had other masters to do with God's servants? Israel is God's son, therefore Pharaoh must let him go. God redeemed Jacob, and therefore it was fit he should be his servant, Ps. cxvi. 16; the bonds God had loosed tied them the faster to him. He that redeemed us has an unquestionable right to us. Secondly. That those whom God designs to bring home to himself he will take care of, that they want not for the necessary expenses of their journey. When he brought them out of Egypt, and led them through the deserts, they thirsted not, ver. 21, for in all their removes the water out of the rock followed them. Thence he caused the waters to flow; and, since rock water is the clearest and finest, "God clave the rock, and the waters gushed out;" for he can fetch in necessary supplies for his people that way that they think most unlikely. This refers to what he did for them when he brought them out of Egypt, when all this was literally true. But it should now be in effect done again in their return out of Babylon, so well provided for shall they and theirs be in their return. And God doth his work as effectually by marvellous providences as by miracles, though perhaps they be not so much taken notice of. This is applicable to those treasures of grace laid up for us in Jesus Christ, from which all good flows to us, as the water did to Israel out of the rock, for that rock is Christ.

3rd. Here is a caveat put in against the wicked that go on still in their trespasses. Let not them think to have any benefit among God's people, though in show and profession they herd themselves among them; let not them expect to come in sharers; no, ver. 22, though God's thoughts concerning the body of that people were thoughts of peace, yet those among them that were wicked, and hated to be reformed, to them there is no peace, no peace with God or their own consciences, no, no real good, whatever is pretended to. What have they to do with peace that are enemies to God? Their false prophets cried peace to them to whom it did not belong; but God tells them there shall be no peace, nor nothing like it, to the wicked. The quarrel sinners have commenced with God, if not taken up in time by repentance, will be an everlasting quarrel.

CHAPTER XLIX.

Glorious things had been spoken in the chapters before, concerning the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon; but, lest any should think when it was accomplished that it looked much greater and brighter in the prophecy than in the performance, and that the return of about forty thousand Jews in a poor condition, out of Babylon to Jerusalem, was not an event sufficiently answering the height and grandeur of the expressions used in the prophecy, he here comes to shew that the prophecy had a farther intention, and was to have its full accomplishment in a redemption that should as far outdo these expressions, as the other seemed to come short of them, even the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ; of whom not only Cyrus, that was God's servant in working the Jews' deliverance, but Isaiah too, that was God's servant in foretelling it, was a type. In this chapter we have, I. The designation of Christ, under the type of Isaiah, to his office as Mediator, ver. 1—3. II. The assurance given him of the success of his undertaking among the Gentiles, ver. 3—8. III. The redemption that should be wrought by him, and the progress of that redemption, ver. 9—12. IV. The encouragement given from hence to the afflicted church, ver. 13—17. V. The addition of many to it, and the setting up of a church among the Gentiles, ver. 18—23. VI. A ratification of the prophecy of the Jews' release out of Babylon, which was to be the figure and type of all these blessings, ver. 24—26. And if this chapter be rightly understood, we shall see ourselves to be more concerned in the prophecies relating to the Jews' deliverance out of Babylon than we thought we were.

LISTEN, O isles, unto me;
And hearken, ye people, from far;
The LORD hath called me from the womb;
From the bowels of my mother hath he made mention of my name.
2 And he hath made my mouth like a sharp sword;
In the shadow of his hand hath he hid me,
And made me a polished shaft;
In his quiver hath he hid me;
3 And said unto me, Thou art my servant,
O Israel, in whom I will be glorified.
4 Then I said, I have laboured in vain,
I have spent my strength for nought, and in vain:
Yet surely my judgment is with the LORD,
And my work with my God.
5 And now, saith the LORD
That formed me from the womb to be his servant,
To bring Jacob again to him,
Though Israel be not gathered,
Yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the LORD,
And my God shall be my strength.
6 And he said, It is a light thing that thou shouldest be
To raise up the tribes of Jacob, [my servant
And to restore the preserved of Israel:

prostrate themselves in humble adoration. The last words, "and he shall choose thee," are scarcely correct, and are better rendered "and he hath chosen thee," as critics generally admit.

xlix. 8. The words "to establish the earth" scarcely convey the exact idea, which is "to restore the land."

xlix. 10. The word translated "heat" correctly denotes the mirage, and some render it so in this verse.

xlix. 12. What country is meant by "the land of Sinim" is a question upon which much labour has been expended. The Greek understands it of Persia, the Latin of the south, with which the Chaldee agrees. Grotius thought it was the land of Sinai; Bochart that it was Sin, or Syene, in Egypt; and some that it was China. Barnes, who mentions these explanations, gives several reasons against the last. Several other explanations might be alluded to. At present it must suffice to say that the application of the words to China is maintained by the mass of great modern critics. Professor

I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, [earth.
That thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the

Here, First. An auditory is summoned together, and attention demanded. The sermon in the chapter before was directed to the house of Jacob, and the people of Israel, ver. 1, 12; but this is directed to the isles, that is, the Gentiles, for they are called the isles of the Gentiles, Gen. x. 5, and to the people from far, that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and afar off. Let these listen, ver. 1, as to a thing at a distance, which yet they were to hear with desire and attention. Note, The tidings of a Redeemer are sent to the Gentiles, and to those that lay most remote, and they are concerned to listen to them. The Gentiles listened to the Gospel, when the Jews were deaf to it.

Secondly. The great author and publisher of the redemption produced his authority from heaven, for the work he had undertaken. 1. God had appointed him, and set him apart for it; "The Lord hath called me from the womb" to this office, and made mention of my name, nominated me to be the Saviour. By an angel he called him Jesus, a Saviour, who should save his people from their sins, Mat. i. 21. Nay, from the womb of the Divine counsels, before all worlds, he was called to this service, and help was laid upon him; and he came at the call, for he said, "Lo, I come," with an eye to what was written of him in the volume of the book. This was said of some of the prophets, as types of him, Jer. i. 5. Paul was separated to the apostleship from his mother's womb, Gal. i. 15. 2. God had fitted and qualified him for the service to which he designed him. He made his mouth like a sharp sword, and made him like a polished shaft, or a bright arrow; furnished him with every thing necessary to fight God's battles against the powers of darkness, to conquer Satan, and reduce God's revolted subjects to their allegiance, by his word; that is the two-edged sword, Heb. iv. 12, which comes out of his mouth, Rev. xix. 15. The convictions of the word are the arrows that shall be sharp in the hearts of sinners, Ps. xlv. 5. 3. God had preserved him to the service for which he had reserved him; "He hath hid me in the shadow of his hand, and in his quiver;" which notes, 1st. Concealment. The Gospel of Christ, and the calling in of the Gentiles by it, was long hid from ages and generations, hid in God, Eph. iii. 5, Rom. xvi. 25; hid in the shadow of the ceremonial law, and the Old Testament types. 2nd. Protection. The house of David was the particular care of the Divine providence, because that blessing was in it. Christ in his infancy was sheltered from the rage of Herod. 4. God had owned him; had said unto him, "Thou art my servant," whom I have employed, and will succeed; thou art Israel in effect, the prince with God, that hast wrestled and prevailed, and "in whom I will be glorified." The people of God are Israel, and they are all gathered together, and summed up as it were in Christ, the great representative of all Israel, as the high priest who had the names of all the tribes on his breastplate, and in him God is and will be glorified; so he said by a voice from heaven, Jno. xii. 27, 28. Some read the words in two clauses, "Thou art my servant;" so Christ is, ch. xlii. 1; 'It is Israel in whom I will be glorified by thee;' it is the spiritual Israel, the elect, in the salvation of whom by Jesus Christ God will be glorified, and his free grace for ever admired.

Thirdly. He is assured of the good success of his undertaking; for whom God calls he will prosper. And as to this,

1. He objects the discouragement he had met with at his first setting out; ver. 4, "Then I said," with a sad heart, "I have laboured in vain." Those that were ignorant, and careless, and strangers to God, are so still. I have called, and they have refused, have stretched out my hands to a gainsaying people. This was Isaiah's complaint, but it was no more than he was told to expect, ch. vi. 9. And the same was a temptation to Jeremiah to resolve he would labour no more, Jer. xx. 9. It is the complaint of many a faithful minister, that has not loitered, but laboured, not spared, but spent his strength, and himself with it, and yet as to many it is all in vain and for nought, they will not be prevailed with to repent and believe. But here it seems to point at the obstinacy of the Jews, among whom Christ went in person preaching the Gospel of the kingdom, laboured and spent his strength, and yet the rulers and the body of the nation rejected him and his doctrine; so very few were brought in, when one would have thought none should have stood out, that he might well say, "I have laboured in vain," preached so many sermons, wrought so many miracles in vain. Let not the ministers think it strange that they are slighted, when the Master himself was

2. He comforts himself under this discouragement with this consideration, that it was the cause of God in which he was engaged, and the call of God that engaged him in it; "Yet surely my judgment is with the Lord," who is the Judge of all, "and my work with my God," whose servant I am. His comfort is, and it may be the comfort of all faithful ministers, when they see little success of their labours, 1st. That, however it be, it is a righteous cause that they are pleading, they are with God, and for God, they are on his side, and workers together with him; they like not their judgment, the rule they go by, nor their work, the business they are employed in, ever the worse for this; the unbelief of men gives them no cause to suspect the truth of their doctrine, Rom. iii. 3. 2nd. That their management of this cause, and their prosecution of this work, was known to God, and they could appeal to him concerning their sincerity, and that it was not through any neglect of theirs that they laboured in vain; "He knows the way that I take;" "my judgment is with the Lord," to determine whether I have not delivered my soul, and left the blood of them that perish on their own heads. 3rd. Though the labour be in vain as to those that are laboured with, yet not as to the labourer himself, if he be faithful. His judgment is with the Lord, who will justify him, and bear him out, though men condemn him, and run him down; and his work, that is, the reward of his work, is with his God, who will take care he shall be no loser, no, not by his lost labour. 4th. Though the judgment be not yet brought forth unto victory, nor the work to perfection, yet both are with the Lord, to carry them on, and succeed them, according to his purpose, in his own way and time.

3. He receives from God a farther answer to this objection, ver. 5, 6. He knew very well that God had set him on work, had formed him from the womb to be his servant; not only called him so early to it, ver. 1, but began so early to fit him for it, and dispose him to it. Those whom God designs to employ as his servants, he is fashioning and preparing them to be so long before, when perhaps neither themselves nor others are aware of it; it is he that formeth the spirit of man within him. Christ was to be his servant to bring Jacob again to him, that had treacherously departed from him; the seed of Jacob therefore, according to the flesh, must first be dealt with, and means used to bring them back. Christ, and the word of salvation by him, are sent to them first; nay, Christ comes in person to them only, "to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." But what if Jacob will not be brought back to God, and Israel will not be gathered? So it proved; but this is a satisfaction in that case.

1st. Christ will be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and those are truly glorious that are so in God's eyes. Though few of the Jewish nation were converted by Christ's preaching and miracles, and many of them loaded him with ignominy and disgrace, yet God put honour upon him, and made him glorious, at his baptism, in his transfiguration, spoke to him from heaven, sent angels to minister to him, made even his shameful death glorious by the many prodigies that attended it, much more in his resurrection. In his sufferings God was his strength; so that, though he met with all the discouragement imaginable, by the contempts of a people whom he had done so much to oblige, yet he did not fail, nor was discouraged; an angel was sent from heaven to strengthen him, Lu. xxii. 43. Faithful ministers, though they see not the fruit of their labours, yet they shall be accepted of God, and in that they shall be truly glorious, for his favour is our honour; and they shall be assisted to proceed and persevere in their labours notwithstanding. This weakens their hands, but their God will be their strength.

2nd. The Gospel shall be glorious in the eyes of the world. Though it be not so in the eyes of the Jews, yet it shall be entertained by the nations, ver. 6. The Messiah seemed as if he had been primarily designed to bring Jacob back, ver. 5. But he is here told that that is comparatively but a small matter; a higher orb of honour than that, and a larger sphere of usefulness, are designed him; "It is a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob" to the dignity and dominion they expect by the Messiah, "and to restore the preserved of Israel," and make them a flourishing church and state as formerly. Nay, considering what a little handful of people they are, it would be but a small matter, in comparison, for the Messiah to be the Saviour of them only; and therefore "I will give thee for a light to the Gentiles." Many great and mighty nations, by the Gospel of Christ, shall be brought to the knowledge and worship of the true God, "That thou mayest be my salvation," the author of that salvation which I have designed for lost man, and this "to the end of the earth," to nations at the greatest distance. Hence Simeon learned to call Christ a Light to lighten the Gentiles, Lu. ii. 32; and St. Paul's exposition of this text is what we ought to abide by, and it serves for a key to the context; Acts xiii. 47, "Therefore," saith he, "we turn to the Gentiles," to preach the Gospel to them; "because so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles." In this the Redeemer was truly glorious, though Israel was not gathered; the setting up of his kingdom in the Gentile world was more his honour than if he had raised up all the tribes of Jacob. This promise is in part fulfilled already, and will have a farther accomplishment, if that time be yet to come which the apostle speaks of, when "the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in." Observe, God calls it his salvation; which, some think, intimates how well pleased he was with it, how he gloried in it, and (if I may so say) how much his heart was upon it. And farther observe, that Christ is given for a light to all those to whom he is given for salvation. It is in darkness that men perish; Christ enlightens men's eyes, and so makes them holy and happy.

7 Thus saith the LORD,
The Redeemer of Israel, and his Holy One,
To him whom man despiseth, to him whom the nation [abhorreth,
To a servant of rulers,
Kings shall see and arise,
Princes also shall worship,
Because of the LORD that is faithful,
And the Holy One of Israel, and he shall choose thee.
8 Thus saith the LORD,
In an acceptable time have I heard thee,
And in a day of salvation have I helped thee:
And I will preserve thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people, [heritages;
To establish the earth, to cause to inherit the desolate
9 That thou mayest say to the prisoners, Go forth;
To them that are in darkness, Shew yourselves.
They shall feed in the ways,
And their pastures shall be in all high places.
10 They shall not hunger nor thirst;
Neither shall the heat nor sun smite them:
For he that hath mercy on them shall lead them,
Even by the springs of water shall he guide them.
11 And I will make all my mountains a way,
And my highways shall be exalted.
12 Behold, these shall come from far:
And, lo, these from the north and from the west;
And these from the land of Sinim.

In these verses we have,

First. The humiliation and exaltation of the Messiah; ver. 7, "The Lord, the Redeemer of Israel," and Israel's Holy One, that had always taken care of the Jewish church, and wrought out for them those deliverances that were typical of the great salvation, speaks here to him who was the undertaker of that salvation. And, 1. He takes notice of his humiliation, the instances of which were uncommon, nay, they were unparalleled. He was one whom man despised; ch. liii. 2, "He is despised and rejected of men." To be despised by so mean a creature, man, that is himself a worm, speaks the lowest and most contemptible condition imaginable. Man, whom he came to save, and to put honour upon, yet despised him, and put contempt upon him, so wretchedly ungrateful were his persecutors. The ignominy he underwent was not the least of his sufferings; nay, they got only made him despicable, but odious. He was "one whom the nation abhorred;" they treated him as the worst of men, and cried out, "Crucify him, crucify him." The nation did it, the Gentiles as well as Jews, and the Jews herein worse than Gentiles; for his cross was to the one a stumblingblock, and to the other foolishness. He was "a servant of rulers;" he was trampled upon, abused, scourged, and crucified as a slave. Pilate boasted of his power over him, Jno. xix. 10. This he submitted to for our salvation. 2. He promiseth him his exaltation. Honour was done him, even in the depth of his humiliation. Herod the king stood in awe of him, saying, "It is John the Baptist." Noblemen, rulers, centurions, came and kneeled to him. But this was to be more fully accomplished when kings should receive his Gospel, and submit to his yoke, and join in the worship of him, and call Alexander appeals to Manasseh ben Israel, Montanus, Calmet, Gesenius, Winer, Maurer, Hitzig, Henderson, Umbreit, Hendewerk, Knobel, and Beck. Dr. Delitzsch also says that "since the question has been so thoroughly discussed by Gesenius, most of the commentators, and also such Orientalists as Langles, Movers, and Lassen have decided in favour of this opinion." It is an interesting fact that there is in China a colony of Jews which has been there from a most remote period.

xlix. 16. "I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands" may refer to some custom like that of inscribing the names and other mementoes of friends on the hands and arms as is done at present in Egypt and other countries.

xlix. 17. The sense is, "Thy children, or citizens, hasten to return, and thy foes are equally ready to depart from thee."

xlix. 22. For "arms" the margin more literally reads "bosom." The passage refers to the modes in which children were carried. Dr.

themselves the vassals of Christ. Not that Christ values the rich more than the poor, they stand upon a level with him; but it is for the honour of his kingdom among men, when the great ones of the earth appear for him, and do homage to him. This shall be the accomplishment of God's promise, that he will give him the heathen for his inheritance; and therefore it shall be done, because of the Lord that is faithful and true to his promise. And it shall be an evidence that Christ had a commission for what he did, and that God had chosen him, and would own the choice he had made.

Secondly. The blessings he hath in store for all those to whom he is made salvation.

1. God will own him, and stand by him in his undertaking; ver. 8, "In an acceptable time have I heard thee;" that is, I will hear thee. Christ, "in the days of his flesh, offered up strong cries, and was heard," Heb. v. 7. He knew that the Father heard him always, Jno. xi. 42; heard him for himself, for though the cup might not pass from him, yet he was enabled to drink it; heard him for all that are his, and therefore he interceded for them as one having authority; "Father, I will," Jno. xvii. 24. And all our happiness results from the Son's interest in the Father, and the prevalency of his intercession, that he always heard him. And this makes the gospel time an acceptable time, welcome to us, because we are accepted of God, both reconciled and recommended to him, that God hears the Redeemer for us, Heb. vii. 25. Nor will he hear him only, but help him to get through with his undertaking. The Father was always with him at his right hand, and did not leave him when his disciples did. Violent attacks were made upon our Lord Jesus by the powers of darkness, when it was their hour, to have driven him off from his undertakings; but God promised to preserve him, and enable him to persevere in it. On that one stone was seven eyes, Zec. iii. 9. God would preserve him; that is, would preserve his interest, his kingdom amongst men, though fought against on all sides. Christ is preserved while Christianity is.

2. God will authorize him to apply to his church the benefits of the redemption he is to work out. God's preserving and helping him was to make the day of his Gospel a day of salvation, and so the apostle understands it: "behold, now is the day of salvation;" now the word of reconciliation by Christ is preached, 2 Cor. vi. 2.

1st. He shall be guarantee of the treaty of peace between God and man. "I will give thee for a covenant of the people." This we had before, ch. xlii. 6, and it is here repeated, as faithful and well worthy of all acceptation and observation. He is given for a covenant; that is, for a pledge of all the blessings of the covenant. It was in him that God was reconciling the world to himself; and he that spared not his own Son will deny us nothing. He is given for a covenant, not only as he is the Mediator of the covenant, the blessed Daysman that has laid his hand upon us both, but as he is all in all in the covenant. All the duty of the covenant is summed up in our being his; and all the privilege and happiness of the covenant is summed up in his being ours.

2nd. He shall repair the decays of the church, and build it upon a rock. He shall establish the earth, or rather the land, the land of Judah, a type of the church. He shall cause the desolate heritages to be inherited. So the cities of Judah were after the return out of captivity; and so the church, that in the last and degenerate ages of the Jewish nation had been as a country laid waste, but was again replenished by the fruits of the preaching of the Gospel.

3rd. He shall free the souls of men from the bondage of guilt and corruption, and bring them into the glorious liberty of God's children. He shall say to the prisoners, that were bound over to the justice of God, and bound under the power of Satan, "Go forth," ver. 9. Pardoning mercy is a release from the curse of the law, and renewing grace is a release from the dominion of sin; both are from Christ, and are branches of the great salvation. It is he that saith, Go forth; it is the Son that makes us free, and then we are free indeed. He saith to them that are in darkness, "Shew yourselves;" not only see, but be seen, to the glory of God, and your own comfort. When he discharged the lepers from their confinement, he said, "Go, shew yourselves to the priest." When we see the light, let our light shine.

4th. He shall provide for the comfortable passage of those whom he sets at liberty to the place of their rest and happy settlement, ver. 9—11, which refers to the provision made for the Jews returning out of their captivity, who were taken under the particular care of the Divine providence, as favourites of heaven, and now so in a special manner. But it is applicable to that conduct of Divine grace, which all God's spiritual Israel are under, from their release out of bondage, to their settlement in the heavenly Canaan. First. They shall have their charges borne, and shall be fed on free cost with food convenient. "They shall feed in the ways," as sheep; for now, as formerly, God leadeth Joseph like a flock. When God pleaseth, even highway ground shall be good ground for the sheep of his pasture to feed in. Their pastures shall not only be in the valleys, but in all high places, which commonly used to be dry and barren. Wherever God brings his people, he will take care they shall want nothing that is good for them, Ps. xxxiv. 10. And so well shall they be provided for, that "they shall not hunger nor thirst;" for what they need they shall have seasonably, before their need of it comes to any extremity. Secondly. They shall be sheltered and protected from every thing that would incommode them; "neither shall the heat nor sun smite them," for God causeth his flock to rest at noon, Cant. i. 7. And no evil thing shall befall those that put themselves under a Divine protection; they shall be enabled to bear the burthen and heat of the day. Thirdly. They shall be under God's gracious guidance; "He that hath mercy on them," in bringing them out of their captivity, "shall lead them," as he did their fathers in the wilderness, by a pillar of cloud and fire; even "by springs of water," which will be ready to them in their march, "shall he guide them;" that is, God will furnish them with suitable and seasonable comforts, not like the pools of rain water in the valley of Baca, but like the water out of the rock which followed Israel. Those who are under a Divine conduct, and follow that close, while they do so may, upon good grounds, hope for Divine comforts and cordials. The world leads its followers by broken cisterns, or brooks that fail in summer; but God leads those that are his by springs of water. And those whom God guides shall find a ready road, and all obstacles removed; ver. 11, "I will make all my mountains a way." He that in times past made the sea a way, now with as much ease will make the mountains a way, though they seemed impassable. The highway, or causeway, shall be raised, to make it both the plainer and the fairer. Note, The ways in which God leads his people he himself will be the overseer of, and will take care they be well mended, and kept in repair, as of old the ways that led to the cities of refuge. The levelling of the roads from Babylon, as it was foretold, ch. xl. 2, 3, was applied to gospel work, and so may this be. Though there be difficulties in the way to heaven which we cannot by our own strength get over, yet the grace of God shall be sufficient for us to help us over them, and to make even the mountains a way, ch. xxxv. 8.

5th. He shall bring them all together from all parts, that they may return in a body, that they may encourage one another, and be the more taken notice of. They were dispersed into several parts of the country of Babylon, as their enemies pleased, to prevent any combination among themselves; but, when God's time is come to bring them home together, one spirit shall animate them; all that lie at the greatest distance from each other, and those also that had taken shelter in other countries, shall meet them in the land of Judah, ver. 12. Here shall a party come from far, some from the north, some from the west, some from the land of Sinim, which probably is some province of Babylon, not elsewhere named in Scripture. But some make it to be a country belonging to one of the chief cities of Egypt, called Sin, of which we read, Eze. xxx. 15, 16. Now this promise was to have a farther accomplishment in the great confluence of converts to the gospel church, and its full accomplishment when God's chosen shall come from the east and from the west to sit down with the patriarchs in the kingdom of God, Mat. viii. 11.

13 Sing, O heavens; and be joyful, O earth:
And break forth into singing, O mountains:
For the LORD hath comforted his people,
And will have mercy upon his afflicted.
14 But Zion said, The LORD hath forsaken me,
And my Lord hath forgotten me.
15 Can a woman forget her sucking child, [womb?
That she should not have compassion on the son of her
Yea, they may forget,
Yet will I not forget thee.
16 Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands;
Thy walls are continually before me.
17 Thy children shall make haste;
Thy destroyers and they that made thee waste shall go forth of thee.

The scope of these verses is to shew that the return of the people of God out of their captivity, and the eternal redemption to be wrought out by Christ, which that was a type of, would be great occasions of joy to the church, and great proofs of the tender care God has of the church.

First. Nothing can furnish us with better matter for songs of praise and thanksgiving, ver. 13. Let the whole creation join with us in songs of joy, for it shares with us in the benefits of the redemption, and all they can contribute to this sacred melody is little enough in return for such inestimable favours, Ps. xcvi. 11. Let there be joy in heaven, and let the angels of God celebrate the praises of the great Redeemer; let the earth, and the mountains, particularly the great ones of the earth, be joyful, and break forth into singing, for the earnest expectation of the creatures, that waits for the glorious liberty of the children of God (Rom. viii. 19, 21,) shall now be abundantly answered. God's people are the blessings and ornaments of the world, and therefore let there be a universal joy, for God hath comforted his people that were in sorrow, and he will have mercy upon the afflicted, because of his compassion; upon his afflicted, because of his covenant.

Secondly. Nothing can furnish us with more convincing arguments to prove the most tender and affectionate concern God hath for his church, and her interests and comforts.

1. The troubles of the church have given some occasion to question God's care and concern for it; ver. 14, Zion, in distress, said, "The Lord hath forsaken me," and doth look after me no more; "my Lord hath forgotten me," and will look after me no more. See how deplorable the case of God's people may be sometimes, such as that they may seem to be forsaken and forgotten of their God, and how violent and prevalent their temptations may be at such a time. Infidels, in their presumption, say, "God hath forsaken the earth," Eze. viii. 12; and hath forgotten their sins, Ps. x. 11. Weak believers, in their despondency, are ready to say, God hath forsaken his church, and forgotten the sorrows of his people; but we have no more reason to question his promise and grace than we have to question his providence and justice. He is as sure a rewarder as he is a revenger. Away, therefore, with these distrusts and jealousies which are the bane of friendship.

2. The triumphs of the church, after her troubles, will, in due time, put the matter out of question. What God will do for Zion we are told, ver. 17, 1st. Her friends that had deserted her shall be gathered to her, and shall contribute their utmost to her assistance and comfort; "Thy children shall make haste." Converts to the faith of Christ are the children of the church; they shall join themselves to her with great readiness and cheerfulness, "and flock" into the communion of saints, "as doves to their windows." 'Thy builders shall make haste,' so some read it, that shall build up thy houses, thy walls, especially thy temple; they shall do it with expedition. Church work useth to be slow work; but when God's time is come it shall be done suddenly. 2nd. Her enemies, that had threatened and assaulted her, shall be forced to withdraw from her. "Thy destroyers, and they that made thee waste," that had made themselves masters of the country, and ravaged it, "shall go forth of thee." By Christ, the prince of this world, the great destroyer, is cast out, is dispossessed, his power broken, and his attempts quite baffled. Now by this it will appear that Zion's suggestions were altogether groundless, that God hath not forsaken her, or forgotten her, nor never will. Be assured,

First. That God hath a tender affection for his church and people, ver. 15. In answer to Zion's fears, God speaks as one concerned for his own glory; he takes himself to be reflected upon if Zion say, "The Lord has forsaken me," and he will clear himself; as one concerned also for his people's comfort, he would not have them droop and be discouraged, and give way to any uneasy thoughts. You think I have forgotten you; "Can a woman forget her sucking child?" 1*st.* It is not likely that she should. A woman, whose honour it is to be of the tender sex as well as the fair one, cannot but have compassion for a child, that, being both harmless and helpless, is a proper object of compassion. A mother especially cannot but be concerned for her own child; for it is her own, a piece of herself, and very lately one with her. A nursing mother, most of all, cannot but be tender of her sucking child; her own gorged breasts will soon put her in mind of it, if she should forget it. But, 2*nd.* It is possible "they may forget." A woman may perhaps be so unhappy as not to be able to remember her sucking child; she may be sick, and dying, and going to the land of forgetfulness; or she may be so unnatural as not to "have compassion on the son of her womb;" like those who, to conceal their shame, are the death of their children, as soon as they are their life, Lam. iv. 10; Deu. xxviii. 56; but saith God, "I will not forget thee." Note, God's compassions to his people infinitely exceed those of the tenderest parents towards their children. What are the affections of nature to those of the God of nature?

Secondly. That he hath a constant care of his church and people; ver. 16, "I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands." This doth not allude to the foolish art of palmistry, which imagines every man's fate to be engraven in

Kitto says, "In Western Asia and Egypt young children of both sexes are not carried in the arms, but sit astride upon the left shoulder of the parent, whose head they grasp to maintain their position." And again, "Sometimes, for a short distance, they are carried on the hip; and, for a longer distance, at the back. Young infants, unable to sit, are of course carried in the arms." Dr. Russell, Roberts, and others have similarly illustrated this passage.

xlix. 23. Dr. Delitzsch says, "As foster-fathers devote all their strength and care to those entrusted to them, and as nurses nourish children from the very marrow of their own life, so will kings become the shelterers of Zion, and princesses the sustainers of her growth." The dignity of the Church appears not only in the fostering care bestowed upon it by regal persons, but in the fact that these should render it the profoundest homage and reverence.

xlix. 24. "The lawful captive" is not a happy rendering. The margin has "the captivity of the just." Barnes has "the plunder of the palms of his hands, and to be legible in the lines there: but to the custom of those who tie a string upon their hands or fingers to put them in mind of things that they are afraid they shall forget, or to the wearing of signet or locket-rings, in remembrance of some dear friend. His setting them thus as a seal upon his arm denotes his setting them as a seal upon his heart, and his being ever mindful of them and their interests, Cant. viii. 6. If we bind God's laws as a sign upon our hand, (Deu. vi. 8; xi. 18,) he will engrave our interests as a sign on his hand, and will look upon that, and remember the covenant. He adds, "Thy walls shall be continually before me." Thy ruined walls, though no pleasing spectacle, shall be in my thoughts of compassion. Do Zion's friends favour her dust? Ps. cii. 14; so doth her God. Or, the plan and model of thy walls, that are to be rebuilt, are before me, and they shall certainly be built according to it. Or, thy walls; that is, thy safety, it is my continual care; so are the watchmen on thy walls. Some apply the graving of his church on the palms of his hands to the wounds in Christ's hands, when he was crucified; he will look on the marks of them, and remember those for whom he suffered and died.

18 Lift up thine eyes round about, and behold:
All these gather themselves together, and come to thee.
As I live, saith the LORD, [ornament,
Thou shalt surely clothe thee with them all, as with an
And bind them on thee, as a bride doeth.

Shall even now be too narrow by reason of the inhabitants,
And they that swallowed thee up shall be far away.
20 The children which thou shalt have, after thou hast lost the other,
Shall say again in thine ears, The place is too strait for 21 Then shalt thou say in thine heart,

Who hath begotten me these,
Seeing I have lost my children, and am desolate,
A captive, and removing to and fro? and who hath brought up these?
Behold, I was left alone; these, where had they been?
22 Thus saith the Lord GOD,
Behold, I will lift up mine hand to the Gentiles,
And set up my standard to the people:
And they shall bring thy sons in their arms,
And thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders
23 And kings shall be thy nursing fathers,
And their queens thy nursing mothers:
They shall bow down to thee with their face toward the

And thou shalt know that I am the LORD:
For they shall not be ashamed that wait for me.

Two things are here promised, which were to be in part accomplished in the reviving of the Jewish church after its return out of captivity, but more fully in the planting of the Christian church by the preaching of the Gospel of Christ; and we may take the comfort of these promises.

First. That the church shall be replenished with great numbers added to it. It was promised, ver. 17, that her children should make haste; that promise is here enlarged upon, and is made very encouraging. It is promised,

1. That multitudes shall flock to the church from all parts. Look round, and see how they gather themselves to thee, ver. 18, by a local accession to the Jewish church: they come to Jerusalem from all the adjacent countries, for that was then the centre of their unity. But, under the Gospel, it is by a spiritual accession to the mystical body of Christ, in faith and love. Those that are come to Jesus, as the Mediator of the new covenant, thereby come to mount Zion, the church of the firstborn, Heb. xii. 22, 23. Lift up thine eyes, and behold how the fields are white unto the harvest, Jno. iv. 35. Note, It is matter of joy to the church, to see a multitude of converts to Christ.

2. That such as are added to the church shall not be a burthen and blemish to her, but her strength and ornament. This part of the promise is confirmed with an oath: "As I live, saith the Lord, thou shalt surely clothe thee with them all." The addition of such numbers to the church shall complete her clothing; and when all that were chosen are effectually called, then the bride, the Lamb's wife, shall have made herself ready, shall be quite dressed, Rev. xix. 7. They shall make her to appear comely and considerable, and she shall therefore bind them on with as much care and complacency as a bride doth her ornaments. When those that are added to the church are serious, and holy, and exemplary in their conversation, they are an ornament to it.

3. That thus the country that was waste and desolate, and without an inhabitant, (ch. v. 9; vi. 11,) shall be again peopled; nay, it shall be over-peopled, ver. 19. "Thy waste and thy desolate places," that have long lain so, "and the land of thy destruction," that land of thine which was destroyed with thee, and which nobody cared for dwelling in, shall now be so full of people that there shall be no room for the inhabitants. Here is a blessing poured out, till there be not room enough to receive it, Mal. iii. 10. Not that they shall be crowded up by their enemies, or straitened for room, as Abraham and Lot were because of the Canaanites in the land; no, "they that swallowed thee up," and took possession of thy land when thy possession of it was discontinued, "shall be far away." Thy people shall be numerous, and there shall be no stranger, no enemy among them. Thus the kingdom of God among men, that had been impoverished and almost depopulated, partly by the corruptions of the Jewish church, and partly by the abominations of the Gentile world, was again peopled and enriched by the setting up of the Christian church, and the graces and glories of that.

4. That the new converts shall strangely increase and multiply. Jerusalem, after she has lost the abundance of her children by the sword, famine, and captivity, shall have a new brood growing up instead of them; children which she shall have after she has lost the other, ver. 20: as Seth, that was appointed another seed instead of Abel, and Job's children which God blessed him with, instead of those that were killed in the ruins of the house. God will repair his church's losses, and secure to himself a seed to serve him in it. It is promised to the Jews after their return, that "Jerusalem shall be full of boys and girls, playing in the streets," Zec. viii. 5. The church, after it has lost the Jews, who will be cut off by their own infidelity, yet shall have abundance of children still, more than she had when the Jews belonged to her; see Gal. iv. 27. They shall be so numerous, that, 1st. The children shall complain for want of room. They shall say, and it is a good hearing, that their numbers increase so fast, that the place is too strait for them; as the sons of the prophets complained, 2 Kin. vi. 1. But, as strait as the place is, still more shall desire to be admitted, and the church shall gladly admit them; and the inconvenient straitness of the place shall be no hindrance to either; for it will be found, whatever we think, that even when the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind, are brought in, yet still there is room, room enough for those that are in, and room for more, Lu. xiv. 21, 22. 2nd. The mother shall stand amazed at the increase of her family, ver. 21: she shall say, "Who hath begotten me these? and who has brought up these?" They come to her with all the duty, affection, and submission of children, and yet she never bore any pain for them, nor took any pains with them, but has them ready reared to her hand. This gives her a pleasing surprise; and she cannot but be astonished at it, considering what her condition had been very lately, and very long. The Jewish nation had lost her children, they were cut off; she had been desolate, without ark, and altar, and temple service, those tokens of God's espousals to them; nay, she had been a captive, and continually moving to and fro in an unsettled condition, and not likely to bring up children, either for God or herself. She was left alone, in obscurity; "This is Zion, whom no man seeketh after," left in all the solitude and sorrow of a widowed state. How then came she to be thus replenished? See here, First. That the church is not perpetually visible, but there are times when it is desolate, and left alone, and made few in number. Secondly. That yet, on the other hand, its desolations shall not be perpetual, nor will it be found too hard for God to repair them, and out of stones to raise up children unto Abraham. Thirdly. That sometimes this is done in a very surprising way, as when a nation is born at once, ch. lxvi. 8.

5. That this shall be done with the help of the Gentiles, ver. 22. The Jews were cast off, among whom it was expected that the church should be built up; but God will sow it to himself in the earth, and from thence will reap a plentiful crop, Hos. ii. 23. Observe, 1st. How the Gentiles shall be called in. God will lift up his hand to them, to invite or beckon them, having all the day stretched it out in vain to the Jews, ch. lxv. 2. Or, it notes the exerting of an almighty power, that of his Spirit and grace, to compel them to come in, that is, to make them willing; and he will set up his standard to them, that is, the preaching of the everlasting Gospel, to which they shall gather, and under which they shall lift themselves. 2nd. How they shall come. "They shall bring thy sons in their arms," that is, either, they shall assist the sons of Zion which are found among them, in their return to their own country, and shall forward them with as much tenderness as ever any parent carried a child that was weak and helpless, (God can raise up friends for returning Israelites, even among Gentiles; "The earth helped the woman," Rev. xii. 16,) or, when they come themselves, they shall bring their children, and make them thy children: compare ch. lx. 40. Dost thou ask who has begotten and brought up these? Know, that they were begotten and brought up among the Gentiles, but they are now brought into thy family. Let all that are concerned about young converts, and young beginners in religion, learn hence to deal very tenderly and carefully with them, as Christ doth with the lambs, whom he gathers with his arms, and carries in his bosom.

Secondly. That the church shall have a great and prevailing interest in the nations, ver. 23. 1. Some of the princes of the nations shall become patrons and protectors to the church; "Kings shall be thy nursing fathers," to carry thy sons in their arms, ver. 24, as Moses, Num. xi. 14; and, because women are the most proper nurses, "their queens shall be thy nursing mothers." This promise was in part fulfilled to the Jews after their return out of captivity: divers of the kings of Persia were very tender of their interests, countenanced and encouraged them, as Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes. Esther, the queen, was a nursing mother to the Jews that remained in their captivity, putting her life in her hand, to snatch the child out of the flames. The Christian church, after a long captivity, was happy in some such kings and queens as Constantine and his mother Helena, and afterwards Theodosius and others, that nursed the church with all possible care and tenderness. Whenever the sceptre of government is put into the hands of religious princes, then this promise is fulfilled. The church, in this world, is in an infant state, and it is in the power of princes and magistrates to do it a great deal of service; it is happy when they do so, when their power is a praise to them that do well. 2. Others of them, that stand it out against the church's interests, will be forced to yield, and to repent of their opposition; they shall bow down to thee, and lick the dust. The promise to the church of Philadelphia seems to be borrowed from this; Rev. iii. 9, "I will make them of the synagogue of Satan to come and worship before thy face." Or, it may be meant of the willing subjection which kings and kingdoms shall pay to Christ, the church's king, as he manifests himself in the church; Ps. lxxii. 11, "All kings shall fall down before him." And by all this it shall be made to appear, 1st. That God is the Lord, the sovereign Lord of all, against whom there is no standing out, or rising up. 2nd. That those that wait for him, in a dependence upon his promise, and a resignation to his will, shall not be made ashamed of their hope; for the vision of peace is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and shall not lie.

24 Shall the prey be taken from the mighty,
Or the lawful captive delivered?
25 But thus saith the LORD,
Even the captives of the mighty shall be taken away,
And the prey of the terrible shall be delivered:
For I will contend with him that contendeth with thee.
And I will save thy children. [flesh;
26 And I will feed them that oppress thee with their own
And they shall be drunken with their own blood, as with
And all flesh shall know [sweet wine:
That I the LORD am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer,
The mighty One of Jacob him who is without compassion." Delitzsch gives, "the captive host of the righteous." We may literally translate the whole verse, "Shall booty be taken from a mighty man, or shall the captivity (i.e., captives) of a just man be rescued?" The second clause may refer to things as well as persons, and the two clauses may practically have the same meaning; as we think they have. If so, the "just" man here is a stern or severe man, corresponding with the "terrible" or "powerful" of the next verse. The general sense is that no obstacle shall prevent the deliverance of Zion, whose oppressors shall come to utter ruin.

1. 1. This verse is variously explained. Under the Jewish law a husband could divorce his wife for certain causes, and could sell the service of his children to his creditors. Israel was in appearance divorced, and the Israelites were in forced bondage. In the next verse God signifies his ability to restore the divorced wife and the captive children, and his will to do it.

Here is, First. An objection started against the promise of the Jews' release out of their captivity in Babylon, suggesting that it was a thing not to be expected. for, ver. 14, they were a prey in the hand of the mighty; of such as were then the greatest potentates on earth, and therefore it was not likely they should be rescued by force. Yet that was not all, they were lawful captives; by the law of God, having offended, they were justly delivered into captivity; and by the law of nations, being taken in war, they were justly detained in captivity, till they should be ransomed or exchanged. Now this is spoken, either, 1. By the enemies, as justifying themselves in their refusal to let them go. They plead both might and right. Proud men think all their own they can lay their hands on, and their title good, if they have but the longest sword. 2. Or by their friends: either in a way of distrust, despairing of the deliverance, (for who is able to deal with those that detain us, either by force of arms or a treaty of peace?) or in a way of thankfulness, admiring the deliverance; who would have thought that ever the prey should "be taken from the mighty?" yet it is done. This is applicable to our redemption by Christ: As to Satan, we were a prey in the hand of the mighty, and yet delivered, even from him that had the power of death, by him that had the power of life. As to the justice of God, we were lawful captives, and yet delivered by a price of inestimable value.

Secondly. This objection answered by an express promise, and a farther promise; for God's promises being all yea and amen, they may well serve to corroborate one another. 1. Here is an express promise, with a non obstante,—'notwithstanding,' to the strength of the enemy, ver. 25. "Even the captives of the mighty," though they are mighty, "shall be taken away," and it is to no purpose for them to oppose it, "and the prey of the terrible," though they are terrible, "shall be delivered;" and as they cannot with all their strength outforce, so they cannot with all their impudence outface, the deliverance, and the counsels of God concerning it. The Lord saith thus, who, having all power in his hands, and all hearts, is able to make his words good. 2. Here is a farther promise, shewing how and in what way God will bring about the deliverance. He will bring judgments upon the oppressors, and so will work salvation for the oppressed. "I will contend with him that contendeth with thee," will plead thy cause against those that justify themselves in oppressing thee; whoever it be, though but a single person, that contendeth with thee, he shall know that it is at his peril; and thus "I will save thy children." The captives shall be delivered by leading captivity captive, that is, sending those into captivity that had held God's people captive, Rev. xiii. 10. Nay, they shall have blood for blood, ver. 26; "I will feed them that oppress thee with their own flesh," and "they shall be drunken with their own blood;" that is, the proud Babylonians shall become not only an easy but an acceptable prey to one another; God will send a dividing spirit among them, and their ruin, which was begun by a foreign invasion, shall be completed by their intestine divisions. They shall bite and devour one another, till they are consumed one of another. They shall greedily, and with delight, prey upon those that are their own flesh and blood. God can make the oppressors of his church to be their own tormentors, and their own destroyers. The New-Testament Babylon having made herself drunk with the blood of the saints, shall have blood given her to drink, for she is worthy. See how cruel men sometimes are to themselves, to one another; and those that are so to others, are so to themselves, for God's justice and men's revenge will mete to them what they have measured to others; they not only thirst after blood, but drink it so greedily that they are drunken with it, and with as much pleasure as if it were sweet wine. If God had not more mercy on sinners than they would have one upon another were their passions let loose, the world would be soon an Aceldama, nay, a desolation.

Thirdly. See what will be the effect of Babylon's ruin: "All flesh shall know that I the Lord am thy Saviour." God will make it to appear to the conviction of all the world that, though Israel seem lost and cast off, they have a Redeemer; and though they are made a prey to the mighty, Jacob hath a mighty One, that is able to deal with all his enemies. God intends, by the deliverances of his church, both to notify and to magnify his own name.

CHAPTER L.

In this chapter, I. Those to whom God sends are justly charged with bringing all the troubles they were in upon themselves, by their own wilfulness and obstinacy; it being made to appear that God was able and ready to help them, if they had been fit for deliverance, ver. 1—3. II. He by whom God sends produceth his commission, ver. 4; allegeth his own readiness to submit to all the services and sufferings he was called to in the execution of it, ver. 5, 6; and assures himself that God who sent him would stand by him, and bear him out against all opposition, ver. 7—9. III. The message that is sent is life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse; comfort to desponding saints, and terror to presuming sinners, ver. 10, 11. Now all this seems to have a double reference: 1. To the unbelieving Jews in Babylon, who quarrelled with God for his dealings with them; and to the prophet Isaiah, who, though dead long before the captivity, yet, prophesying so plainly and fully of it, saw fit to produce his credentials, to justify what he had said. 2. To the unbelieving Jews in our Saviour's time, whose own fault it was that they were rejected; Christ having preached much to them, and suffered much from them, and being herein borne up by a Divine power. The contents of this chapter in our Bibles give this sense of it very concisely, thus: Christ shews, that the dereliction of the Jews is not to be imputed to him, by his ability to save, by his obedience in that work, and by his confidence in Divine assistance; and concludes with an exhortation to trust in God, and not in ourselves.

THUS saith the LORD,
Where is the bill of your mother's divorcement,
Whom I have put away?
Or which of my creditors is it to whom I have sold you?
Behold, for your iniquities have ye sold yourselves,
And for your transgressions is your mother put away.
2 Wherefore, when I came, was there no man?
When I called, was there none to answer?
Is my hand shortened at all, that it cannot redeem?
Or have I no power to deliver?
Behold, at my rebuke I dry up the sea,
I make the rivers a wilderness:
Their fish stinketh, because there is no water,
And dieth for thirst.
3 I clothe the heavens with blackness,
And I make sackcloth their covering

Those who have professed to be the people of God, and yet seem to be dealt severely with, are apt to complain of God, and to lay the fault upon him, as if he had been hard with them. But in answer to their murmurings, we have here,

First. A challenge given them to prove, or produce any evidence, that the quarrel began on God's side, ver. 1. They could not say that he had done them any wrong, or had acted arbitrarily. 1. He had been a husband to them; and husbands were then allowed a power to put away their wives upon any little disgust; if they found not favour in their eyes, they made nothing of giving them a bill of divorce, Deu. xxiv. 1; Mat. xix. 7. But they could not say that God had dealt so with them. It is true, they were now separated from him, and had abode many days without ephod, altar, or sacrifice; but whose fault was that? They could not say that God had given their mother a bill of divorce; let them produce it if they can; for a bill of divorce was given into the hand of her that was divorced. 2. He had been a father to them; and fathers had then a power to sell their children for slaves to their creditors, in satisfaction for the debts they were not otherwise able to pay. Now it was true, that the Jews were sold, to the Babylonians then, and afterwards to the Romans; but did God sell them for payment of his debts? No, he was not indebted to any of those to whom they were sold; or, if he had, he did not increase his wealth by their price, Ps. xliv. 12. When God chastens his children, it is neither for his pleasure, Heb. xii. 10, nor for his profit. All that are saved are saved by a prerogative of grace; but those that perish are cut off by an act of Divine holiness and justice, not of absolute sovereignty.

Secondly. A charge exhibited against them, shewing that they were themselves the authors of their own ruin. "Behold, for your iniquities," for the pleasure of them, and the gratification of your own base lusts, "you have sold yourselves;" for your iniquities you are sold; not as children are sold by their parents, to pay their debts, but as malefactors are sold by the judges, to punish them for their crimes. You sold yourselves to work wickedness, and therefore God justly sold you into the hands of your enemies, 2 Chr. xii. 5, 8. It is "for your transgressions that your mother is put away," for her whoredoms and adulteries, which were always allowed to be a just cause of divorce. The Jews were sent into Babylon for their idolatry, a sin which broke the marriage covenant, and were at last rejected for crucifying the Lord of glory; these were the iniquities for which they were sold, and put away.

Thirdly. The confirmation of this challenge and this charge.

1. It is plain it was long of themselves that they were cast off, for God came and offered them his favour, offered them his helping hand, either to prevent their trouble or to deliver them out of it, but they slighted him and all the tenders of his grace. Do you lay it upon me? saith God; tell me, then, wherefore when I came there was no man to meet me, when I called there was none to answer me? ver. 2. God came to them by his servants the prophets, demanding the fruits of his vineyard, Mat. xxi. 34; sent them his messengers, rising up betimes and sending them, Jer. xxxv. 15; called them to leave their sins, and so prevent their own ruin: but there was no man, or next to none, that had any regard to the warnings which the prophets gave them, none that answered the calls of God, or complied with the messages he sent them; and this was it for which they were sold and put away, because they mocked the messengers of the Lord, therefore God "brought upon them the king of the Chaldees," 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16, 17. Last of all he sent unto them his Son; he "came to his own, but his own received him not;" he called them to himself, but there were none that answered; he would have gathered Jerusalem's children together, but they would not; they knew not, because they would not know, the things that belonged to their peace, nor the day of their visitation, and for that transgression it was that they were put away, and their house left desolate, Mat. xxi. 41; xxiii. 37, 38; Lu. xix. 41, 42. When God calls men to happiness, and they will not answer, they are justly left to be miserable.

2. It is plain it was not long of God, for he is almighty, and could have recovered them from so great a death; not long of Christ, for he is able to save to the uttermost. The unbelieving Jews in Babylon thought they were not delivered, because their God was not able to do it; and those in Christ's time were ready to ask in scorn, Can this man save us, for himself he cannot save? But, saith God, "Is my hand shortened at all?" Or is it weakened? Can any limits be set to omnipotence? Cannot he redeem who is the great Redeemer? or hath he no power to deliver whose all power is? To put to silence, and for ever to put to shame, their doubts concerning his power, he here gives unquestionable proofs of it. 1st. He can, when he pleaseth, dry up the seas, and "make the rivers a wilderness;" he did so for Israel, when he redeemed them out of Egypt; he can do so again for their redemption out of Babylon. It is done at his rebuke, as easily as with a word's speaking; he can so dry up the rivers as to leave the fish to die for want of water, and to putrefy. When God turned the waters of Egypt into blood he slew the fish, Ps. cv. 24. The expression our Saviour sometimes used concerning the power of faith, that it will remove mountains and plant sycamores in the sea, is not unlike this; if their faith could do that, no doubt their faith would save them, and therefore they were inexcusable if they perished in unbelief. 2nd. He can, when he pleaseth, eclipse the light of heaven, clothe them with blackness, and make sackcloth their covering, by thick and dark clouds interposing, which he balanceth, Job xxxvi. 32; xxxvii. 16.

4 The Lord GOD hath given me the tongue of the learned,
That I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary:
He wakeneth morning by morning,
He wakeneth mine ear
To hear as the learned.
5 The Lord GOD hath opened mine ear,
And I was not rebellious,
Neither turned away back.
6 I gave my back to the smiters,
And my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair:
I hid not my face from shame and spitting.
7 For the Lord GOD will help me;
Therefore shall I not be confounded:
Therefore have I set my face like a flint,
And I know that I shall not be ashamed.
8 He is near that justifieth me;

l. 4. A new phase is here given to the language, and the actual deliverer is the speaker. This speaker is the servant of the Lord, as the Messiah is sometimes called. The idea that Isaiah is himself intended is quite incapable of defence, and consequently the great mass of interpreters understand it of the Messiah. But what follows is clearly applicable to the Messiah only, in his character as the Son of God in a human condition, taught of the Lord, and the teacher of men, suffering, and yet redeeming. For "to speak a word in season to him that is weary" we must rather put "to strengthen with words him that is wearied."

l. 8, 9. These verses naturally remind us of St. Paul's similar language in Rom. viii. 33, 34, where, however, the application is different.

l. 10, 11. God promises help to those who trust in him when they walk in darkness, and menaces with grief those who kindle a light for themselves in the spirit of self-sufficiency. Men who try to save themselves will utterly fail.

Who will contend with me? let us stand together:
Who is mine adversary? let him come near to me.
9 Behold, the Lord GOD will help me;
Who is he that shall condemn me?
Lo, they all shall wax old as a garment;
The moth shall eat them up.

Our Lord Jesus, having proved himself able to save, here shews himself as willing as he is able. We suppose the prophet Isaiah to say something of himself in these verses, engaging and encouraging himself to go on in his work as a prophet, notwithstanding the many hardships he met with, not doubting but that God would stand by him and strengthen him. But, like David, often he speaks of himself as a type of Christ, who is here prophesied of, and promised to be the Saviour.

First. As an acceptable preacher, ver. 4. Isaiah, as a prophet, was qualified for the work to which he was called; so were the rest of God's prophets, and others whom he employed as his messengers; but Christ was anointed with the Spirit above his fellows. To make the man of God perfect he hath, 1. "The tongue of the learned," to know how to give instruction, "how to speak a word in season to him that is weary." God, who made man's mouth, gave Moses the tongue of the learned to speak for the terror and conviction of Pharaoh, Ex. iv. 11, 12. He gave to Christ the tongue of the learned, to speak a word in season for the comfort of those that are weary and heavy laden under the burthen of sin, Mat. xi. 28. Grace was poured into his lips, and they are said to drop sweet-smelling myrrh. See what is the best learning of a minister, to know how to comfort troubled consciences, and to speak pertinently, and properly, and plainly, to the various cases of poor souls. An ability to do this is God's gift, and it is one of the best gifts, which we should covet earnestly. And let us repose ourselves in the many comfortable words which Christ hath spoken to the weary. 2. The ear of the learned to receive instruction. And this prophets have as much need of as of the tongue of the learned; for they must deliver what they are taught, and no other; must hear the word from God's mouth diligently and attentively, that they may speak it exactly, Eze. iii. 17. Christ himself received that he might give. None must undertake to be teachers that have not first been learners; Christ's apostles were first disciples, "scribes instructed unto the kingdom of heaven," Mat. xiii. 42. Nor is it enough to hear, but we must hear as the learned, hear and understand, hear and remember, hear as those that would learn by what we hear. Those that would hear as the learned must be awake, and wakeful, for we are naturally drowsy and sleepy, and unapt to hear at all, or hear by the halves, hear and do not heed. Our ears need to be awakened; we need to have something said to rouse us, to awaken us out of our spiritual slumbers, that we may hear as for our lives. We need to be awakened "morning by morning," as duly as the day returns, to be awakened to do the work of the day in its day. Our case calls for continual fresh supplies of Divine grace to free us from the dulness we contract daily. The morning, when our spirits are most lively, is a proper time for communion with God; then we are in the best frame both to speak to him,—"My voice shalt thou hear in the morning;" and to hear from him,—the people came early in the morning to hear Christ in the temple, Lu. xxi. 38; for it seems his were morning lectures, and it is God that awakens us morning by morning. Those that do any thing to purpose in his service, it is he that, as their Master, calls them up; and we should doze perpetually if he did not awaken us morning by morning.

Secondly. As a patient sufferer, ver. 5, 6. One would think he that was commissioned and qualified to speak comfort to the weary should meet with no difficulty in his work, but a universal acceptance; but it is quite otherwise: he hath both hard work to do and hard usage to undergo; and here he tells us with what undaunted constancy he went through with it. We have no reason to question but that the prophet Isaiah went on resolutely in the work to which God had called him, though we read not of his undergoing any such hardships as are here supposed; but we are sure it was abundantly verified in Jesus Christ. And here we have,

1. His patient obedience in his doing-work. "The Lord God hath" not only awakened my ear to hear what he saith, but hath "opened my ear" to receive it and comply with it; Ps. xl. 6, 7, "Mine ears hast thou opened;—then said I, Lo, I come:" for when he adds, "I was not rebellious, neither turned away back," more is implied than expressed: that he was willing; that though he foresaw a great deal of difficulty and discouragement, though he was to take pains and give constant attendance as a servant, though he was to empty himself of that which was very great and humble himself to that which was very mean, yet he did not fly off, did not fail, nor was discouraged. He continued very free and very forward to his work, even when he came to the hardest part of it. Note, As a good understanding in the truths of God, so a good-will and affection to the work and service of God, is from the grace of God.

2. His obedient patience in his suffering-work. I call it obedient patience, because he was patient with an eye to his Father's will, thus pleading with himself, "This commandment have I received of my Father;" and thus submitting to God, "Not as I will, but as thou wilt." In this submission he resigned himself, 1. To be scourged; "I gave my back to the smiters;" and that not only by submitting to it when he was smitten, but by permitting it, or admitting it rather, among other the instances of pain and shame he would voluntarily undergo for us. 2. To be buffeted; "I gave my cheeks to them that" not only smote them, but "plucked off the hair" of the beard, which was a greater degree both of pain and ignominy. 3. To be spit upon; "I hid not my face from shame and spitting." He could have hid his face from it, could have avoided it, but he would not, because he was made a reproach of men, and thus he would answer the type of Job, that man of sorrows, of whom it is said that they smote him upon the cheek reproachfully, Job xvi. 10, and spared not to spit in his face, Job xxx. 10, which is an expression not only of contempt, but of abhorrence and indignation. All this Christ underwent for us, and voluntarily, to convince us of his willingness to save us.

Thirdly. As a courageous champion, ver. 7—9. The Redeemer is as famous for his boldness as for his humility and patience; and, though he yield, yet he is more than a conqueror. Observe,

1. The dependence he hath upon God. What was the prophet Isaiah's support was the support of Christ himself, ver. 7, "The Lord God will help me;" and again, ver. 9. Whom God employs he will assist, and will take care they want not any help that they or their work call for. God, having laid help upon his Son for us, gave help to him, and his hand was all along with the man of his right hand. Nor will he only assist him in his work, but accept of him; ver. 8, "He is near that justifieth me." Isaiah, no doubt, was falsely accused, and loaded with reproach and calumny, as other prophets were; but he despised it, knowing that God would roll away the reproach, and bring forth his righteousness as the light; perhaps in this world, Ps. xxxvii. 6; however in the great day, when there will be a resurrection of names as well as bodies, and the righteous shall shine forth as the morning sun. And so it was verified in Christ. By his resurrection he was proved to be not the man that he was represented, not a blasphemer, not a deceiver, not an enemy to Cæsar; the judge that condemned him owned he found no fault in him; the centurion, or sheriff, that had charge of his execution, declared him a righteous man; so near was he that justified him. But it was true of him in a farther and more peculiar sense: the Father justified him when he accepted the satisfaction he made for the sin of man, and constituted him the Lord our righteousness, who was made sin for us; he was "justified in the Spirit," 1 Tim. iii. 16. He was near that did it; for his resurrection, by which he was justified, came presently after he was condemned and crucified; he was straightway glorified, Jno. xiii. 32.

2. The confidence he thereupon hath of success in his undertaking. If "God will help me," if he will justify me, will stand by me and bear me out, "I shall not be confounded," as those are that come short of the end they aimed at, and the satisfaction they promised themselves; "I know that I shall not be ashamed." Though his enemies did all they could to put him to shame, yet he kept his ground, he kept his countenance, and was not ashamed of the work he had undertaken. Note, Work for God is work that we should not be ashamed of, and hope in God is hope that we shall not be ashamed of. Those that trust in God for help shall not be disappointed; they know whom they have trusted, and therefore know they shall not be ashamed.

3. The defiance which, in this confidence, he bids to all opposers and opposition. God will help me, and "therefore have I set my face like a flint." The prophet did so; he was bold in reproving sin and warning sinners, Eze. iii. 8, 9, and in asserting the truth of his predictions. Christ did so; he went on in his work as Mediator with an unshaken constancy and undaunted resolution; he did not fail, nor was discouraged; and here he challengeth all his opposers, 1st. To enter the lists with him; "Who will contend with me," either in law or by the sword? "Let us stand together" as combatants, or as the plaintiff and defendant. "Who is mine adversary?" Who is the master of my cause? so the word is. Who will pretend to enter an action against me? let him appear, and "come near to me," for I will not abscond. Many offered to dispute with Christ, but he put them to silence. The prophet speaks this in the name of all faithful ministers; those who keep close to the pure word of God in delivering their message need not fear the contradiction that may be given them; the Scriptures will bear them out, whoever contends with them. Great is the truth, and will prevail. Christ speaks this in the name of all believers, speaks it as their champion. Who dares be an enemy to those whom he is a friend to, or contend with those for whom he is an advocate? Thus St. Paul applies it, Rom. viii. 33, "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?" 2nd. He challengeth them to prove any crime upon him, ver. 9, "Who is he that shall condemn me?" The prophet, perhaps, was condemned to die; Christ, we are sure, was; and yet both could say, Who is he that shall condemn? for there is no condemnation to those whom God justifies. There were those that did condemn them, but what came of them? "They shall all wax old as a garment." The righteous cause of Christ and his prophets shall outlive all opposition. The moth shall eat them up silently and insensibly; a little thing will serve to do their business; but the roaring lion himself shall not prevail against God's witnesses. All believers are enabled to make this challenge, Who is he that shall condemn? It is Christ that died.

10 Who is among you that feareth the LORD,
That obeyeth the voice of his servant,
That walketh in darkness, and hath no light?
Let him trust in the name of the LORD,
And stay upon his God.
11 Behold, all ye that kindle a fire,
That compass yourselves about with sparks:
Walk in the light of your fire,
And in the sparks that ye have kindled.
This shall ye have of mine hand; ye shall lie down in sorrow.

The prophet having the tongue of the learned given him, that he might give to every one their portion, here makes use of it, rightly dividing the word of truth. It is the summary of the Gospel; "He that believes shall be saved," that trusts in the name of the Lord shall be comforted, though for a while he walk in darkness, and have no light; but "he that believes not shall be damned," though for a while he walk in the light of his own fire, yet he shall lie down in sorrow.

First. Comfort is here spoken to disconsolate saints, and they are encouraged to trust in God's grace, ver. 10. Where observe,

1. What is always the character of a child of God. He is one that fears the Lord with a filial fear, that stands in awe of his majesty, and is afraid of incurring his displeasure. This is a grace that usually appears most in good people then when they walk in darkness, when other graces appear not. They then tremble at his word, ch. lxvi. 2, and are afraid of his judgments, Ps. cxix. 120. He is one that "obeyeth the voice of his servant," that is, is willing to be ruled by the Lord Jesus, as God's servant, in the great work of man's redemption; one that yields a sincere obedience to the law of Christ, and cheerfully comes up to the terms of his covenant. Those that truly fear God will obey the voice of Christ.

2. What is sometimes the case of a child of God. It is supposed that, though he has in his heart the fear of God and faith in Christ, yet for a time he "walketh in darkness, and hath no light," is disquieted, and hath little or no comfort. Who is there that doth so? which intimates that it is a case that sometimes happens among the professors of religion, yet not very often; but whenever it happens God takes notice of it. It is no new thing for the children and heirs of light sometimes to walk in darkness, and for a time not to have any glimpse or gleam of light. It is not meant so much of the comforts of this life; those that fear God, when they have never so great an abundance of them, do not walk in them as their light; as of their spiritual comforts, which relate to their souls. They walk in darkness when their evidences for heaven are clouded; their joy in God is interrupted, the testimony of the Spirit is suspended, and the light of God's countenance eclipsed. Serious Christians are apt to be melancholy ones, and those who fear always to fear too much.

3. What is likely to be an effectual cure in this sad case. He that is thus in the dark, 1st. "Let him trust in the name of the Lord," in the goodness of his nature, and that which he has made known of himself and his own wisdom, power, and goodness; the name of the Lord is a strong tower, let him run into that. Let him depend upon it that if he walk before God, which any man may do, though he walk in the dark, he shall find God all-sufficient to him. 2nd. Let him stay himself upon his God, his in covenant; let him keep hold of li. 2. "I called him alone" signifies when he was alone, or before there was any one of his descendants born.

li. 4. Instead of "my people" and "my nation," a few Hebrew manuscripts have the plural, "O peoples," and "O nations." The word "people" at the end of the verse is "peoples" in ordinary copies, and should have been translated as a plural. This remark applies to the word rendered "people" in the next verse, where Gentiles seem to be meant, as they certainly are in the second clause li. 6. The words "in like manner" are by some good authorities explained to signify "like a gnat." So Gesenius and others.

li. 8. The "moth" and the "worm" here mentioned may denote the same insect in its winged and caterpillar forms.

li. 9. Rahab is a name sometimes given to Egypt. The so-called "dragon" is perhaps a crocodile, and here a symbol of Egypt.

li. 14. We may translate this, "The oppressed one hastens to be set free, and he shall not die in the pit, and his bread shall not fail."

his covenant-relation to God, and call God his God for all this; as Christ on the cross, "My God, my God." Let him stay himself upon the promises of the covenant, and build his hopes on them. When a child of God is ready to sink, he will find enough in God to stay himself upon; let him trust in Christ, for God's "name is in him," Ex. xxiii. 21; trust in that name of his, "The Lord our righteousness," and stay himself upon God as his God, in and through a Mediator.

Secondly. Conviction is here spoken to presuming sinners, and they are warned not to trust in themselves, ver. 11. Observe, 1. The description given of them. They kindle a fire, and walk in the light of that fire; they depend upon their own righteousness, offer all their sacrifices, and burn all their incense, with that fire, as Nadab and Abihu, and not with the fire from heaven. In their hope of acceptance with God they have no regard to the righteousness of Christ; they refresh and please themselves with a conceit of their own merit and sufficiency, and warm themselves with that, it is both light and heat to them; they compass themselves about with sparks of their own kindling. As they trust in their own righteousness, and not in the righteousness of Christ, so they place their happiness in their worldly possessions and enjoyments, and not in the favour of God. Creature comforts are as sparks, shortlived, and soon gone; yet the children of this world, while they last, warm themselves by them, and walk with pride and pleasure in the light of them. 2. The doom passed upon them. They are ironically bidden to walk in the light of their own fire; Make your best of it while it lasts. But what will be in the end thereof? what will it come to at last? "This shall ye have of mine hand," saith Christ, for to him the judgment is committed, "Ye shall lie down in sorrow," shall go to bed in the dark: see Job xviii. 5, 6, "His candle shall be put out with him." Those that make the world their comfort, and their own righteousness their confidence, will certainly meet with a fatal disappointment, which will be bitterness in the end. A godly man's way may be melancholy, but his end shall be peace and everlasting light; a wicked man's way may be pleasant, but his end and endless abode will be utter darkness.

CHAPTER LI.

This chapter is designed for the comfort and encouragement of those that fear God and keep his commandments, even then when they walk in darkness and have no light. Whether it was intended primarily for the support of the captives in Babylon, is not certain, probably it was; but comforts thus generally expressed ought not to be so confined. Whenever the church of God is in distress, her friends and well-wishers may comfort themselves and one another with these words here, I. That God, who raised his church at first out of nothing, will take care it shall not perish, ver. 1—3. II. That the righteousness and salvation he designs for his church are sure and near, very near, and very sure, ver. 4—6. III. That the persecutors of the church are weak and dying creatures, ver. 7, 8. IV. That the same power which did wonders for the church formerly is now engaged and employed for her protection and deliverance, ver. 9—11. V. That God himself, the maker of the world, had undertaken both to deliver his people out of their distress and to comfort them under it, and sent his prophet to assure them of it, ver. 12—16. VI. That, as deplorable as the condition of the church now was, ver. 17—20, to the same woful circumstances her persecutors and oppressors should shortly be reduced, and worse, ver. 20—23. The first three paragraphs of this chapter begin with, "Hearken unto me," and they are God's people that are all along called to hearken; for, even when comforts are spoken to them, sometimes they hearken not, through anguish of spirit, Ex. vi. 9; therefore they are again and again called to hearken, ver. 1, 4, 7. The two other paragraphs of this chapter begin with, "Awake, awake." In the former, ver. 9, God's people call upon him to awake and help them: in the latter, ver. 17, God calls upon them to awake and help themselves.

HEARKEN to me, ye that follow after righteousness,
Ye that seek the LORD:
Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn,
And to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged.
2 Look unto Abraham your father,
And unto Sarah that bare you:
For I called him alone,
And blessed him, and increased him
3 For the LORD shall comfort Zion:
He will comfort all her waste places;
And he will make her wilderness like Eden,
And her desert like the garden of the LORD;
Joy and gladness shall be found therein,
Thanksgiving, and the voice of melody.

Observe, First. How the people of God are here described, to whom the word of this consolation is sent, and who are called upon to hearken to it, ver. 1. They are such as "follow after righteousness," that are very solicitous and very desirous both to be justified and to be sanctified, are pressing hard after this, to have the favour of God restored to them and the image of God renewed on them. These are they that seek the Lord, for it is only in the way of righteousness that we can seek him with any hopes of finding him.

Secondly. How they are here directed to look back to their original, and the smallness of their beginning. "Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn;" the idolatrous family in Ur of the Chaldees, out of which Abraham was taken, the generation of slaves which the heads and fathers of their tribes were in Egypt: "look unto the hole of the pit out of which ye are digged," as clay, when God formed you into a people. Note, It is good for those that are privileged by a new birth to consider what they were by their first birth; how they were conceived in iniquity and shapen in sin. That which is born of the flesh is flesh. How hard was that rock out of which we were hewn, unapt to receive impressions; and how dirty the hole of the pit out of which we were digged! The consideration hereof should fill us with low thoughts of ourselves, and high thoughts of Divine grace. Those that are now advanced would do well to remember how low they began; ver. 2, "Look unto Abraham your father," the father of all the faithful, of all that follow after the righteousness of faith, as he did, Rom. iv. 11. "And unto Sarah that bare you," and whose daughters you all are as long as you do well; think how Abraham was called alone, and yet was blessed and multiplied; and let that encourage all believers to depend upon the promise of God, even then when a sentence of death seems to be upon all the means that lead to the performance of it. Particularly let it encourage the captives in Babylon, though they are reduced to a small number, and few of them left, to hope that yet they shall increase so as to replenish their own land again. When Jacob is very small, yet he is not so small as Abraham was, who yet became father of many nations. "Look unto Abraham," and see what he got by trusting in the promise of God, and take example by him to follow God with an implicit faith.

Thirdly. How they are here assured that their present seedness of tears should end in a harvest of joys at length, ver. 3. The church of God on earth, even the gospel Zion, hath sometimes had her desert and waste places; many parts of the church, either through corruption or persecution, made like wildernesses, unfruitful to God or uncomfortable to the inhabitants; but God will find out a time and way to comfort Zion; not only by speaking comfortably to her, but by acting graciously for her. God has comforts in store even for the waste places of his church, for those parts of it that seem not regarded or valued. 1. He will make them fruitful, and so give them cause to rejoice; her wildernesses shall put on a new face, and look pleasant as Eden, and abound in all good fruits as the garden of the Lord. Note, It is the greatest comfort of the church to be made serviceable to the glory of God, and to be as his garden in which he delights. 2. He will make them cheerful, and so give them hearts to rejoice. With the fruits of righteousness, "joy and gladness shall be found therein;" for the more holiness men have, and the more good they do, the more gladness they have. And where there is joy and gladness to their satisfaction, it is fit there should be thanksgiving to God's honour; for whatever is the matter of our rejoicing ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving; and the returns of God's favour ought to be celebrated with the voice of melody; which will be the more melodious when God gives songs in the night, songs in the desert.

4 Hearken unto me, my people;
And give ear unto me, O my nation:
For a law shall proceed from me, [people.
And I will make my judgment to rest for a light of the 5 My righteousness is near; my salvation is gone forth,
And mine arms shall judge the people;
The isles shall wait upon me,
And on mine arm shall they trust.
6 Lift up your eyes to the heavens,
And look upon the earth beneath:
For the heavens shall vanish away like smoke,
And the earth shall wax old like a garment,
And they that dwell therein shall die in like manner:
But my salvation shall be for ever,
And my righteousness shall not be abolished
7 Hearken unto me, ye that know righteousness,
The people in whose heart is my law;
Fear ye not the reproach of men,
Neither be ye afraid of their revilings.
8 For the moth shall eat them up like a garment,
And the worm shall eat them like wool:
But my righteousness shall be for ever,
And my salvation from generation to generation

Both these proclamations, as I may call them, end alike with an assurance of the perpetuity of God's righteousness, and his salvation, and therefore we put them together, both being designed for the comfort of God's people. Observe,

First. Who are they to whom this comfort belongs? My people, and my nation, that I have set apart for myself, that own me, and are owned by me. Those are God's people, and his nation, who are subject to him, as their king and their God, pay allegiance to him, and put themselves under his protection accordingly. They are a people that know righteousness, not only have the means of knowledge, and to whom righteousness is made known, but improve those means, and are able to form a right judgment of truth and falsehood, good and evil. And as they have good heads so they have good hearts, for they have the law of God in them, written and ruling there. Those God owns for his people, in whose heart his law is. Even those that know righteousness, and have the law of God in their heart, may yet be in great distress and sorrow, and loaded with reproach and contempt; but their God will comfort them with the righteousness they know, and the law they have in their hearts.

Secondly. What the comfort is that belongs to God's people.

1. That the gospel of Christ shall be preached and published to the world. "A law shall proceed from me," an evangelical law, the law of Christ, the law of faith, ch. ii. 3. This law is his judgment, for it is that law of liberty by which the world shall be governed and judged. This shall not only go forth, but shall continue and rest; it shall take firm footing, and deep root in the world; it shall rest not only for the benefit of the Jews, that had the first notice of it, but for a light of the people of other nations. It is this law, this judgment, that we are required to hearken and give ear to at our peril; for how shall we escape if we neglect it, and turn a deaf ear to it? When a law proceeds from God, "he that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

2. That this law and judgment shall bring with it righteousness and salvation, shall open a ready way to the children of men how they may be justified and saved, ver. 5. It is called God's righteousness and his salvation, because of his contriving and bringing about; it is a righteousness that he will accept for us, and accept us for; and a righteousness which he will work in us, and graciously accept of. It is the salvation of the Lord, for it ariseth from him, and terminates in him. Observe, There is no salvation without righteousness; and wherever there is the righteousness of God there shall be his salvation. All those, and those only, that are justified and sanctified shall be glorified.

3. That this righteousness and salvation shall very shortly appear. It is near, it is gone forth; the decree is gone forth concerning it, it shall as certainly be introduced as if it were gone forth already, and the time for it is at hand. It is near in time. Behold all things are now ready; it is near in place, not far to seek, but the word is nigh us, and Christ in the word, righteousness in the word, Rom. x. 8.

4. That this evangelical righteousness and salvation shall not be confined li. 16—To "plant the heavens" signifies to confirm or establish them. Lowth has "to stretch out the heavens," which is wrong.

li. 17. Translate, "Thou hast drunken the dregs of the cup of trembling (i.e., which causes trembling), and emptied it."

li. 20. Instead of "a wild bull" some understand a wild ox or buffalo, and others a wild goat, ibex, or antelope. The Greek renders the comparison "like a beet half-boiled," and the Syriac "like a withered beet," but both are erroneous.

lii. 4. Some have thought "the Assyrian" here is Pharaoh, but needlessly, as the Assyrians oppressed Israel before Isaiah's time.

lii. 5. "Taken away for nought" means "taken away without cause," i.e., they had done their oppressors no wrong. The clause, "they that rule over them make them to howl," is variously rendered by critics, and translators ancient and modern. Some understand the words of the joyful or warlike shouts of the rulers who were the oppressors of Israel, and this is the view of Gesenius, Fürst, &c.

to the Jewish nation, but shall be extended to the Gentiles. "Mine arms shall judge the people." Those that will not yield to the judgments of God's mouth shall be crushed by the judgments of his hands. Some shall thus be judged by the Gospel, for for judgment Christ came into this world; but others, and those of the isles, shall wait upon him, and bid his Gospel, and the commands as well as the comforts of it, welcome. It was a comfort to God's people, to his nation, that multitudes should be added to them, and the increase of their number should be the increase of their strength and beauty. It is added, and "on mine arm shall they trust," that arm of the Lord which is revealed in Christ, ch. liii. 1. Observe, God's arm shall judge the people that are impenitent, and yet on his arm shall others trust, and be saved by it; for it is to us as we make it, a savour of life or death.

5. That this righteousness and salvation shall be for ever, and shall never be abolished, ver. 6. It is an everlasting righteousness that the Messiah brings in, Dan. ix. 24, an eternal redemption that he is the Author of, Heb. v. 9. As it shall spread through all the nations of the earth, so it shall last through all the ages of the world. We must never expect any other way of salvation, any other covenant of peace, or rule of righteousness, but what we have in the Gospel, and what we have there shall continue to the end, Mat. xxviii. 20. It is for ever, for the consequences of it shall be to eternity; and by this law of liberty men's everlasting state will be determined. This perpetuity of the Gospel, and the blessed things it brings in, is illustrated by the fading and perishing of this world and all things in it. Look up to the visible heavens above, which have continued hitherto, and seem likely to continue, but "they shall vanish like smoke," that soon spends itself and disappears; they shall be "rolled together like a scroll," and their lights shall fall like leaves in autumn. Look down to the earth beneath, that abideth too for a short ever, Eccl. i. 4; but it shall "wax old like a garment," that will be the worse for wearing; and "they that dwell therein," all the inhabitants of the earth, even those that seem to have the best settlement in it, "shall die in like manner." The soul shall, as to this world, vanish like smoke, and the body be thrown by like a garment waxen old. 'They shall die like a louse,' so some of the critics read it; easily crushed, Job vi. 19, and no loss of them. But when heaven and earth pass away, when all flesh and the glory of it wither as grass, the word of the Lord endures for ever, and not one iota or tittle of that shall fall to the ground. Those whose happiness is bound up in Christ's righteousness and salvation will have the comfort of it when time and days shall be no more.

Thirdly. What use they are to make of this comfort. If God's righteousness and salvation are near to them, then let them not fear "the reproach of men," of mortal, miserable men, nor be "afraid of their revilings," or spiteful taunts; theirs that bade you sing them the songs of Zion, or that ask you in scorn, Where is now your God? Let not those who embrace the gospel righteousness be afraid of those who will call them Beelzebub, and will say all manner of evil against them falsely; let them not be afraid of them, let them not be disturbed by these opprobrious speeches, nor made uneasy by them, as if they would be the ruin of their reputation and honour; and they must for ever lie under the load of them. Let them not be afraid of their executing their menaces, nor be deterred thereby from their duty, or frightened into any sinful compliances, or driven to take any indirect courses for their own safety. Those can bear but little for Christ that cannot bear a hard word for him. Let us not fear the reproach of men; for, 1. They will be quickly silenced; ver. 8, "The moth shall eat them up like a garment;" ch. l. 9, "the worm shall eat them like wool," or woollen cloth. If we have the approbation of a living God, we may despise the censure of dying men; the matter is not great what they say of us who must be worm's meat shortly. Or it intimates the judgments of God with which they shall be visited, with which they shall be consumed, for their malice against the people of God; they shall be slowly and silently, but effectually destroyed, when God shall come to reckon with them for all their hard speeches, Jude 14, 15. 2. The cause we suffer for cannot be run down; the falsehood of their reproaches will be detected, but truth shall triumph, and the righteousness of religion's injured cause shall be for ever plain. Clouds darken the sun, but give no obstruction to its progress.

9 Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the LORD;
Awake, as in the ancient days, in the generations of old.
Art thou not it that hath cut Rahab,
And wounded the dragon?
10 Art thou not it which hath dried the sea,
The waters of the great deep;
That hath made the depths of the sea a way for the ransomed to pass over?
11 Therefore the redeemed of the LORD shall return,
And come with singing unto Zion;
And everlasting joy shall be upon their head:
They shall obtain gladness and joy;
And sorrow and mourning shall flee away.
12 I, even I, am he that comforteth you:
Who art thou, that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die,
And of the son of man which shall be made as grass;
13 And forgettest the LORD thy maker,
That hath stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth;
And hast feared continually every day
Because of the fury of the oppressor,
As if he were ready to destroy?
And where is the fury of the oppressor?
14 The captive exile hasteneth that he may be loosed,
And that he should not die in the pit,
Nor that his bread should fail.
15 But I am the LORD thy God,
That divided the sea, whose waves roared:
The LORD of hosts is his name.
16 And I have put my words in thy mouth,
And I have covered thee in the shadow of mine hand,
That I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth,
And say unto Zion, Thou art my people.

In these verses we have,

First. A prayer that God would in his providence appear and act for the deliverance of his people, and the mortification of his and their enemies. "Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord," ver. 9. The arm of the Lord is Christ, or it is put for God himself, as Ps. xliv. 23, "Awake, why sleepest thou?" He that keeps Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps; but when we pray that he would awake, we mean that he would make it to appear he watcheth over his people, and is always awake to do them good. The arm of the Lord is said to awake when the power of God exerts itself with more than ordinary vigour on his people's behalf. When a hand or arm is benumbed, we say it is asleep; when it is stretched forth for action it awakes. God needs not to be reminded or excited by us; but he gives us leave thus to be humbly earnest with him for such appearances of his power as will be for his own praise. "Put on strength;" that is, put forth strength. Appear in thy strength, as we appear in the clothes we put on, Ps. xxi. 13. The church sees her case bad, her enemies many and mighty, her friends few and feeble, and therefore depends purely upon the strength of God's arm for her relief. "Awake, as in the ancient days;" that is, do for us now as thou didst for our fathers formerly, repeat the wonders they told us of, Jud. vi. 13.

Secondly. The pleas to enforce this prayer:

1. They plead precedents, the experiences of their ancestors, and the great things God had done for them. Let the arm of the Lord be made bare on our behalf, for it has done great things formerly, in defence of the same cause, and we are sure it is neither shortened nor weakened. It did wonders against the Egyptians, that enslaved and oppressed God's son, his firstborn; it cut Rahab to pieces with one direful plague after another; and wounded Pharaoh, the dragon, the leviathan, as he is called, Ps. lxxiv. 13, 14, gave him his death's wound. It did wonders for Israel; it "dried up the sea," even "the waters of the great deep," as far as was requisite to open a way through the sea, for "the ransomed to pass over," ver. 10. God is never at a loss for a way to accomplish his purposes concerning his people, but will either find one or make one. And past experiences, as they are great supports to faith and hope, so they are good pleas in prayer: "Thou hast;" "Wilt thou not?" Ps. lxxxv. 1—6.

2. They plead promises, ver. 11. And "the redeemed of the Lord shall return;" that is, (as it may be supplied,) thou hast said they shall; referring to ch. xxxv. 10, where we find this promise, that the redeemed of the Lord, when they are released out of their captivity in Babylon, shall "come with singing unto Zion." Sinners, when they are brought out of the slavery of sin into the glorious liberty of God's children, may come singing, as a bird got loose out of the cage. The souls of believers, when they are delivered out of the prison of the body, come to the heavenly Zion with singing. Then this promise will have its full accomplishment, and we may plead it in the mean time. He that designs such joy for us at last will he not work such deliverance for us in the meantime as our case requires? When the saints come to heaven they enter into the joy of their Lord, it crowns their heads with immortal honour, it fills their hearts with complete satisfaction; they shall obtain that joy and gladness which they could never obtain in the vale of tears. In this world of changes it is a short step from joy to sorrow; but in that world "sorrow and mourning shall flee away," never to return, or come in view again.

Thirdly. The answer immediately given to this prayer; ver. 12, "I, even I, am he that comforteth you." They prayed for the operations of his power; he answers them with the consolations of his grace, which may well be accepted as an equivalent. If God do not wound the dragon, and dry the sea, as formerly, yet if he comfort us in soul under our afflictions, we have no reason to complain. If God do not answer presently with the saving strength of his right hand, we must be thankful if he answers us, as an angel himself was answered, Zec. i. 13, "with good words, and comfortable words." See how God resolves to comfort his people; "I, even I" will do it. He had ordered his ministers to do it, ch. xl. 1; but, because they cannot reach the heart, he takes the work into his own hands, "I, even I" will do it. See how he glories in it; he takes it among the titles of his honour to be the God that comforteth them that are cast down; he delights in being so. Those whom God comforteth, they are comforted indeed; nay, his undertaking to comfort them is comfort enough to them.

1. He comforts those that were in fear; and fear has torment which calls for comfort, the fear of man hath a snare in it which we have need of comfort to preserve us from. He comforts the timorous by chiding them, and that is no improper way of comforting either others or ourselves; "Why art thou cast down, and why disquieted?" ver. 12, 13. God, that comforts his people, would not have them disquiet themselves with amazing, perplexing fears, either of the reproach of men, (ver. 7,) or of their growing, threatening power and greatness; or of any mischief they may intend against us, or our people. Observe,

1st. The absurdity of those fears. It is a disparagement to us to give way to them; "Who art thou that thou shouldest be afraid?" In the original the pronoun is feminine, Who art thou, O woman; unworthy the name of a man, such a weak and womanish thing is it to give way to perplexing fears. First. It is absurd to be in such dread of a dying man; what! "afraid of a man that shall die;" shall certainly and shortly die; of the "son of man which shall be made as grass;" shall wither and be trodden down, or eaten up? The greatest men, and the most formidable, that are the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, yet are but men, Ps. ix. 20; and shall die like men, Ps. lxxxii. 7; are but grass out of the earth, cleaving to it, and retiring again into it. Note, We ought to look upon every man as a man that shall die. Those we admire and love and trust to, they are men that shall die; let us not therefore delight too much in them, nor depend too much upon them. Those we fear, we must look upon them as frail and mortal; and consider what a foolish thing it is for the servants of the living God to be afraid of dying men, that are here to-day and gone to-morrow. Secondly. It is absurd to fear "continually every day," ver. 13; to put ourselves upon a constant rack, so as never to be easy, nor to have any enjoyment of ourselves. Now and then a danger may be imminent and threatening, and it may be prudence to fear it; but to be always in a toss, jealous of dangers at every step, and to tremble at the shaking of every leaf, is to make ourselves all our lifetime subject to bondage, Heb. ii. 15; and to bring upon ourselves that sore judgment which is threatened, Deu. xxviii. 66, 67, "Thou shalt fear day and night." Thirdly. It is absurd to fear beyond what Others, with our translators, think the sense is that the oppressors of Israel cause them to howl and lament. Lowth, followed by Boothroyd and Adam Clarke, supposes it means that the rulers boast, which seems to come very near the sense.

lii. 8. The common explanation of the phrase, "they shall see eye to eye," is that, like "face to face," it means plainly or distinctly, not "through a glass darkly." This opinion is held by critics of eminence; but some think it means "they shall see alike," all shall see the same thing, or "they shall see with their eyes." The old explanation is the best.

lii. 11. The last clause has been called an indirect prophecy, because Cyrus gave orders that the sacred utensils which Nebuchadnezzar had taken from Jerusalem should be restored to the exiles of Israel on their return. Professor Alexander sees in this verse a "grand though blended image of a march and a procession, an army and a church, a sacramental host, bearing the sacred vessels, there is cause for. Thou art afraid "of the fury of the oppressor;" it is true there is an oppressor, and he is furious, and he designs, it may be, when he has an opportunity, to do thee a mischief, and it will be thy wisdom therefore to stand upon thy guard; but thou art afraid of him, "as if he were ready to destroy," as if he were just now going to cut thy throat, and as if there were no possibility of preventing it. A timorous spirit is thus apt to make the worst of every thing, and to apprehend the danger greater and nearer than really it is; and sometimes God is pleased presently to shew us the folly of it, "Where is the fury of the oppressor?" It is gone in an instant, and the danger is over ere thou art aware. His heart is turned, or his hands are tied. Pharaoh, king of Egypt, is but a noise; and the king of Babylon no more. What is gone with all the furious oppressors of God's Israel, that hectored them, and threatened them, and were a terror to them? they passed away, and lo, they were not, and so shall these.

2nd. The impiety of those fears. Thou art "afraid of a man that shall die," and "forgettest the Lord thy Maker," who is also the Maker of all the world, who hath "stretched forth the heavens," and "laid the foundations of the earth;" and therefore hath all the hosts and all the powers of both at his command and dispose. Note, Our inordinate fearing of man is an implicit forgetting of God; when we disquiet ourselves with the fear of man, we forget that there is a God above him, and that the greatest of men have no power but what is given them from above; we forget the providence of God, by which he orders and overrules all events according to the counsel of his own will; we forget the promises he has made to protect his people, and the experiences we have had of his care concerning us; and his seasonable interposal for our relief many a time, when we thought the oppressor ready to destroy; we forget our Jehovah-jirehs, monuments of mercy in the mount of the Lord. Did we remember to make God our fear and our dread, we should not be so much afraid as we are of the frowns of men. ch. viii. 12, 13. Happy is the man that fears God always, Pr. xxviii. 14; Lu. xii. 4, 5.

2. He comforts those that were in bonds, ver. 14, 15. See here, 1st. What they do for themselves. "The captive exile hasteneth that he may be loosed," and may return to his own country, from which he is banished; his care is, that he may not die in the pit, nor die a prisoner, through the inconveniences of his confinement, and that his bread should not fail, either the bread he should have to keep him alive in prison or that which should bear his charges home; his stock is low, and therefore he hasteth to be loosed. Now some understand this as his fault; he is distrustfully impatient of delays, cannot wait God's time, but thinks he is undone, and must die in the pit if he be not released presently. Others take it to be his praise, that when the doors are thrown open he doth not linger, but applies himself with all diligence to procure his discharge. And then it follows, "But I am the Lord thy God," which intimates, 2nd. What God will do for them, even that which they cannot do for themselves. God hath all power in his hand to help the captive exiles; for he hath divided the sea, when the roaring of his waves was more frightful than any of the impotent menaces of proud oppressors. He hath stilled or quieted the sea, so some think it should be read, Ps. lxv. 7; lxxxix. 9. This is not only a proof of what God can do, but a resemblance of what he has done, and will do for his people; he will find out a way to still the threatening storm, and bring them safe into the harbour. "The Lord of hosts is his name," his name for ever, the name by which his people have long known him. And, as he is able to help them, so he is willing and engaged to do it; for he is thy God, captive exile, thine in covenant. This is a check to the desponding captives; let them not conclude that they must either be loosed presently or die in the pit; for he that is the Lord of hosts can relieve them when they are brought never so low. It is also an encouragement to the diligent captives who, when liberty is proclaimed, are willing to lose no time; let them know that the Lord is their God, and while they thus strive to help themselves they may be sure he will help them.

3. He comforts all his people who depended upon what the prophets said to them in the name of the Lord, and built their hopes upon it. When the deliverances which the prophets spake of either did not come so soon as they looked for them or did not come up to the height of their expectation, they began to be cast down in their own eyes; but as to this they are encouraged (ver. 16) by what God saith to his prophet, not to this only, but to all his prophets, nor to this or them principally, but to Christ the great Prophet. It is a great satisfaction to those to whom the message is sent, to hear the God of truth and power say to his messenger, as he doth here, "I have put my words in thy mouth," that by them "I may plant the heavens." God undertook to comfort his people, ver. 12; but still he doth it by his prophets, by his Gospel. And that he may do it by these, he here tells us, 1st. That his word in them is very true. He owns what they had said to be what he had directed and enjoined them to say; "I have put my words in thy mouth," and therefore he that receives thee and them receives me. This is a great stay to our faith, that Christ's doctrine was not his, but his that sent him; and that the words of the prophets and apostles were God's words which he put into their mouths. God's Spirit not only revealed to them the things themselves they spoke of, but dictated to them the words they should speak, 2 Pet. i. 21; 1 Cor. ii. 13; so that these are the true sayings of God, of a God that cannot lie. 2nd. That it is very safe. "I have covered thee in the shadow of my hand," as before, ch. xlix. 2; which speaks the special protection not only of the prophets, but of their prophecies; not only of Christ, but of Christianity, of the Gospel of Christ. It is not only the faithful word of God which the prophets deliver to us, but it shall be carefully preserved till it have its accomplishment for the use of the church, notwithstanding the restless endeavours of the powers of darkness to extinguish this light. They shall prophesy again, Rev. x. 11; though not in their persons yet in their writings, which God has always covered in the shadow of his hand, preserved by a special providence, else they had been lost ere this. 3rd. That this word, when it comes to be accomplished, will be very great, and will not at all fall short of the pomp and grandeur of the prophecy; "I have put my words in thy mouth," not that by the performance of them I may plant a nation, or found a city, but "plant the heavens," and "lay the foundations of the earth," may do that for my people which will be a new creation. This must look as far forward as to the great work done by the Gospel of Christ, and the setting up of his holy religion in the world. As God by Christ made the world at first, Heb. i. 2, and by him formed the Old Testament church, Zec. vi. 12, so by him, and the words put into his mouth, he will set up, First. A new world; will again plant the heavens, and found the earth. Sin having put the whole creation into disorder, Christ's taking away the sin of the world put all into order again, old things are passed away, all things are become new. Things in heaven and things on earth are reconciled, and so put into a new posture, Col. i. 20. And through him, according to the promise, we "look for new heavens and a new earth," 2 Pet. iii. 13; and to this the prophets bear witness. Secondly. He will set up a new church, a New Testament church; he will "say unto Zion, Thou art my people." The gospel church is called Zion, Heb. xii. 22; and Jerusalem, Gal. iv. 26. And when the Gentiles are brought into it it shall be said unto them, Ye are my people. When God works great deliverances for his church, and especially when he shall complete the salvation of it in the great day, he will thereby own that poor, despised handful to be his people, whom he has chosen and loved.

17 Awake, awake, stand up, O Jerusalem,
Which hast drunk at the hand of the LORD the cup of his fury;
Thou hast drunken the dregs of the cup of trembling.
And wrung them out.
18 There is none to guide her
Among all the sons whom she hath brought forth;
Neither is there any that taketh her by the hand
Of all the sons that she hath brought up 19 These two things are come unto thee;
Who shall be sorry for thee?
Desolation, and destruction, and the famine, and the sword:
By whom shall I comfort thee?
20 Thy sons have fainted,
They lie at the head of all the streets, as a wild bull in a net:
They are full of the fury of the LORD,
The rebuke of thy God.
21 Therefore hear now this, thou afflicted,
And drunken, but not with wine:
22 Thus saith thy Lord the LORD,
And thy God that pleadeth the cause of his people,
Behold, I have taken out of thine hand the cup of trembling,
Even the dregs of the cup of my fury;
Thou shalt no more drink it again:
23 But I will put it into the hand of them that afflict thee;
Which have said to thy soul, Bow down, that we may go over:
And thou hast laid thy body as the ground,
And as the street, to them that went over.

God having awoke for the comfort of his people, here calls upon them to awake, as afterwards, ch. lii. 1. It is a call to awake, not so much out of the sleep of sin, (though that also is necessary, in order to their being ready for deliverance,) as out of the stupor of despair. When the inhabitants of Jerusalem were in captivity, they, as well as those who remained upon the spot, were so overwhelmed with the sense of their troubles, that they had no heart or spirit to mind any thing that tended to their comfort or relief. They were, as the disciples in the garden, sleeping for sorrow, Lu. xxii. 45; and, therefore, when the deliverance came they are said to be like them that dream, Ps. cxxvi. 1. Nay, it is a call to awake not only from sleep, but from death; like that to the dry bones to live, Eze. xxxvii. 9. Awake, and look about thee, that thou mayest see the day of thy deliverance dawn; and mayest be ready to bid it welcome. Recover thy senses, sink not under thy load; but stand up, and bestir thyself for thy own help. This may be applied to the Jerusalem that was in the apostles' time, which is said to be "in bondage with her children," Gal. iv. 25; and to have been under the power of a "spirit of slumber," Rom. xi. 8. They are called to awake and mind the things that belonged to their everlasting peace; and then the cup of trembling should be taken out of their hands, and peace should be spoken to them, and they should triumph over Satan, who had blinded their eyes, and lulled them asleep. Now,

First. It is owned that Jerusalem had long been in a very deplorable condition, and sunk into the depths of misery.

1. She had lain under the tokens of God's displeasure. He had put into her hand the "cup of his fury," that is, her share of his displeasure. The dispensations of his providence concerning her had been such as she had reason to think he was angry with her. She had provoked him to anger most bitterly, and was made to taste the bitter fruits of it. The cup of God's fury is, and will be, a "cup of trembling," to all those that have it put into their hands; damned sinners will find it so to eternity. It is said, Ps. lxxv. 8, that the "dregs of the cup," the loathsome sediments in the bottom of it, "all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them." But here, Jerusalem having made herself as the wicked of the earth, is compelled to wring them out, and drink them; for wherever there has been a cup of fornication, as there had been in Jerusalem's hand when she was idolatrous, sooner or later there will be "a cup of fury," a "cup of trembling;" therefore, "stand in awe, and sin not."

2. Those that should have helped her in her distress failed her, and were either unable or unwilling to help her, as might have been expected, ver. 18. She is intoxicated with the cup of God's fury, and, being so, staggers, and is very unsteady in her counsels and attempts. She knows not what she saith or doth, much less knows she what to say or do. And in this unhappy condition, of all the sons that she hath brought forth, and brought up, that she has borne and educated, (and there were many famous ones, for "of Zion it was said, That this and that man was born there," Ps. lxxxvii. 5,) there is none to guide her, none to take her by the hand,—to keep her either from falling or from shaming herself,—either to lend a hand to help her out of her trouble or lend a tongue to comfort her under it. Think it not strange if wise and good men are disappointed in their children, and have not that succour from them which they expected; but those that were arrows in their hand prove arrows in their heart; when Jerusalem herself hath none of all her sons, either prince, priest, or prophet, that hath such a sense either of duty or gratitude, as to help her when she had most need of help. Thus they complain, Ps. lxxiv. 9, "There is none to tell us how long." Now that which aggravated this disappointment was,

1st. That her trouble was very great, and yet there was none to pity or help her. "These two things are come unto thee," ver. 19, to complete thy desolation and destruction, even the famine and the sword; two sore judgments, and very terrible. Or the two things were, the desolation and destruction by which the city was wasted, and the famine and sword by which the citizens perished. Or the two things were, the trouble itself, made up of desolation, destruction, famine, and sword, and her being helpless, forlorn, and comfortless under it. Two sad things indeed, to be in this woful case, and to have none to pity thee, to sympathise with thee in thy griefs, or to help to bear the burthen not as priests and Levites merely, but as the armour-bearers of Jehovah, the weapons of whose warfare, though not carnal, are mighty to the pulling down of strongholds." Hence he translates "Be clean (or cleanse yourselves), ye armour-bearers of Jehovah."

lii. 12. In this verse the coming exodus from Babylon is contrasted with that in former times out of Egypt, so far as the words "haste" and "flight" are concerned. The second clause promises similar Divine guidance and defence.

lii. 13. Here commences one of the most remarkable Messianic prophecies in the Bible, and it is continued to the close of the fifty-third chapter. It has been well observed that if this is proved to be a Messianic prophecy, then it settles the controversy with the Jews and with infidels, and supplies Christians with correct ideas on the whole scheme of redemption. That it was written before the time of Christ is admitted by all parties, and shown by its existence in the Greek version. The ancient Jews are known to have understood the proof thy cares; to have none to comfort thee, by suggesting that to thee which might help to alleviate thy grief, or doing that for thee which might help to redress thy grievances. Or these two things that were come upon Jerusalem are the same with the two things that were afterwards to come upon Babylon, ch. xlvii. 9, loss of children and widowhood; a piteous case, and yet, when thou hast brought it upon thyself by thy own sin and folly, "Who shall be sorry for thee?" A case that calls for comfort, and yet, when thou art froward under thy trouble, frettest, and makest thyself uneasy, "By whom shall I comfort thee?" They that will not be counselled cannot be helped.

2nd. That those who should have been her comforters were their own tormentors, ver. 20; they have fainted, as quite dispirited and driven to despair. They have no patience, in which to keep possession of their own souls and the enjoyment of themselves, nor any confidence in God's promise, by which to keep possession of the comfort of that. They throw themselves upon the ground in vexation at their troubles, and there they lie "at the head of all the streets," complaining to all that pass by, Lam. i. 12, pining away for want of necessary food. There they lie like "a wild bull in a net," fretting and raging, struggling and pulling in vain to help themselves, but entangling themselves so much the more, and making their condition the worse by their own passions and discontents. They that are of a meek and quiet spirit are, under affliction, like a dove in a net, mourning indeed, but silent and patient. They that are of a froward, peevish spirit, are like a wild bull in a net, uneasy to themselves, vexatious to their friends, and provoking to their God; "They are full of the fury of the Lord, the rebuke of our God." God is angry with them, and contends with them, and they are full of that only, and take no notice of his wise and gracious designs in afflicting them; never inquire wherefore he contends with them, and therefore nothing appears in them but anger at God, and quarrelling with him. They are displeased at God for the dispensations of his providence concerning them, and so they do but make ill worse. This had long been Jerusalem's woful case, and God took cognizance of it. But,

Secondly. It is promised that Jerusalem's troubles shall at length come to an end, and be transferred to her persecutors, ver. 21. Nevertheless, hear this, thou afflicted. It is often the lot of God's church to be afflicted, and God hath always something to say to her then which she will do well to hearken to. Thou art drunken, not, as formerly, with wine, not with the intoxicating cup of Babylon's whoredoms and idolatries, but with the cup of affliction. Know, then, for thy comfort,

1. That the Lord Jehovah is thy Lord and thy God for all this. It is expressed emphatically, ver. 22, "Thus saith thy Lord the Lord, and thy God," the Lord that is able to help thee, and hath wherewithal to relieve thee; thy Lord that hath an incontestable right to thee, and will not alienate it, thy God in covenant with thee, and that hath undertaken to make thee happy. Whatever the distresses of God's people may be, he will not disown his relation to them, nor have they lost their interest in him and in his promise.

2. That he is the God "that pleadeth the cause of his people," as their patron and protector, who takes what is done against them as done against himself. The cause of God's people, and of that holy religion which they profess, is a righteous cause, otherwise the righteous God would not appear for it. Yet it may for a time be run down, and seem as if it were lost; but God will plead it, either by convincing the consciences or confounding the mischievous projects of those that fight against it. He will plead it by clearing up the equity and excellency of it to the world, and by giving success to those that act in defence of it. It is his own cause; he hath espoused it, and therefore will plead it with jealousy.

3. That they should shortly take leave of their troubles, and bid a final farewell to them. I will take out of thy hand the cup of trembling, that bitter cup: it shall pass from thee. Throwing away the cup of trembling will not do, nor saying we will not, we cannot drink it. But, if we patiently submit, he that put it into our hands will himself take it out of our hands, Nay, it is promised, "Thou shalt no more drink it again;" God hath let fall his controversy with thee, and will not revive the judgment.

4. That their persecutors and oppressors should be made to drink of the same bitter cup which they had drunk so deep of, ver. 23. See here, 1st. How insolently they had abused and trampled upon the people of God; They have said to thy soul, to thee, to thy life, "Bow down, that we may go over." Nay, they have said it to thy conscience, taking a pride and pleasure in forcing thee to worship idols. Herein the New Testament Babylon treads in the steps of that old oppressor, tyrannizing over men's consciences, giving law to them, and putting them upon the rack, and compelling them to sinful compliances. They that set up an infallible head and judge, requiring an implicit faith in his dictates and obedience to his commands, do in effect say to men's souls, "Bow down, that we may go over," and they say it with delight. 2nd. How sneakingly the people of God, having, by their sin, lost much of their courage and sense of honour, truckled to them, "Thou hast laid thy body as the ground." Observe, The oppressors required the souls to be subjected to them, that every man should believe and worship just as they would have them. But all they could gain by their threats and violence was, that people laid their bodies on the ground. They brought them to an external and hypocritical conformity, but conscience cannot be forced, nor is it mentioned to their praise that they yielded thus far. But, 3rd. Observe how justly God will reckon with those who have carried it so imperiously towards his people; the cup of trembling shall be put into their hand. Babylon's case shall be as bad as ever Jerusalem's was. Daniel's persecutors shall be thrown into Daniel's den; let them see how they like it. And the Lord is known by these judgments which he executeth.

CHAPTER LII.

The most part of this chapter is on the same subject with the chapter before, concerning the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon, which yet is applicable to the great salvation Christ hath wrought out for us; but the last three verses are on the same subject with the following chapter, concerning the person of the Redeemer, his humiliation and exaltation. Observe, I. The encouragement that is given to the Jews in captivity to hope that God would deliver them in his own way and time, ver. 1—6. II. The great joy and rejoicing that shall be both with ministers and people upon that occasion, ver. 7—10. III. The call given to those that remained in captivity, to shift for their own enlargement, when liberty was proclaimed, ver. 11, 12. IV. A short idea given here of the Messiah, which is enlarged upon in the next chapter, ver. 13—15.

AWAKE, awake; put on thy strength, O Zion; [city:
Put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the holy
For henceforth there shall no more come into thee
The uncircumcised and the unclean.
2 Shake thyself from the dust;
Arise, and sit down, O Jerusalem.
Loose thyself from the bands of thy neck,
O captive daughter of Zion
3 For thus saith the LORD,
Ye have sold yourselves for nought;
And ye shall be redeemed without money
4 For thus saith the Lord GOD, [there
My people went down aforetime into Egypt to sojourn
And the Assyrian oppressed them without cause.
5 Now therefore, what have I here, saith the LORD,
That my people is taken away for nought? [LORD;
They that rule over them make them to howl, saith the
And my name continually every day is blasphemed.
6 Therefore my people shall know my name:
Therefore they shall know in that day that I am he that Behold, it is I. [doth speak:

Here, First. God's people are stirred up to appear vigorous for their own deliverance, ver. 1, 2. They had desired that God would awake, and put on his strength, ch. li. 9; here he calls upon them to awake, and put on their strength, to bestir themselves. Let them awaken from their despondency, and pluck up their spirits, encourage themselves, and one another with hope, that all will be well yet, and no longer succumb, and sink under their burthen. Let them awaken from their distrust, look above them, look about them; look into the promises, look into the providences of God that were working for them; and let them raise their expectations of great things from God. Let them awaken from their dulness, and sluggishness, and incogitancy, and raise up their endeavours, not to take any irregular courses for their own relief contrary to the law of nations concerning captives, but to use all likely means to recommend themselves to the favour of the conqueror, and make an interest with him. God here gives them an assurance,

1. That they shall be reformed by their captivity. "There shall no more come into thee the uncircumcised and the unclean;" their idolatrous customs shall be no more introduced, or at least not harboured. For when by the marriage of strange wives, in Ezra's time and Nehemiah's, the unclean crept in, they were soon by the vigilance and zeal of the magistrate expelled again; and care was taken that Jerusalem should be a holy city. Thus the Gospel Jerusalem is purified by the blood of Christ and the grace of God, and made indeed a holy city.

2. That they shall be relieved, and rescued out of their captivity; that the bands of their neck should be loosed, that they should not now be any longer oppressed; nay, that they should not be any more invaded, as they had been; 'There shall no more come against thee,' (so it may be read, ver. 1,) 'the uncircumcised and unclean.' The heathen shall not again enter into God's sanctuary, and profane his temple, Ps. lxxix. 1. This must be understood with a condition. If they keep close to God, and keep in with him, God will keep off, will keep out, the enemy; but if they again corrupt themselves, Antiochus will profane their temple, and the Romans destroy it. However, for some time they shall have peace; and to this happy change now approaching, they are here called to accommodate themselves. 1st. Let them prepare for joy: "Put on thy beautiful garments;" no longer to appear in mourning weeds, and the habit of thy widowhood. Put on a new face, a smiling countenance, now a new and pleasant scene begins to open. The beautiful garments were laid up then when the harps were hung on the willow trees; but now there is occasion for both, let both be resumed together. "Put on thy strength;" and, in order to that, put on thy beautiful garments, in token of triumph and rejoicing. Note, The joy of the Lord will be our strength, Neh. viii. 10; and our beautiful garments will serve for armour of proof against the darts of temptation and trouble. And observe, Jerusalem must then put on her beautiful garments when she is become a holy city, for the beauty of holiness is the most amiable beauty; and the more holy we are the more cause we have to rejoice. 2nd. Let them prepare for liberty: "Shake thyself from the dust," in which thou hast lain, and into which thy proud oppressors have trodden thee, ch. li. 23, or into which thou hast, in thy extreme sorrow, rolled thyself. 'Arise, and sit up;' so it may be read. O Jerusalem, prepare to get clear of all the marks of servitude thou hast been under, and to shift thy quarters; "Loose thyself from the bands of thy neck," be inspired with generous principles and resolutions to assert thine own liberty. The Gospel proclaims liberty to those who were bound with fears, and makes it their duty to take hold of their liberty. Let those that have been weary and heavy laden under the burthen of sin, finding relief in Christ, shake themselves from the dust of their doubts and fears, and loose themselves from those bands; for if the Son make them free they shall be free indeed.

Secondly. God stirs up himself to appear jealous for the deliverance of his people. He doth here plead their cause with himself, and even stir up himself to come and save them; for his reasons of mercy are fetched from himself. Divers things he here considers:

1. That the Chaldeans, who oppressed them, never acknowledged God in the power they gained over his people: no more than Sennacherib did, who, when God made use of him as an instrument for the correction and reformation of his people, meant not so, ch. x. 6, 7. "Ye have sold yourselves for nought;" you got nothing by it, nor did I. God considers, that when they by sin had sold themselves, he himself, who had the prior, nay, the sole title to them, did not increase his wealth by the price, Ps. xliv. 12. They did not so much as pay their debts to him with it. The Babylonians gave him no thanks for them, but rather reproached and blasphemed his name upon that account; and therefore they, having so long had you for nothing, shall at last restore you for nothing, you shall be redeemed without price, as was promised, ch. xlv. 13. Those that give nothing must expect to get nothing; however, God is a debtor to no man.

2. That they had been often before in the like distress, had often smarted for a time under the tyranny of their taskmasters; and therefore it was pity they should now be left always in the hand of these oppressors, ver. 4. "My people went down into Egypt," in an amicable way to settle there; but they enslaved them, and ruled them with rigour; and then they were delivered, notwithstanding the pride, and power, and policies of Pharaoh: and why may we not think God will deliver his people now? At other times the Assyrian oppressed the people of God without cause, as when the ten tribes were carried away captive by the king of Assyria, soon after Sennacherib, another Assyrian, with a destroying army, oppressed and made himself master of all the defenced cities of Judah. The Babylonians might not unfitly be called Assyrians, their monarchy being a branch of the Assyrian; and they now "oppressed them phecy of the Messiah, as some modern Jews have done. From the time of Christ downwards Christians have applied it to the Lord Jesus, and those who do not are still a very small minority. The evidence that Christ is meant is based very much on the conformity between this passage and the records concerning the character, work, and sufferings of the Saviour, and the experience of his Church in the world. (For more, see supplementary notes to chap. liii.) Instead of our version of the verse under notice, some have proposed, "Behold, my servant shall prosper," &c., as in the margin. The verb has, in fact, both these senses, and also means to attend to, to understand, and to teach, or make wise. Hence it is difficult to decide.

lii. 14, 15. The word "as" in verse 14 corresponds with "so" in verse 15. The verb rendered "sprinkle" is otherwise translated "astonish," "scatter," "purify," "collect," "fill with joy," and "cause to tremble." The usual meaning is that of sprinkling.

liii. 2. Some, like Barnes, translate the second clause, "He had without cause." Though God was righteous in delivering them into their hands, they were unrighteous in using them as they did, and could not pretend a dominion over them as their subjects, as Pharaoh might when they were settled in Goshen, a part of his kingdom. When we suffer by the hands of wicked and unreasonable men, it is some comfort to be able to say, that as to them it is without cause; that we have not given them any provocation, Ps. vii. 3—5, &c.

3. That God's glory suffered by the injuries that were done to his people; ver. 5, "What have I here," what do I get by it, "that my people is taken away for nought?" God is not worshipped as he used to be in Jerusalem, his altar there is gone, and his temple in ruins; but if in lieu of that, he were more and better worshipped in Babylon, either by the captives, or by the natives, it were another matter; God might be looked upon as in some respect a gainer in his honour by it. But, alas! it is not so. 1st. The captives are so dispirited that they cannot praise him; but instead of that they are continually howling, which grieves him, and moves his pity. "They that rule over them make them to howl;" as the Egyptians of old made them to sigh, Ex. ii. 23. So the Babylonians now using them more hardly extorted from them louder complaints, and made them to howl. This gives us no pleasing idea of the temper the captives were now in; their complaints were not so rational and pious as they should have been, but brutish rather; they howled, Hos. vii. 14. However, God heard it, and came down to deliver them, as he did out of Egypt, Ex. iii. 7. 2nd. The natives are so insolent that they will not praise him; but, instead of that, they are continually blaspheming, which affronts him, and moves his anger. They boasted that they were too hard for God, because they were too hard for his people; and set him at defiance, as unable to deliver them; and thus "my name continually every day is blasphemed" among them. When they praised their own idols, they lifted up themselves against the Lord of heaven, Dan. v. 23. Now, saith God, this is not to be suffered; I will go down to deliver them. For what honour, what rent, what tribute of praise have I from the world, when my people, that should be to me for a name and a praise, are to me for a reproach? For their oppressors will neither praise God themselves nor let them do it. The apostle quotes this with application to the wicked lives of the Jews, by which God was dishonoured among the Gentiles then, as much as now he was by their sufferings, Rom. ii. 23, 24.

4. That his glory would be greatly manifested by their deliverance; ver. 6, "Therefore," because my name is thus blasphemed, I will arise, and "my people shall know my name," my name Jehovah, by which he had made himself known, in delivering them out of Egypt, Ex. vi. 3. God will do something to vindicate his own honour, something for his great name; and his people, that have almost lost the knowledge of it, shall know it to their comfort, and shall find it their strong tower. They shall know that God's providence governs the world, and all the affairs of it; that it is he that doth speak deliverance for them by the word of his power; that it is he only who at first spake, and it was done. They shall know that God's word, which Israel is blessed with above other nations, shall without fail have its accomplishment in due season. That it is he that speaks by the prophets. It is he, and they do not speak of themselves; for not one iota or tittle of what they say shall fall to the ground.

7 How beautiful upon the mountains
Are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace;
That bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation;
That saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!
8 Thy watchmen shall lift up the voice;
With the voice together shall they sing:
For they shall see eye to eye,
When the LORD shall bring again Zion
9 Break forth into joy, sing together,
Ye waste places of Jerusalem:
For the LORD hath comforted his people,
He hath redeemed Jerusalem.
10 The LORD hath made bare his holy arm
In the eyes of all the nations;
And all the ends of the earth
Shall see the salvation of our God.
11 Depart ye, depart ye, go ye out from thence,
Touch no unclean thing;
Go ye out of the midst of her;
Be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the LORD
12 For ye shall not go out with haste,
Nor go by flight:
For the LORD will go before you,
And the God of Israel will be your rereward.

The removal of the Jews from Babylon to their own land again is here spoken of both as a mercy and as a duty; and the application of those words, ver. 7, to the preaching of the Gospel by the apostle, Rom. x. 15, plainly intimates, that that deliverance was a type and figure of the redemption of mankind by Jesus Christ, to which what is here said of their redemption out of Babylon ought to be accommodated.

First. It is here spoken of as a great blessing, which ought to be welcomed with abundance of joy and thankfulness.

1. Those that bring the tidings of their release shall be very acceptable; ver. 7, "How beautiful upon the mountains," the mountains round about Jerusalem, over which these messengers are seen coming at a distance; how beautiful are their feet, when it is known what tidings they bring! It is not meant so much of the common posts, or the messengers sent express by the government to disperse the proclamation, but rather of some of the Jews themselves; who, being at the fountain-head of intelligence, had early notice of it, and presently went themselves, or sent their own messengers to all parts, to disperse the news, and even to Jerusalem itself, to tell the few who remained there that their brethren would be with them shortly. For it is published, not merely as matter of news, but as a proof that Zion's God reigns; for in that language it is published. They say unto Zion, "Thy God reigneth." Those who bring the tidings of peace and salvation, that Cyrus has given orders for the release of the Jews; those tidings which were so long expected by them that waited for the consolation of Israel, those good tidings, (so the original reads it, without the tautology of our translation, "good tidings of good,") they put this construction upon it; O Zion, thy God reigns. Note, When bad news is abroad this is good news, and when good news is abroad this is the best news, that Zion's God reigns; that God is Zion's God, in covenant with her, and as such he reigns, Ps. cxlvi. 10; Zec. ix. 9. "The Lord hath founded Zion," ch. xiv. 32. All events have their rise in the disposals of the kingdom of his providence, and their tendency to the advancement of the kingdom of his grace. This must be applied to the preaching of the Gospel, which is a proclamation of peace and salvation. It is Gospel indeed, good news, glad tidings; tidings of victory over our spiritual enemies, and liberty from our spiritual bondage. The good news is, that the Lord Jesus reigns, and all power is given to him. Christ himself brought these tidings first, Lu. iv. 18; Heb. ii. 3; and of him the text speaks. How beautiful are his feet! his feet that were nailed to the cross, how beautiful upon mount Calvary; his feet, when he came leaping upon the mountains, Cant. ii. 8, how beautiful were they to those who knew his voice, and knew it to be the voice of their beloved! His ministers proclaim these good tidings. They ought to keep their feet clean from the pollutions of the world, and then they ought to be beautiful in the eyes of those to whom they are sent, who sit at their feet, or rather at Christ's in them, to hear his word. They must be esteemed in love for their works' sake, 1 Thes. v. 13. For their message sake, which is well worthy of all acceptation.

2. Those to whom the tidings are brought shall be put thereby into a transport of joy.

1st. Zion's watchmen shall then rejoice, because they are surprisingly illuminated, ver. 8. The watchmen on Jerusalem's walls shall lead the chorus in this triumph. Who they were we are told, ch. lxii. 6. They were such as God set on the walls of Jerusalem, to make mention of his name, and to continue instant in prayer to him, till he again make Jerusalem a praise in the earth. These watchmen stand upon their watch-tower, waiting for an answer to these prayers, Hab. ii. 1; and, therefore, when the good news comes, they have it first; and the longer they have continued, and the more importunate they have been in praying for it, the more will they be elevated when it comes. They shall "lift up the voice; with the voice together shall they sing" in concert, to invite others to join with them in their praises; and that which above all things will transport him with pleasure is, that "they shall see eye to eye," that is, face is face. Whereas God had been a God hiding himself, and they could scarce discern any thing of his favour through the dark cloud of their afflictions, now the cloud is scattered they shall plainly see it. They shall see Zion's king eye to eye; so it was fulfilled when the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us; and there were those that saw his glory, Jno. i. 14; and looked upon it, 1 Jno. i. 1. They shall see an exact agreement and correspondence between the prophecy and the event, the promise and the performance; they shall see how they look one upon another eye to eye, and be satisfied that the same God spoke the one and did the other. When the Lord shall bring again Zion out of her captivity, the prophets shall from thence receive and give fuller discoveries than ever of God's good-will to his people; and applying this also, as the foregoing verse, to gospel times, it is a promise of the pouring out of the Spirit upon gospel ministers, as a spirit of wisdom and revelation, to lead them into all truth, so that they shall see eye to eye; shall see God's grace more clearly than the Old Testament saints could see it; and they shall herein be unanimous. In these great things concerning the common salvation, they shall concur in their sentiments as well as their songs; nay, St. Paul seems to allude to this, when he makes it the privilege of our future state, that we shall see face to face.

2nd. Zion's waste places shall then rejoice, because they shall be surprisingly comforted; ver. 9, "Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem," that is, all parts of Jerusalem, for it was all in ruins; and even those parts that seemed to lie most desolate shall share in the joy; and they, having little expected it, shall break forth into joy, as men that dream, Ps. cxxvi. 1, 2. Let them sing together. Note, Those that share in mercies ought to join in praises. Here is matter for joy and praise. First. God's people will have the comfort of this salvation; and what is the matter of our rejoicing ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving. He hath redeemed Jerusalem; that is, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, that were sold into the hands of their enemies; and thereby he hath comforted his people that were in sorrow. The redemption of Jerusalem is the joy of all God's people, whose character it is that they look for that redemption, Lu. ii. 38. Secondly. God will have the glory of it; ver. 10, He "hath made bare his holy arm," that is, manifested and displayed his power in the eyes of all the nations. God's arm is a holy arm, stretched out in purity and justice, in defence of holiness, and in pursuance of his promise. Thirdly. All the world will have the benefit of it. In the great salvation wrought out by our Lord Jesus, the arm of the Lord was revealed, and all the ends of the earth were made to see the great salvation; that is, not as spectators of it only, (as they saw the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon,) but as sharers in it. Some of all nations, the most remote, shall partake of the benefits of the redemption. This is applied to our salvation by Christ; Lu. iii. 6, "All flesh shall see the salvation of God," that great salvation.

Secondly. It is here spoken of as a great business, which ought to be managed with abundance of care and circumspection. When the liberty is proclaimed,

1. Let the people of God hasten out of Babylon with all convenient speed Though they are never so well settled there, let them not think of taking root in Babylon, but "Depart ye, depart ye," (ver. 11,) "Go ye out of the midst of her," not only those that are in the borders, but those that are in the midst, in the heart of the country, let them be gone. Babylon is no place for Israelites; as soon as they have leave to go, let them lose no time; with this word God stirred up the spirits of those that were moved to go up, Ezr. i. 5; and it is a call to all those who are yet in the bondage of sin and Satan, to make use of the liberty which Christ hath proclaimed to them. And if the Son make them free, they shall be free indeed.

2. Let them take heed of carrying away with them any of the pollutions of Babylon; "Touch no unclean thing." Now God makes bare his holy arm for you, be ye holy as he is, and keep yourselves from every wicked thing. When they came out of Egypt, they brought with them the idolatrous customs of Egypt, Eze. xxiii. 3, which were their ruin; let them take heed of doing so now they come out of Babylon. Note, When we are receiving any special mercy from God, we ought more carefully than ever to watch against all impurity; but especially let them be clean that bear the vessels of the Lord, that is, the priests that had the charge of the vessels of the sanctuary, when they were restored by a particular grant, to carry them to Jerusalem, Ezr. i. 7; viii. 24. Let them not only avoid touching any unclean thing, but be very careful to cleanse themselves according to the purification of the sanctuary. Christians are made to our God spiritual priests, Rev. i. 5; they are to bear the vessels of the Lord, are intrusted to keep the ordinances of God pure and entire. It is a good thing committed to them, and they ought to be no form nor beauty, that we should look upon him; no comely appearance, that we should desire him." This change is not necessary; but the whole might be translated in the past tense: "He grew up before him like a tender plant, and like a root out of dry ground; he had no form nor comeliness that we should regard him, and no beauty that we should desire him." The general sense is in any case quite clear.

liii. 3 We may translate the second clause, "As one from whom men hide their faces, he was despised and we esteemed him not." The rendering suggested in the margin, "he hid as it were his face from us," is certainly wrong. Hengstenberg proposes, "like one hiding his face from us;" but this also is inconsistent with the context, which requires the sense given by our translators.

liii. 4. The word for "griefs" commonly means sicknesses of body, and that for "sorrows" is used both of pains and sorrows.

liii. 5. "Pierced" conveys the idea of the word rendered clean, to wash their hands in innocency, and so to compass God's altars, and carry his vessels, and keep themselves pure.

3. Let them depend upon the presence of God with them and his protection in their remove, ver. 12. Ye "shall not go out with haste." They were to go with a diligent haste, not to lose time, nor linger as Lot in Sodom; but they were not to go with a diffident, distrustful haste, as if they were afraid of being pursued, as when they came out of Egypt, or of having the orders for their release recalled and countermanded. No, they shall find, that as for God his work is perfect; and therefore, they need not make more haste than good speed. Cyrus shall give them an honourable discharge, and they shall have an honourable return, and not steal away; for the Lord will go before them as their general and commander-in-chief; and the God of Israel will be their rearward, or he that will gather up them that are left behind. God will both lead their van and bring up their rear; that is, he will secure them from enemies, that either meet them or follow them; for with his favour will he compass them. The pillar of cloud and fire, when they came out of Egypt, sometimes went behind them to secure their rear, Ex. xiv. 19, and God's presence with them would now be that to them which that pillar was a visible token of. Those that are in the way of their duty are under God's special protection; and he that believeth this will not make haste.

13 Behold, my servant shall deal prudently,
He shall be exalted and extolled, and be very high.
14 As many were astonied at thee;
His visage was so marred more than any man,
And his form more than the sons of men:
15 So shall he sprinkle many nations;
The kings shall shut their mouths at him:
For that which had not been told them shall they see;
And that which they had not heard shall they consider.

Here, as in other places, for the confirming of the faith of God's people, and the encouraging of their hope in the promises of temporal deliverances, the prophet passeth from them to speak of the great salvation which should in the fulness of time be wrought out by the Messiah. As the prophecy of Christ's incarnation was intended for the ratification of the promise of their deliverance from the Assyrian army, so this of Christ's death and resurrection is to confirm the promise of their return out of Babylon; for both these salvations were typical of the great redemption, and the prophecies of them had a reference to that. This prophecy, which begins here, and is continued to the end of the next chapter, points as plainly as can be at Jesus Christ. The ancient Jews understand it of the Messiah, though the modern Jews take a great deal of pains to pervert it; and some of ours (no friends therein to the Christian religion) will have it understood of Jeremiah; but Philip, who from hence preached Christ to the eunuch, hath put it past dispute, that of him speaketh the prophet this, of him, and of no other man, Acts viii. 34, 35. Here,

First. God owns Christ to be both commissioned and qualified for his undertaking. 1. He is appointed to it. He is my servant, whom I employ, and therefore will uphold. In his undertaking he doth his Father's will, seeks his Father's honour, and serves the interests of his Father's kingdom. 2. He is qualified for it. He shall deal prudently; for the Spirit of wisdom and understanding shall rest upon him, ch. xi. 2. The word is used concerning David, when he behaved himself wisely, 1 Sam. xviii. 14. Christ is wisdom itself, and in the contriving and carrying on of the work of our redemption there appeared much of "the wisdom of God in a mystery," 1 Cor. ii. 7. Christ, when he was here upon earth, dealt very prudently, to the admiration of all.

Secondly. He gives a short prospect both of his humiliation and his exaltation. See here,

1. How he humbled himself. Many were astonished at him, as they were at David, when by reason of his sorrows and troubles he became "a wonder unto many," Ps. lxxi. 7. Many admired to see what base usage he met with, how inveterate people were against him, how inhuman, and what indignities were done him. "His visage was marred more than any man's," when he was buffeted, smitten on the cheek, and crowned with thorns, and "hid not his face from shame and spitting." His face was foul with weeping, for he was a man of sorrows; he that really was fairer than the children of men had a good face spoiled with the abuses that were done him. Never was man used so barbarously; his form, when he took upon him the form of a servant, was more mean and abject than that of any of the sons of men. They that saw him said, Sure never man looked so miserably; a worm, and no man, Ps. xxii. 6. The nation abhorred him, ch. xlix. 7; treated him as the offscouring of all things. Never was sorrow like unto his sorrow.

2. How highly God exalted him, and therefore exalted him because he humbled himself. Three words are used for this; ver. 13, "He shall be exalted and extolled, and be very high." God shall exalt him, men shall extol him, and with both he shall be very high, higher than the highest, higher than the heavens. He shall prosper in his work, and succeed in it, and that shall raise him very high. 1st. Many nations shall be the better for him, for he shall sprinkle them, and not the Jews only; the blood of sprinkling shall be applied to their consciences to purify them. He suffered, and died, and so sprinkled many nations; for in his death there was a fountain opened, Zec. xiii. 1. He shall "sprinkle many nations" by his heavenly doctrine, which shall drop as the dew, and distil as the rain. Moses' did so only on one nation, Deu. xxxii. 2, but Christ's on many nations. He shall do it by baptism, which is the washing of the body with pure water, Heb. x. 22; so that this promise had its accomplishment when Christ sent his apostles to disciple all nations, by baptizing or sprinkling them. 2nd. The great ones of the nations shall shew him respect; "Kings shall shut their mouths at him," that is, they shall not open their mouths against him as they had done, to contradict and blaspheme his sacred oracles; nay, they shall acquiesce in, and be well pleased with, the methods he takes of setting up his kingdom in the world. They shall with great humility and reverence receive his oracles and laws, as those who, when they heard Job's wisdom, "after his speech spake not again," Job xxix. 9. 22. "Kings shall see and arise," ch. xlix. 7. 3rd. The mystery, which was kept secret from the beginning of the world, shall by him be "made known to all nations for the obedience of faith," as the apostle speaks, Rom. xvi. 25, 26. "That which had not been told them shall they see." The Gospel brings to light things new and unheard of, which will awaken the attention and engage the reverence of kings and kingdoms. This is applied to the preaching of the Gospel in the Gentile world, Rom. xv. 21, where these words are quoted according to the Septuagint translation; "To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see, and they that have not heard shall understand." As the things revealed had long been kept secret, so the persons to whom they were revealed had long been kept in the dark, but now they shall see, and consider the glory of God shining in the face of Christ, which before they had not been told of, they had not heard. That shall be discovered to them by the Gospel of Christ which could never be told them by all the learning of their philosophers, or the art of their diviners, or any of their pagan oracles. Much had been said in the Old Testament concerning the Messiah, much had been told them, and they had heard it. But, as the queen of Sheba said concerning Solomon, what they shall see in him when he comes shall far exceed what had been told them. Christ disappointed the expectations of those who looked for a Messiah according to their fancies, as the carnal Jews, but outdid theirs who looked for such a Messiah as was promised. According to their faith, nay, and beyond it, it was to them.

CHAPTER LIII.

The two great things which the Spirit of Christ in the Old Testament prophets testified beforehand, were the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow, 1 Pet. i. 11. And that which Christ himself, when he expounded Moses and all the prophets, shewed to be the drift and scope of them all was, that Christ ought to suffer, and then to enter into his glory, Lu. xxiv. 26, 27. But nowhere, in all the Old Testament, are these two so plainly and fully prophesied of as here in this chapter, out of which divers passages are quoted with application to Christ in the New Testament. This chapter is so replenished with the unsearchable riches of Christ, that it may be called rather the gospel of the evangelist Isaiah, than the prophecy of the prophet Isaiah. We may observe here, I. The reproach of Christ's sufferings; the meanness of his appearance; the greatness of his grief; and the prejudices which many conceived from thence against his doctrine, ver. 1—3. II. The rolling away of this reproach, and the stamping of an immortal honour upon his sufferings, notwithstanding the disgrace and ignominy of them, by four considerations: 1. That therein he did his Father's will, ver. 4, 6, 10; 2. That thereby he made atonement for the sin of man, ver. 4—6, 8, 11, 12; for it was not for any sin of his own that he suffered, ver. 9; 3. That he bore his sufferings with an invincible and exemplary patience, ver. 7; 4. That he should prosper in his undertaking, and his sufferings should end in his immortal honour, ver. 10—12. By mixing faith with the prophecy of this chapter, we may improve our acquaintance with Jesus Christ and him crucified, with Jesus Christ and him glorified; dying for our sins, and rising again for our justification.

WHO hath believed our report?
And to whom is the arm of the LORD revealed?
2 For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant,
And as a root out of a dry ground: [him,
He hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see
There is no beauty that we should desire him
3 He is despised and rejected of men;
A man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief:
And we hid as it were our faces from him;
He was despised, and we esteemed him not.

The prophet, in the close of the former chapter, had foreseen and foretold the kind reception which the Gospel of Christ should find among the Gentiles: that nations and their kings should bid it welcome; that they who had not seen him, yet should believe in him; and, though they had not any prophecies among them of gospel grace, which might raise their expectations, and dispose them to entertain it; yet, upon the first notice of it, they should give it its due weight and consideration. Now here he foretells with wonder the unbelief of the Jews, notwithstanding the previous notices they had of the coming of the Messiah in the Old Testament, and the opportunity they had of being personally acquainted with them. Observe here,

First. The contempt they put upon the Gospel of Christ, ver. 1 The unbelief of the Jews in our Saviour's time, is expressly said to be the fulfilling of this word, Jno. xii. 38; and it is applied likewise to the little success which the apostles' preaching met with among Jews and Gentiles, Rom. x. 16. Note, 1. Of the many that hear the report of the Gospel there are few, very few, that believe it. It is reported openly and publicly, not whispered in a corner, or confined to the schools, but proclaimed to all; and it is so faithful a saying, and so well worthy of all acceptation, that one would think it should be universally received and believed, but it is quite otherwise. Few believed the prophets who spake before of Christ; when he came himself none of the rulers or of the Pharisees followed him; and but here and there one of the common people. When the apostles carried this report all the world over, some in each place believed, but comparatively very few. It is so still of the many that profess to believe this report; there are few that cordially embrace it, and submit to the power of it. 2. Therefore, people believe not the report of the Gospel, because the arm of the Lord is not revealed to them; they do not discern, nor will be brought to acknowledge, that Divine power which goes along with the word. The arm of the Lord is made bare, (as was said ch. lii. 10,) in the miracles that were wrought to confirm Christ's doctrine, in the wonderful success of it, and its energy upon the conscience,—though it is a still voice, it is a strong one; but they do not perceive this, nor do they experience in themselves that working of the Spirit which makes the word effectual. They believe not the Gospel, because by rebelling against the light they had they had forfeited the grace of God, which, therefore, he justly denied them, and withheld from them, and for want of that they believed not. 3. This is a thing we ought to be much affected with. It is to be wondered at, and greatly lamented; and ministers may go to God and complain of it to him, as the prophet here. What pity is it that such rich grace should be received in vain; that precious souls should perish at the pool's side, because they will not step in and be healed.

Secondly. The contempt they put upon the person of Christ, because of the meanness of his appearance, ver. 2, 3. And this seems to come in as a reason why they rejected his doctrine, because they were prejudiced against his person. When he was on earth, many that heard him preach, and could not but approve of what they heard, yet would not give it any regard or entertainment, because it came from one that made so small a figure, and had no external advantages to recommend him. Observe here,

1. The low condition he submitted to, and how he abased and emptied himself. The entry he made into the world, and the character he wore in it, were no way agreeable to the ideas which the Jews had formed of the Messiah, and their expectations concerning him, but quite the reverse.

1st. It was expected that his extraction should be very great and noble. He was to be the son of David, of a family that had a "name like unto the name of the great men that are in the earth," 2 Sam. vii. 9. But he sprang out of this royal and illustrious family when it was reduced and sunk; and Joseph, that son of David that was his supposed father, was but a poor carpenter, perhaps a ship-carpenter, for most of his relations were fishermen. This is here meant by his being "a root out of a dry ground," his being born of a mean and despicable family in the north, in Galilee; of a family out of which, like a dry and

"wounded." The word "for" represents the Hebrew "from," which also signifies "through," "by means of," and "because of," and in this last sense we think it is used in the verse before us.

liii. 6. The expression "hath laid on him" is objected to by some, who would substitute "hath caused to meet on him," or even "hath caused to rush on him." These corrections are, however, not necessary, and our version may stand.

liii. 8. This is a difficult verse, and explanations of it vary much. The word for "prison" means "constraint," and may allude either to distress or to confinement, and it has been rendered here in both ways. Grotius says, "Christ was taken away from among the living by captivity and judgment." There is even more diversity about the next clause, "And who shall declare his generation?" Some explain it, "Who will declare the length of his life?" others, "Who of his contemporaries will consider it?" others, "His manner of life who would declare?" others, "Who can declare his posterity?" others, desert ground, nothing green, nothing great was expected; in a country of such small repute, that it was thought no good thing could come out of it. His mother being a virgin was as dry ground, yet from her he sprung, who is not only fruit, but root; the seed on the stony ground had no root. But, though Christ grew out of a dry ground, he is both the root and the offspring of David, the root of the good olive.

2nd. It was expected that he should make a public entry, and come in pomp, and with observation; but instead of that, he grew up before God, not before men. God had his eye upon him, but men regarded him not; he grew up as a tender plant, silently and insensibly, and without any noise; as the corn, that tender plant, grows up, we know not how, Mar. iv. 27. Christ rose as a tender plant, which one would have thought might easily have been crushed, and that one frosty night would have nipped it. The Gospel of Christ, in its beginning, was as a grain of mustard seed, so inconsiderable did it seem, Mat. xiii. 31, 32.

3rd. It was expected that he should have some uncommon beauty in his face and person, which should charm the eye, attract the heart, and raise the expectations of all that saw him. But there was nothing of that in him; not that he was in the least deformed or misshapen, but he had "no form nor comeliness," nothing extraordinary, which one might have thought to meet with in the countenance of an incarnate Deity. Those who saw him could not see that there was any beauty in him that they should desire him; nothing in him "more than another beloved," Cant. v. 9. Moses, when he was born, was exceeding fair; to that degree, that it was looked upon as a happy presage, Acts vii. 20; Heb. xi. 23. David, when he was anointed, was of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to, 1 Sam. xvi. 12. But our Lord Jesus had nothing of that to recommend him. Or, it may refer not so much to his person as to the manner of his appearing in the world, which had nothing in it of sensible glory. His Gospel is preached, not with the enticing words of man's wisdom, but with all plainness, agreeable to the subject.

4th. It was expected that he should live a pleasant life, and have a full enjoyment of all the delights of the sons and daughters of men, which would have invited all sorts to him; but, quite contrary, he was "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." It was not only his last scene that was tragical, but his whole life was so; not only mean, but miserable,—

'——But one continued chain
Of labour, sorrow, and consuming pain.'—Sir R. Blackmore.

Thus, being made sin for us, he underwent the sentence sin had subjected us to, that we should eat in sorrow all the days of our life, Gen. iii. 17, and thereby relaxed much of the rigour and extremity of the sentence as to us. His condition was, upon many accounts, sorrowful; he was unsettled, had not where to lay his head, lived upon alms, was opposed and menaced, and "endured the contradiction of sinners against himself." His spirit was tender, and he admitted the impressions of sorrow; we never read that he laughed, but often that he wept. Lentulus, in his epistle to the Roman senate concerning Jesus, saith he was never seen to laugh; and so worn and macerated was he with continual grief, that when he was but a little above thirty years of age he was taken to be near fifty, Jno. viii. 57. Grief was his intimate acquaintance; for he acquainted himself with others' grievances, and sympathised with them, and he never set his own as at a distance; for in his transfiguration he talked of his own decease, and in his triumph wept over Jerusalem. Let us look unto him and mourn.

2. The low opinion that men had of him upon this account; they being generally apt to judge of persons and things by the sight of the eye, and according to outward appearance, they saw no beauty in him, that they should desire him. There was a great deal of true beauty in him, the beauty of holiness, and the beauty of goodness, enough to render him the desire of all nations; but the far greater part of those among whom he lived and conversed, saw none of his beauty, for it was spiritually discerned. Carnal hearts see no excellency in the Lord Jesus, nothing that should induce them to desire an acquaintance with him, or interest in him. Nay, he is not only not desired, but he is despised and rejected, abandoned and abhorred, a reproach of men, an abject,—one that men were shy of keeping company with, and had not any esteem for; a worm, and no man. He was despised as a mean man, rejected as an ill man; he was "the stone which the builders refused;" they would not have him to reign over them. Men that should have had so much reason as to understand things better, so much tenderness as not to trample upon a man in misery,—men whom he came to seek and save,—they rejected him; "We hid as it were our faces from him," looked another way, and his sufferings were as nothing to us, though never sorrow was like unto his sorrow. Nay, we not only carried it as unconcerned about him, but as loathing him, and having him in detestation. It may be read, He hid as it were his face from us, concealed the glory of his majesty, and drew a veil over it; and therefore "he was despised, and we esteemed him not," because we could not see through that veil. Christ having undertaken to make satisfaction to the justice of God, for the injury man had done him in his honour by sin, (and God cannot otherwise be injured but in his holiness,) he did it not only by divesting himself of the glories due to an incarnate Deity, but by submitting himself to the disgraces due to the worst of men and malefactors; and thus by vilifying himself he glorified his Father. But this is a good reason why we should esteem him highly, and study to do him honour. Let him be received by us whom men rejected.

4 Surely he hath borne our griefs,
And carried our sorrows:
Yet we did esteem him stricken,
Smitten of God, and afflicted.
5 But he was wounded for our transgressions,
He was bruised for our iniquities:
The chastisement of our peace was upon him;
And with his stripes we are healed.
6 All we like sheep have gone astray;
We have turned every one to his own way;
And the LORD hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.
7 He was oppressed, and he was afflicted,
Yet he opened not his mouth:
He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter,
And as a sheep before her shearers is dumb,
So he openeth not his mouth.
8 He was taken from prison and from judgment:
And who shall declare his generation?
For he was cut off out of the land of the living:
For the transgression of my people was he stricken.
9 And he made his grave with the wicked,
And with the rich in his death;
Because he had done no violence,
Neither was any deceit in his mouth.

In these verses we have,

First. A farther account of the sufferings of Christ. Much was said before, but more is said here, of the very low condition to which he abased and humbled himself, to which he became obedient, even to the death of the cross.

1. He had griefs and sorrows. Being acquainted with them, he kept up the acquaintance, and did not grow shy, no, not of such melancholy acquaintance. Were griefs and sorrows allotted him? He bore them, and blamed not his lot; he carried them, and did neither shrink from them nor sink under them. The load was heavy, and the way long; and yet he did not tire, but persevered to the end, till he said, "It is finished."

2. He had blows and bruises; he was stricken and smitten, and afflicted. His sorrows bruised him, he felt pain and smart from them; they touched him in the most tender part, especially when God was dishonoured, and when he forsook him upon the cross. All along he was smitten with the tongue, when he was cavilled at and contradicted, put under the worst of characters, and had all manner of evil said against him. At last he was smitten with the hand, with blow after blow.

3. He had wounds and stripes. He was scourged, not under the merciful restriction of the Jewish law, which allowed not above forty stripes to be given to the worst of malefactors, but according to the usage of the Romans. And his scourging, doubtless, was the more severe, because Pilate intended it as an equivalent for his crucifixion; and yet it proved a preface to it. He was wounded in his hands, and feet, and side; though it was so ordered that "not a bone of him should be broken," yet he had scarce any where a whole skin, (how fond soever we are to sleep in one, even when we are called out to suffer for him,) but from the crown of the head, which was crowned with thorns, to the soles of his feet, which were nailed to the cross, nothing appeared but wounds and bruises.

4. He was wronged and abused, ver. 7; he was oppressed, injuriously treated, and hardly dealt with. That was laid to his charge which he was perfectly innocent of; that laid upon him which he did not deserve; and in both he was oppressed and injured. He was afflicted both in mind and body; being oppressed, he laid it to heart, and though he was patient was not stupid under it; but he mingled his tears with those of the oppressed, that have no comforter, because on the side of the oppressors there is power, Eccl. iv. 1. Oppression is a sore affliction, it has made many a wise man mad, Eccl. vii. 7; but our Lord Jesus, though when he was oppressed he was afflicted, yet he kept possession of his own soul.

5. He was judged and imprisoned; that is implied in his being taken from prison and judgment, ver. 8. God having made him sin for us, he was proceeded against as a malefactor, he was apprehended and taken into custody, and made a prisoner; he was judged, accused, tried, and condemned according to the usual forms of law. God filed a process against him, judged him in pursuance of that process, and clapped him up in the prison of the grave, at the door of which a stone was rolled and sealed.

6. He was cut off by an untimely death "from the land of the living," though he lived a most useful life, did so many good works; and they were all such, that one would be apt to think it was for some of them that they stoned him. He was stricken to the death, to the grave, which he made with the wicked; for he was crucified between two thieves, as if he had been the worst of the three; and yet with the rich, for he was buried in a sepulchre that belonged to Joseph, an honourable counsellor. Though he died with the wicked, and, according to the common course of dealing with criminals, should have been buried with them, in the place were he was crucified; yet God here foretold, and providence so ordered it, that he should make his grave with the innocent, with the rich, as a mark of distinction put between him and those that really deserve to die, even in his sufferings.

Secondly. A full account of the meaning of his sufferings. It was a very great mystery that so excellent a person should suffer such hard things; and it is natural to ask with amazement how it came about. What evil has he done? His enemies indeed looked upon him as suffering justly for his crimes; and, though they could lay nothing to his charge, they esteemed him "stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted," ver. 4. Because they hated him, and run him down, they thought God did; that he was his enemy and fought against him, and therefore they were the more enraged against him, saying, "God hath forsaken him, persecute and take him," Ps. lxxi. 11. Those that are justly smitten are smitten of God, for by him princes decree justice; and so they looked upon him to be smitten, justly put to death, as a blasphemer, a deceiver, and an enemy to Cæsar. They that saw him hanging on the cross inquired not into the merits of his cause; but took it for granted that he was guilty of every thing laid to his charge, and that therefore vengeance suffered him not to live. Thus Job's friends esteemed him smitten of God, because there was something uncommon in his sufferings. It was true that he was smitten of God, ver. 10, (or, as some read it, 'he was God smitten and afflicted,' the Son of God, though smitten and afflicted,) but not in the sense that they meant it; for it is true he suffered all these things, but,

1. He never did any thing in the least to deserve this hard usage. Whereas he was charged with perverting the nation, and sowing sedition, it was utterly false, "he had done no violence," but "went about doing good." And whereas he was called "that deceiver," he never deserved that character, for there was no deceit in his mouth, ver. 9, to which the apostle refers, 1 Pet. ii. 22, "He did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth;" he never offended either in word or deed, nor could any of his enemies take up that challenge of his, "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" The judge that condemned him owned he found no fault in him; and the centurion that executed him professed that certainly he was a righteous man.

2. He carried himself under his sufferings so as to make it appear that he did not suffer as an evil-doer; for, though he was oppressed and afflicted, yet he "opened not his mouth," ver. 7, no, not so much as to plead his own innocency, but freely offered himself to suffer and die for us, and objected nothing against it. This quite takes away the scandal of the cross, that he voluntarily submitted to it for great and holy ends. By his wisdom he could have evaded the sentence, and by his power have resisted the execution; but thus it was written, and thus it behoved him to suffer; this commandment he received from his Father, and therefore he was led "as a lamb to the slaughter," without any difficulty or reluctancy. He is the Lamb of God, and as a sheep is dumb before the shearers, nay, before the butchers, so he opened not his mouth; which notes

"Of his generation who considered?" Perhaps the true meaning is, "Who can declare (or describe) the men of his generation?" i.e., who can adequately set forth the awful character of the generation in which he suffered? Another explanation deserves to be noticed, viz., "And none of his contemporaries gives an account of it"—this great sufferer is passed over unnoticed. There is no reference either to "the eternal generation of the Son" or to the incarnation, because the word for generation here in Hebrew conveys no such idea.

liii. 9. This verse has been translated in many ways. The Greek has, "And I will give the wicked for his burial, and the rich for his death." The Syriac is, "A wicked man gave his grave, and a rich man, at his death." The Latin of Jerome is, "And he shall give the ungodly for his burial, and a rich man for his death." There is no real difficulty in the rendering of the words, "He gave with wicked men his grave, and with a rich man in his death." The question is, what do they mean? We answer, the Lord appointed not only his exemplary patience under affliction, Ps. xxxix. 9, and his meekness under reproach, Ps. xxxviii. 13, but his cheerful compliance with his Father's will; "Not my will, but thine be done: Lo, I come." And by this will we are sanctified; his making his own soul, his own life, an offering for our sin.

3. It was for our good, and in our stead, that Jesus Christ suffered; this is asserted here plainly and fully, and in a very great variety of emphatical expressions.

1st. It is certain we are all guilty before God; we have all sinned, and come short of the glory of God; ver. 6, "All we like sheep have gone astray," one as well as another. The whole race of mankind lies under the stain of original corruption, and every particular person stands charged with many actual transgressions. We have all gone astray from God our rightful owner, alienated ourselves from him, from the ends he designed us to move towards, and the way he appointed us to move in. We have gone astray like sheep, that are apt to wander, and are unapt, when they are gone astray, to find the way home again. And that is our true character; we are bent to backslide from God, but altogether unable of ourselves to return to him. This is mentioned not only as our infelicity, that we go astray from the green pastures, and expose ourselves to the beasts of prey, but as our iniquity; we affront God in going astray from him, for we turn aside every one to his own way, and thereby set up ourselves and our own will in competition with God and his will; which is the malignity of sin. Instead of walking obediently in God's way, we have turned wilfully and stubbornly to our own way, the way of our own heart, the way that our own corrupt appetites and passions lead us to; we have set up for ourselves, to be our own masters, our own carvers, to do what we will, and have what we will. Some think it intimates our own evil way, in distinction from the evil way of others. Sinners have their own iniquity, their beloved sin, which doth most easily beset them; their own evil way, that they are particularly fond of, and bless themselves in.

2nd. Our sins are our sorrows and our griefs, ver. 4. Or, as it may be read, our sicknesses and our wounds. The Seventy read it, 'our sins;' and so the apostle. 1 Pet. ii. 24. Our original corruptions are the sickness and disease of the soul, an habitual indisposition; our actual transgressions are the wounds of the soul, which put conscience to pain, if it be not seared and senseless. Or, our sins are called our griefs and sorrows, because all our griefs and sorrows are owing to our sins; and our sins deserve all griefs and sorrows, even those that are most extreme and everlasting.

3rd. Our Lord Jesus was appointed, and did undertake, to make satisfaction for our sins, and so to save us from the penal consequences of them. First. He was appointed to do it, by the will of his Father; for "the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." God chose him to be the Saviour of poor sinners, and would have him to save them in this way, by bearing their sins, and the punishment of them; not the idem,—'the same' that we should have suffered, but the tantundem—that which was more than equivalent for the maintaining of the honour of the holiness and justice of God in the government of the world. Observe here, 1*st.* In what way we are saved from the ruin to which by sin we were become liable. By laying our sins on Christ, as the sins of the offerer were laid upon the sacrifice, and those of all Israel upon the head of the scapegoat. Our sins were made to meet upon him, so the margin reads it; the sins of all that he was to save, from every place and every age, met upon him, and he was met with for them. They were made to fall upon him, so some read it, as those rushed upon him that came with swords and staves to take him. The laying of our sins upon Christ implies the taking of them off from us; we shall not fall under the curse of the law if we submit to the grace of the Gospel. They were laid upon Christ when he was made sin, that is, a sin offering for us; and redeemed us from the curse of the law by being made a curse for us, and so he put himself into a capacity to make those easy that come to him heavy laden under the burthen of sin: see Ps. xl. 6—12. 2*nd.* By whom this was appointed. It was the Lord that laid our iniquities on Christ. He contrived this way of reconciliation and salvation, and he accepted of the vicarious satisfaction Christ was to make. Christ was delivered to death by the "determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God." None but God had power to lay our sins upon Christ, both because the sin was committed against him, and to him the satisfaction was to be made, and because Christ, on whom the iniquity was to be laid, was his own Son, the Son of his love, and his holy child Jesus, who himself knew no sin. 3*rd.* For whom this atonement was to be made. It was "the iniquity of us all" that was laid on Christ; for in Christ there is a sufficiency of merit for the salvation of all, and a serious offer made of that salvation to all, which excludes none that do not exclude themselves. It intimates that this is the one only way of salvation. All that are justified are justified by having their sins laid on Jesus Christ; and, though they were never so many, he is able to bear the weight of them all. Secondly. He undertook to do it. God laid upon him our iniquity. But did he consent to it? Yes, he did; for so some think is the true reading of the next words, ver. 7, "It was exacted, and he answered." Divine justice demanded satisfaction for our sins, and he engaged to make the satisfaction. He became our surety, not as originally bound with us, but as bail to the action. 'Upon me be the curse, my Father.' And therefore, when he was seized, he indented with those into whose hands he surrendered himself, that that should be his disciples' discharge, "If you seek me, let these go their way," Jno. xviii. 8. By his own voluntary susception he made himself responsible for our debt, and it is well for us he was responsible. Thus he restored that which he took not away.

4. Having undertaken our debt, he underwent the penalty. Solomon saith, "He that is surety for a stranger shall smart for it." Christ being surety for us, did smart for it. 1st. He "bore our griefs, and carried our sorrows," ver. 4. He not only submitted to the common infirmities of the human nature, and the common calamities of human life which sin had introduced, but he underwent the extremities of grief when he said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful." He made the sorrows of this present time heavy to himself, that he might make them light and easy for us. Sin is the wormwood and the gall in the affliction and the misery. Christ bore our sins, and so bore our griefs, bore them off us, that we should never be pressed above measure. This is quoted, Mat. viii. 17, with application to the compassion Christ had for the sick that came to him to be cured, and the power he put forth to cure them. 2nd. He did this by suffering for our sins; ver. 5, "He was wounded for our transgressions;" that is, to make atonement for them, and to purchase for us the pardon of them. Our sins were the thorns in his head, the nails in his hands and feet, the spear in his side. Wounds and bruises were the consequences of sin, what we deserved, and what we had brought upon ourselves, ch. i. 9. That these wounds and bruises, though they are painful, may not be mortal, Christ was "wounded for our transgressions," was tormented or pained (the word is used for the pains of a woman in travail) for our revolts and rebellions; he was bruised or crushed for our iniquities, they were the procuring cause of his death. To the same purpose, ver. 8, "For the transgression of my people was he stricken," was the stroke upon him that should have been upon us; and so some read it, 'He was cut off for the iniquity of my people, unto whom the stroke belonged, or was due.' He was delivered to death for our offences, Rom. iv. 25. Hence it is said to be "according to the Scriptures," according to this scripture, that Christ died for our sins, 1 Cor. xv. 3. Some read this, 'by the transgression of my people,' that is, by the wicked hands of the Jews, who were in profession God's people, he was stricken, was crucified and slain, Acts ii. 23. But, doubtless, we are to take it in the former sense, which is abundantly confirmed by the angel's prediction of the Messiah's undertaking, solemnly delivered to Daniel, that he shall finish transgression, make an end of sin, and make reconciliation for iniquity, Dan. ix. 24.

5. The effect and consequent of this to us is our peace and healing, ver. 5. 1st. Hereby we have peace. "The chastisement of our peace was upon him;" that is, he, by submiting to these chastisements, slew the enmity, and settled an amity between God and man; he made peace by the blood of his cross. Whereas by sin we were become odious to God's holiness, and obnoxious to his justice, through Christ God is reconciled to us, and not only forgives our sins, and saves us from ruin, but takes us into friendship and fellowship with himself, and thereby peace, that is, all good, comes unto us, Eph. ii. 14. "He is our peace," Col. i. 20. Christ was in pain, that we might be at ease; he gave satisfaction to the justice of God, that we might have satisfaction in our own minds; might be of good cheer, knowing that through him our sins are forgiven us. 2nd. Hereby we have healing; for by "his stripes we are healed." Sin is not only a crime for which we were condemned to die, and which Christ purchased for us the pardon of, but it is a disease which tends directly to the death of our souls, and which Christ provided for the cure of. By his stripes, that is, the sufferings he underwent, he purchased for us the Spirit and grace of God to mortify our corruptions, which are the distempers of our souls, and to put our souls in a good state of health, that they may be fit to serve God, and prepared to enjoy him. And by the doctrine of Christ's cross, and the powerful arguments it furnisheth us with against sin, the dominion of sin is broken in us, and we are fortified against that which feeds the disease.

6. The effect and consequent of this to Christ was, his resurrection and advancement to perpetual honour. This perfectly makes the offence of the cross to cease; he yielded himself to die as a sacrifice, as a lamb; and, to make it evident that the sacrifice he offered of himself was accepted, we are told here, ver. 8, 1st. That he was discharged. "He was taken from prison and from judgment;" that is, whereas he was imprisoned in the grave, under a judicial process, lay there under an arrest for our debt, and judgment seemed to be given against him, he was, by an express order from heaven, taken out of the prison of the grave; an angel was sent on purpose to roll away the stone, and set him at liberty; by which the judgment given against him was reversed, and taken off; which redounds not only to his honour, but to our comfort, for being delivered for our offences he was raised again for our justification. That discharge of the bail amounted to a release of the debt. 2nd. That he was preferred. "Who shall declare his generation?" his age, or continuance, so the word signifies; the time of his life? he rose to die no more; death had no more dominion over him; he that was dead is alive, and lives for evermore. And who can describe that immortality to which he rose; or number the years and ages of it? And therefore he is advanced to this eternal life, because for the transgression of his people he became obedient to death. We may take it as speaking the time of his usefulness; as David is said to serve his generation, and so to answer the end of living. Who can declare how great a blessing Christ by his death and resurrection will be to the world? And some, by his generation, understand his spiritual seed. Who can count the vast numbers of converts that shall by the Gospel be begotten to him, like the dew of the morning?

> 'When thus exalted, he shall live to see
> A numberless believing progeny;
> Of his adopted sons the godlike race
> Exceed the stars that heaven's high arches grace.'—Sir R. Blackmore.

Of which generation of his let us pray as Moses did for Israel, "The Lord God of our fathers make them a thousand times so many more as they are, and bless them as he hath promised them," Deu. i. 11.

10 Yet it pleased the LORD to bruise him;
He hath put him to grief:
When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin,
He shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days,
And the pleasure of the LORD shall prosper in his hand.
11 He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied:
By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many;
For he shall bear their iniquities.
12 Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great,
And he shall divide the spoil with the strong;
Because he hath poured out his soul unto death:
And he was numbered with the transgressors;
And he bare the sin of many,
And made intercession for the transgressors.

In the foregoing verses the prophet had testified very particularly of the sufferings of Christ, yet mixing some hints of the happy issue of them. Here he again mentions his sufferings, but largely foretells the glory that should follow. We may observe in these verses,

First. The service and sufferings of Christ's estate of humiliation. Come and see how he loved us; see what he did for us.

1. He submitted to the frowns of heaven; ver. 10, "Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him," to put him to pain, or torment, or grief. The Scripture nowhere saith that Christ in his sufferings underwent the wrath of God; but it saith here, 1st. That the Lord bruised him; not only permitted men to bruise him, but awakened his own sword against him, Zec. xiii. 7. They esteemed him smitten of God for some very great sin of his own, ver. 4. Now it was true that he was smitten of God, but it was for our sin. The Lord bruised him; for he did not spare him, but "delivered him up for us all," Rom. viii. 32. He it was that put the bitter cup into his hand, and obliged him to drink it, Jno. xviii. 11, having laid upon him our iniquity. He it was that made him sin and a curse for us, and turned to ashes all his burnt offering, in token of the acceptance of it, Ps. xx. 3. 2nd. That he bruised him so as to put him to grief. Christ accommodated himself to this dispensation, and received the impressions of grief from his Father's delivering him up; and he was troubled to that degree that it put him into an agony, and he began to be amazed and very heavy. 3rd. It pleased the Lord to do this; that is, he determined to do it, it was the result of an eternal counsel; and he delighted in it, as it was an effectual method for the salvation of man, and the securing and advancing of the honour of God.

2. He substituted himself in the room of sinners as a sacrifice; he made his

the Messiah a grave with wicked men, or the grave of a malefactor; and yet he ordained that he should be with a rich man when he was dead. In other words, Christ died as a criminal, but was honourably interred by the wealthy Joseph of Arimathea, because no real crime had been proved against him, and he was indeed righteous and good.

liii. 10. In their endeavours to find new renderings, interpreters have greatly exercised their ingenuity upon this chapter; but there are real difficulties in it, as in the verse before us. We understand the first clause to mean, "And the Lord was pleased to smite and to afflict him." The next clause may be explained, "When his soul shall make a trespass offering," &c. The question here is whether the soul is the offerer or the offering, or whether the words simply signify he shall make the offering. The last explanation is feeble and vague, but either of the others is conformable at once with the Hebrew, and both of them are true, for he offered himself.

soul an offering for sin. He himself explains this, Mat. xx. 28, that he came to give his life a ransom for many. When men brought bulls and goats as sacrifices for sin, they made them offerings, for they had an interest in them, God having put them under the feet of man; but Christ made himself an offering: it was his own act and deed. We could not put him in our stead, but he put himself, and said, "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit;" in a higher sense than David said, or could say it, Father, I commit my soul to thee; I deposit it in thy hands, as the life of a sacrifice, and the price of pardons. Thus he shall bear the iniquities of the many that he designed to justify, ver. 11; shall take away the sin of the world, by taking it upon himself, Jno. i. 29. This is mentioned again, ver. 12, "He bare the sin of many," who, if they had been to bear it themselves, it would have sunk them to the lowest hell. See how this string is harped upon; for whenever we think of the sufferings of Christ, we must see him in them bearing our sin.

3. He subjected himself to that which to us is the wages of sin; ver. 12, "He hath poured out his soul unto death;" poured it out as water; so little account did he make of it, when the laying of it down was the appointed means of our redemption and salvation. He loved not his life unto the death, and his followers the martyrs did likewise, Rev. xii. 11. Or, rather, he poured it out as a drink offering, to make his sacrifice complete; poured it out as wine, that his blood might be drink indeed, as his flesh is meat indeed, to all believers. There was not only a colliquation of his body in sufferings, (Ps. xxii. 14, "I am poured out like water.) but a surrender of his spirit; he poured out that even unto death, though he is the Lord of life.

4. He suffered himself to be ranked with sinners, and yet offered himself to be an intercessor for sinners, ver. 12. 1st. It was a great aggravation of his sufferings, that he was numbered with the transgressors. He was not only condemned as a malefactor, but was executed in company with two notorious malefactors, and he in the midst, as if he had been the worst of the three; in which circumstance of his suffering the evangelist tells us this prophecy was fulfilled, Mar. xv. 27, 28. Nay, the vilest malefactor of all, Barabbas, that was both traitor, thief, and murderer, was put in election with him for the favour of the people, and carried it; for they would not have Jesus released, but Barabbas. In his whole life he was numbered among the transgressors; for he was called and counted a sabbath-breaker, a drunkard, and a friend to publicans and sinners. 2nd. It was a great commendation to his sufferings, and redounded very much to his honour, that in his sufferings he "made intercession for the transgressors," for those that reviled and crucified him, for he prayed, "Father, forgive them;" thereby shewing not only that he forgave them, but that he was now doing that upon which their forgiveness, and the forgiveness of all other transgressors, was to be founded. That prayer was the language of his blood, crying not for vengeance, but for mercy, and therein it speaketh better things than that of Abel, even for those who with wicked hands shed it.

Secondly. The graces and glories of his estate of exaltation, and the graces he confers on us, are not the least of the glories conferred on him; these are secured to him by the covenant of redemption, which these verses give us some idea of. He promiseth to make his soul an offering for sin, consents that the Father shall deliver him up, and undertakes to bear the sin of many; and for and in consideration hereof, the Father promiseth to glorify him, not only with the glory he had as God before the world was, Jno. xvii. 5, but with the glories of the Mediator.

1. He shall have the glory of an everlasting Father. Under this title he was brought into the world, ch. ix. 6, and he shall not fail to answer the title when he goes out of the world. This was the promise made to Abraham, (who herein was a type of Christ,) that he should be the "father of many nations," and so be "the heir of the world," Rom. iv. 13, 17. As he was the root of the Jewish church, and the covenant was made with him and his seed, so is Christ of the universal church, and with him (and his spiritual seed) is the covenant of grace made, which is grounded upon, and grafted in, the covenant of redemption, which here we have some of the glorious promises of. It is promised,

1st. That the Redeemer shall have a seed to serve him, and to bear up his name, Ps. xxii. 30. True believers are the seed of Christ; the Father gave them to him to be so, Jno. xvii. 6. He died to purchase and purify them to himself; fell to the ground as a corn of wheat, that he might bring forth much fruit, Jno. xii. 24. The word, that incorruptible seed of which they are born again, is his word; the Spirit, the great author of their regeneration, is his Spirit; and it is his image that is formed in them, and they are conformed to.

2nd. That he shall live to see his seed. Christ's children have a living Father; and because he lives they shall live also, for he is their life. Though he died, he rose again, and left not his children orphans, but took effectual care to secure to them the Spirit, the blessing, and the inheritance of sons. He shall see a great increase of them. The word is plural; "He shall see his seeds,' multitudes of them, so many that they cannot be numbered.

3rd. That he shall himself continue, to take care of the affairs of this numerous family: "He shall prolong his days." Many, when they see their seed, their seed's seed, have wished to depart in peace; but Christ will not commit the care of his family to any other; no, he shall himself live long, and of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, for he ever lives. Some refer it to believers; "He shall see a seed that shall prolong his days;" agreeing with Ps. lxxxix. 29, 36, "His seed shall endure for ever." Whilst the world stands Christ will have a church in it, which he himself will be the life of.

4th. That his great undertaking shall be successful, and shall answer expectation. "The pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand." God's purposes shall take effect, and not one iota or tittle of them shall fail. Note, First. The work of man's redemption is in the hands of the Lord Jesus, and it is in good hands. It is well for us they are in his, for our own hands are not sufficient for us; but he is able to save to the uttermost. They are in his hands who upholdeth all things. Secondly. It is the good pleasure of the Lord, which notes not only his counsel concerning it, but his complacency in it, and therefore God loved him, and was well pleased in him, because he undertook to lay down his life for the sheep. Thirdly. It has prospered hitherto, and shall prosper, whatever obstructions or difficulties have been, or may be in the way of it. Whatever is undertaken according to God's pleasure shall prosper, ch. xlvi. 10. Cyrus, a type of Christ, shall perform all God's pleasure, ch. xliv. 28, and therefore no doubt Christ shall. Christ was so perfectly well qualified for his undertaking, and prosecuted it with so much vigour, and it was (from first to last) so well laid, that it could not fail to prosper, to the honour of his Father, and the salvation of all his seed.

5th. That he shall himself have abundant satisfaction in it: ver. 11, "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied." He shall see it beforehand, (so it may be understood,) he shall, with the prospect of his sufferings, have a prospect of the fruit, and he shall be satisfied in the bargain; he shall see it, when it is accomplished in the conversion and salvation of poor sinners. Note, First. Our Lord Jesus was in travail of soul for our redemption and salvation; in great pain, but with longing desire to be delivered; and all the pains and throes he underwent were in order to it, and hastened it on. Secondly. Christ doth and will see the blessed fruit of the travail of his soul in the founding and building up of his church, and the eternal salvation of all that were given him. He will not come short of his end in any part of his work, but will himself see that he has not laboured in vain. Thirdly. The salvation of souls is a great satisfaction to the Lord Jesus. He will reckon all his pains well bestowed, and himself abundantly recompensed, if the many sons be by him brought through grace to glory. Let him have this, and he has enough. God will be sanctified and glorified; penitent believers shall be justified, and then he is satisfied. Thus, in conformity to Christ, it shall be a satisfaction to us if we can do any thing to serve the interests of God's kingdom in the world. Let it always be our meat and drink, as it was Christ's, to do God's will.

2. He shall have the glory of bringing in an everlasting righteousness, for so it was foretold concerning him, Dan. ix. 24, and here to the same purpose; "By his knowledge;" that is, the knowledge of him, and faith in him, "shall my righteous servant justify many;" for he shall bear the sins of many, and so lay a foundation for our justification from sin. Note, 1st. The great privilege that flows to us from the death of Christ is justification from sin, our being acquitted from that guilt which alone can ruin us, and accepted into God's favour, which alone can make us happy. 2nd. Christ, that purchased our justification for us, applies it to us by his intercession made for us, his Gospel preached to us, and his Spirit witnessing in us. The Son of man had power, even on earth, to forgive sin. 3rd. There are many whom Christ justifies. Not all, multitudes perish in their sins; yet many, even as many as he gave his life a ransom for, as many as the Lord our God shall call. He shall justify, not here and there one that is eminent and remarkable, but those of the many, the despised multitude. 4th. It is by faith that we are justified, by our consent to Christ and the covenant of grace. In this way we are saved, because thus God is most glorified, free grace most advanced, self most abased, and our happiness most effectually secured. 5th. Faith is the knowledge of Christ, and without knowledge there can be no true faith. Christ's way of gaining the will and affections is by enlightening the understanding, and bringing that unfeignedly to assent to Divine truths. 6th. That knowledge of Christ, and faith in him, by which we are justified, hath reference to him, both as a servant to God, and as a surety for us. First. As one that is employed for God to pursue his designs, and secure and advance the interests of his glory. He is my righteous servant, and as such justifies men. God hath authorized and appointed him to do it; it is according to God's will, and for his honour, that he doth it; he is himself righteous, and of his righteousness have all we received. He that is himself righteous, (for he could not have made atonement for our sin, if he had had any sin of his own to answer for,) is made of God to us righteousness; the Lord our righteousness. Secondly. As one that hath undertaken for us. We must know him, and believe in him, as one that bore our iniquities—saved us from sinking under the load by taking it upon himself.

3. He shall have the glory of obtaining an incontestable victory and universal dominion; ver. 12, Because he has done all these good services, "therefore will I divide him a portion with the great," and, according to the will of the Father, "he shall divide the spoil with the strong;" as a great general, when he hath driven the enemy out of the field, takes the plunder of it for himself and his army, which is both an unquestionable evidence of the victory, and a recompence for all the toils and perils of the battle. Note, 1st. God the Father has engaged to reward the services and sufferings of Christ with great glory. I will set him among the great, highly exalt him, and give him a name above every name, and with great riches, for he shall divide the spoil, shall have abundance of graces and comforts to bestow upon all his faithful soldiers. 2nd. Christ comes at his glory by conquest. He hath set upon the strong man armed, dispossessed him, and divided the spoil. He hath vanquished principalities and powers, sin and Satan, death and hell, the world and the flesh; these are the strong that he hath disarmed and taken the spoil of. 3rd. Much of the glory with which Christ is recompensed, and the spoil which he hath divided, consists in the vast multitudes of willing, faithful, loyal subjects, that shall be brought in to him; for so some read it, 'I will give many to him, and he shall obtain many for a spoil;' that is, God will give him the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession, Ps. ii. 8. His dominion shall be from sea to sea. Many shall be wrought upon by the grace of God to give up themselves to him, to be ruled, and taught, and saved by him; and hereby he shall reckon himself honoured, and enriched, and abundantly recompensed for all he did, and all he suffered. 4th. What God designed for the Redeemer he shall certainly gain the possession of; I will divide it to him: and immediately it follows, He shall divide it, notwithstanding the opposition that is given to him; for as Christ finished the work that was given him to do, so God completed the recompence that was promised him for it, for he is both able and faithful. 5th. The spoil which God divided to Christ, he divides, (it is the same word,) he distributes it among his followers; for when he led captivity captive he received gifts for men, that he might give gifts to men; for, as he has told us, Acts xx. 35, he did himself reckon it more blessed and honourable to give than to receive. Christ conquered for us, and through him we are more than conquerors. He hath divided the spoils, the fruits of his conquest, to all that are his; let us therefore cast in our lot among them.

CHAPTER LIV.

The death of Christ is the life of the church, and of all that truly belong to it; and therefore, very fitly, after the prophet had foretold the sufferings of Christ, he foretells the flourishing of the church, which is a part of his glory, and that exaltation of him which was the reward of his humiliation. It was promised him, that he should see his seed; and this chapter is an explication of that promise. It may easily be granted, that it has a primary reference to the welfare and prosperity of the Jewish church, after their return out of Babylon, which (as other things that happened to them) was typical of the glorious liberty of the children of God, which through Christ we are brought into; yet it cannot be denied but that it has a farther and principal reference to the Gospel church, into which the Gentiles were to be admitted. And the first words being understood by the apostle of the New Testament Jerusalem, Gal. iv. 26, 27, may serve as a key to the whole chapter, and that which follows. It is here promised concerning the Christian church, I. That though the beginnings of it were small, yet it should be greatly enlarged by the accession of many to it from among the Gentiles, that had been wholly destitute of church privileges, ver. 1—5. II. That though sometimes God might seem to withdraw from her, and suspend the tokens of his favour, yet he would return in mercy, and would not return to contend with them any more, ver. 6—10. III. That though for a while she was in sorrow, and under oppression, yet she should at length be advanced to greater honour and splendour than ever, ver. 11, 12. IV. That knowledge, righteousness, and peace, should flourish and prevail, ver. 13, 14. V. That all attempts against the church should be baffled, and she should be secured from the malice of her enemies, ver. 14—17.

SING, O barren, thou that didst not bear;
Break forth into singing, and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child:
For more are the children of the desolate
Than the children of the married wife, saith the LORD

liii. 12. "He was numbered with the transgressors;" i.e., he was counted as a transgressor—his grave was made with the wicked. The words "and made intercession for the transgressors" are in the Greek rendered "and he was delivered for their transgressions," a translation which St. Paul seems to have in view in Rom. iv. 25, "Who was delivered for our offences."

liv. 1. Zion is here personified as a woman who has neither husband nor children. She is called "desolate," which term is used of a widow by St. Paul in 1 Tim. v. 5—"Now she that is a widow indeed, and desolate." Of such a one it is declared that her children shall be more numerous than those of the married wife. The sense is that the Church, which had been as a widow or an unmarried woman, should be restored to favour and honour, and should be greatly increased. The immense extent of the promise is indicated by the following verses, which show that the Gentiles should be brought in.

2 Enlarge the place of thy tent,
And let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations:
Spare not, lengthen thy cords,
And strengthen thy stakes; [left;
3 For thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the
And thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles,
And make the desolate cities to be inhabited.
4 Fear not; for thou shalt not be ashamed:
Neither be thou confounded; for thou shalt not be put to shame:
For thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth,
And shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood
5 For thy Maker is thine husband; [any more.
The Lord of hosts is his name;
And thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel;
The God of the whole earth shall he be called.

If we apply this to the state of the Jews after their return out of captivity, it is a prophecy of the increase of their nation after they were settled in their own land. Jerusalem had been in the condition of a wife written childless, or a desolate, solitary widow; but now it is promised that the city should be replenished, and the country peopled again; that not only the ruins of Jerusalem should be repaired, but the suburbs of it extended on all sides, and a great many buildings erected upon new foundations; that those estates which had for many years been wrongfully held by the Babylonian Gentiles should now return to the right owners. God will again be a husband to them, and the reproach of their captivity, and the small number to which they were then reduced shall be forgotten. And it is to be observed, that by virtue of the ancient promise made to Abraham of the increase of his seed, when they were restored to God's favour, they multiplied greatly. Those that first came up out of Babylon were but forty-two thousand, Ezr. ii. 64, about a fifteenth part of their number when they came out of Egypt; many came dropping to them afterwards, but we may suppose that to be the greatest number that ever came in a body; and yet about five hundred years after, a little before their destruction by the Romans, a calculation was made by the number of the paschal lambs, and the lowest computation by that rule, (allowing only ten to a lamb, whereas they might be twenty,) made the nation to be near three millions. Josephus saith, seven and twenty hundred thousand and odd.—De Bel Jud., l. vii., c. 17. But we must apply it to the church of God in general, I mean the kingdom of God among men, God's city in the world, the children of God incorporated. Now observe,

First. The low and languishing estate of religion in the world for a long time before Christianity was brought in. It was like one barren, that did not bear, or "travail with child;" was like one desolate, that had lost husband and children. The church lay in a little compass, and brought forth little fruit. The Jews were indeed by profession married to God, but few proselytes were added to them. The rising generations were unpromising, and serious godliness manifestly lost ground among them. The Gentiles had less religion among them than the Jews; their proselytes were in a dispersion; and the children of God, like the children of a broken, reduced family, were scattered abroad, Jno. xi. 52; did not appear, nor make any figure.

Secondly. Its recovery from this low condition by the preaching of the Gospel and the planting of the Christian church.

1. Multitudes were converted from idols to the living God. Those were the church's children that were born again, were partakers of a new and Divine nature by the Word. "More were the children of the desolate than of the married wife;" that is, there were more good people found in the Gentile church, (when that was set up,) that had long been afar off, and without God in the world, than ever were found in the Jewish church. God's sealed ones, out of the tribes of Israel, are numbered, Rev. vii. 4, and they were but a remnant compared with the thousands of Israel. But those of other nations were so many, and crowded in so thick, and lay so much scattered in all parts, that no man could number them, ver. 9. Sometimes more of the power of religion is found in those places and families that have made little show of it, and have enjoyed but little of the means of grace, than in others that have distinguished themselves by a flourishing profession; and then more are the children of the desolate, more the fruits of their righteousness than those of the married wife; so the last shall be first. Now this is spoken of as matter of great rejoicing to the church, which is called upon to break forth into singing upon this account. The increase of the church is the joy of all its friends, and strengthens their hands. The longer the church has lain desolate, the greater will the transports of its joy be, when it begins to recover the ground it has lost, and to gain more. Even in heaven, among the angels of God, there is an uncommon joy for a sinner that repenteth, much more for a nation that doth so. If the barren fig-tree at length bring forth fruit, it is well; it shall rejoice, and others with it.

2. The bounds of the church were extended much farther than ever before, ver. 2, 3. 1st. It is here supposed that the present state of the church is a tabernacle state; it dwells in tents, like the heirs of promise of old, Heb. xi. 9. Its dwelling is mean, movable, and of no strength against a storm. The city, the continuing city, is reserved for hereafter. A tent is soon taken down and shifted; so the candlestick of church privileges is soon removed out of its place, Rev. ii. 5; and, when God pleaseth, it is as soon fixed elsewhere. 2nd. Though it be a tabernacle state, it is sometimes very remarkably a growing state; and if this family increase, no matter though it be in a tent. Thus it was in the first preaching of the Gospel; it was the business of the apostles to "disciple all nations," to stretch forth the curtains of the church's habitation, to preach the Gospel there where Christ had not yet been named, Rom. xv. 20, to leaven those towns and countries with the Gospel that had hitherto been strangers to it, and so to lengthen the cords of this tabernacle, that more might be enclosed; which would make it necessary to strengthen the stakes proportionably, that they might bear the weight of the enlarged curtains. The more numerous the church grows, the more cautious she must be to fortify herself against errors and corruptions, and to support her seven pillars, Pr. ix. 1. 3rd. It was a proof of Divine power going along with the Gospel, that in all places it grew and prevailed mightily, Acts xix. 20. It broke forth as the breaking forth of waters, on the right hand, and on the left; that is, on all hands: the Gospel spread itself into all parts of the world; there were eastern and western churches. The church's seed inherited the Gentiles, and the cities that had been desolate, that is, destitute of the knowledge and worship of the true God, came to be inhabited; that is, to have religion set up in them, and the name of Christ professed.

3. This was the comfort and honour of the church; ver. 4, "Fear not, for thou shalt not be ashamed," as formerly, of the straitness of thy borders, and the fewness of thy children, which thine enemies upbraided thee with; but shalt forget the reproach of thy youth, because there shall be no more ground for that reproach. It was the reproach of the Christian religion in its youth, that none of the rulers or princes of this world embraced it, and that it was entertained and professed by a despicable handful of men; but after a while nations were discipled, the empire became Christian, and then this reproach of its youth was forgotten.

4. This was owing to the relation in which God stood to his church, as her husband; ver. 5, "Thy Maker is thine husband." Believers are said to be married to Christ, that they may "bring forth fruit unto God," Rom. vii. 4. So the church is married to him, that she may bear and bring up a holy seed to God, that shall be accounted to him for a generation. Jesus Christ is the church's Maker, by whom she is formed into a people; her Redeemer, by whom she is brought out of captivity, the bondage of sin, the worst of slaveries. This is he that hath espoused her to himself. And, 1st. He is "the Lord of Hosts," he has an irresistible power, an absolute sovereignty, and a universal dominion! Kings, that are lords of some hosts, find there are others that are lords of other hosts, as many and mighty as theirs; but God is the Lord of all hosts. 2nd. He is "the Holy One of Israel," the same that presided in the affairs of the Old Testament church, and was the Mediator of the covenant made with it. The promises made to the New Testament Israel are as rich and sure as those made to the Old Testament Israel; for he that is our Redeemer is the Holy One of Israel. 3rd. He is, and shall be called, the Lord of the whole earth, as God, and as Mediator; for he is the heir of all things. But then he shall be called so when the ends of the earth shall be made to see his salvation; all the earth shall call him their God, and have an interest in him. Long he had been called in a peculiar manner the God of Israel; but now the partition wall between Jew and Gentile being taken down, he shall be called "The God of the whole earth;" there where he has been, as at Athens itself, an unknown God.

6 For the Lord hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, [God.
And a wife of youth, when thou wast refused, saith thy 7 For a small moment have I forsaken thee;
But with great mercies will I gather thee.
8 In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment;
But with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee,
Saith the LORD thy Redeemer.
9 For this is as the waters of Noah unto me:
For as I have sworn
That the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth;
So have I sworn
That I would not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee.
10 For the mountains shall depart,
And the hills be removed;
But my kindness shall not depart from thee,
Neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed,
Saith the LORD that hath mercy on thee.

The seasonable succour and relief which God sent to his captives in Babylon, when they had a discharge from their bondage there, is here foretold, as a type and figure of all those consolations of God, which are treasured up for the church in general, and all believers in particular, in the covenant of grace.

First. Look back to former troubles, and, in comparison with them, God's favours to his people appear very comfortable, ver. 6—8; where observe,

1. How sorrowful the church's condition had been. She had been as a woman forsaken, whose husband was dead or had fallen out with her, though she was a "wife of youth;" upon which account she is grieved in spirit, takes it very ill, frets, and grows melancholy upon it; or, as one refused and rejected, and therefore full of discontent. Note, Even those that are espoused to God may yet seem to be refused and forsaken, and may be grieved in spirit under the apprehensions of it. Those that shall never be forsaken and left in despair may yet for a time be perplexed and in distress. The similitude is explained ver. 7, "For a small moment have I forsaken thee;" and ver. 8, "In a little wrath I hid my face from thee." When God continues his people long in trouble he seems to forsake them; so their enemies construe it, Ps. lxxi. 11; so they themselves misinterpret it, ch. xlix. 14. When they are comfortless under their troubles, because their prayers and expectations are not answered, God hides his face from them, as if he regarded them not, nor designed them any kindness. Thus God owns he had done, for he keeps an account of the afflictions of his people; and though he never turned his face against them, as against the wicked, Ps. xxxiv. 16, he remembers how often he turned his back upon them. This arose indeed from his displeasure; it was in wrath that he forsook them, and hid his face from them, ch. lvii. 17. Yet it was but in a little wrath,—not that God's wrath ever is a little thing, or to be made light of, (who knows the power of his anger?)—but little in comparison with what they had deserved, and what others justly suffer, on whom the full vials of his wrath are poured out. He did not stir up all his wrath; but God's people, though they be sensible of never so small a degree of God's displeasure, cannot but be grieved in spirit because of it. And for the continuance of it, it was but for a moment, a small moment; for God doth not keep his anger against his people for ever; no, it is soon over: as he is slow to anger, so he is swift to shew mercy. The afflictions of God's people, as they are light, so they are but for a moment,—a cloud, that presently blows over.

2. How sweet the returns of mercy would be to them, when God shall come and comfort them according to the time that he afflicted them. God called them into covenant with himself, then when they were forsaken and grieved; he called them out of their afflictions, then when they were most pressing, ver. 6. God's anger endures for a moment, but God will gather his people when they think themselves neglected; will gather them out of their dispersions, that they may return in a body to their own land; will gather them into his arms, to protect them, embrace them, and bear them up; and will gather them at last to himself liv. 2. The sense is, "Make thy tent wider and larger, extend its curtains, and use longer cords and stronger stakes for supporting it."

liv. 5. The Hebrew words for "Maker" and "husband" are plural here, hence Vitringa and others have thought the Trinity was indicated. The Greek is, "For the Lord who made thee, the Lord of Sabaoth is his name;" and the Syriac, "For thy Lord made thee so, the mighty Lord is his name."

liv. 7. The Syriac is, "in a little wrath," &c.; and the Greek, "for a little time."

liv. 8. The Syriac is, "in great wrath," and the idea is favoured by some critics, who render the words, "in an effusion of wrath."

liv. 9. For "waters of Noah," in the first line, some ancient versions and other authorities read "days of Noah," but no change is required.

liv. 11, 12. For "fair colours" the Syriac has "beryls," and it —will gather the wheat into the barn. He will have mercy on them; which supposeth the turning away of his anger, and the admitting of them again into his favour. God's gathering of his people takes rise from his mercy, not any merit of theirs: and it is "with great mercies," ver. 7, "with everlasting kindness," ver. 8. The wrath is little, but the mercies great; the wrath for a moment, but the kindness everlasting. See how one is set over against the other, that we may neither despond under our afflictions nor despair of relief.

Secondly. Look forward to future dangers, and in defiance of them. God's favours to his people appear very constant, and his kindness everlasting; for it is formed into a covenant, here called a covenant of peace, because it is founded in reconciliation, and is inclusive of all good. Now,

1. This is as firm as the covenant of providence. It is "as the waters of Noah," that is, as that promise which was made concerning the deluge, that there should never be the like again to disturb the course of summer and winter, seedtime and harvest, ver. 9. God then contended with the world in great wrath, and for a full year, and yet at length returned in mercy, everlasting mercy; for he gave his word, which was as inviolable as his oath, that Noah's flood should never return, that he would never drown the world again: see Gen. viii. 21, 22; ix. 11. And God hath ever since kept his word, though the world has been very provoking; and he will keep it to the end, for the world that now is is reserved unto fire. And thus inviolable is the covenant of grace: "I have sworn that I would not be wroth with thee," as I have been, and "rebuke thee," as I have done. He will not be so angry with them as to cast them off, and break his covenant with them, Ps. lxxxix. 34; nor rebuke them, as he hath rebuked the heathen to destroy them, and "put out their name for ever and ever," Ps. ix. 5.

2. It is more firm than the strongest parts of the visible creation; ver. 10, "The mountains shall depart," which are called everlasting mountains, and "the hills be removed," though they are called perpetual hills, Hab. iii. 6. Sooner shall they remove than God's covenant with his people be broken. Mountains have sometimes been shaken by earthquakes, and removed; but the promises of God were never broken by the shock of any event. The day will come when all "the mountains shall depart," and all "the hills be removed;" not only the tops of them covered, as they were by the waters of Noah, but the roots of them torn up; for the earth, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. But then the covenant of peace between God and believers shall continue, in the everlasting bliss of all those who are the children of that covenant. Mountains and hills signify great men, men of bulk and figure. Do these mountains seem to support the skies, (as Atlas,) and bear them up? they shall depart and be removed. Creature confidences shall fail us; in vain is salvation hoped for from those hills and mountains; but the firmament is firm, and answers its name, when those who seemed to prop it are gone. When our friends fail us, our God doth not, nor doth his kindness depart. Do these mountains threaten, and seem to top the skies, and bid defiance to them, as Pelion and Ossa? Do the kings of the earth and the rulers set themselves against the Lord? They shall depart and be removed, great mountains that stand in the way of the salvation of the church shall be made plain, Zec. iv. 7, but God's kindness shall never depart from his people; for whom he loves he loves to the end, nor shall the covenant of his peace ever be removed, for he is the Lord that hath mercy on his people. Therefore the covenant is immovable and inviolable, because it is built, not on our merit, which is a mutable, uncertain thing, but on God's mercy, which is from everlasting to everlasting.

11 O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted,
Behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colours,
And lay thy foundations with sapphires

TESSELATED PAVEMENTS.

12 And I will make thy windows of agates,
And thy gates of carbuncles,
And all thy borders of pleasant stones.
13 And all thy children shall be taught of the LORD;
And great shall be the peace of thy children.
14 In righteousness shalt thou be established:
Thou shalt be far from oppression; for thou shalt not fear:
And from terror; for it shall not come near thee.
15 Behold, they shall surely gather together, but not by me:
Whosoever shall gather together against thee shall fall for thy sake
16 Behold, I have created the smith
That bloweth the coals in the fire,
And that bringeth forth an instrument for his work;
And I have created the waster to destroy.
17 No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper;
And every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn.
This is the heritage of the servants of the LORD,
And their righteousness is of me, saith the LORD.

Very precious promises are here made to the church in her low condition, that God would not only continue his love to his people under their troubles, as before, but that he would restore them to their former prosperity; nay, that he would raise them to greater prosperity than any they had yet enjoyed. In the foregoing chapter we had the humiliation and exaltation of Christ, here we have the humiliation and exaltation of the church; for if we suffer with him we shall reign with him. Observe,

First. The distressed state the church is here reduced to by the providence of God; ver. 11, "O thou afflicted," poor and indigent society, that art "tossed with tempest," like a ship driven from her anchors by a storm, and hurried into the ocean, where she is ready to be swallowed up by the waves, and in this condition not comforted by any compassionate friend that will sympathize with thee, or suggest to thee any encouraging considerations. Eccl. iv. 2; not comforted by any allay to thy trouble, or prospect of deliverance out of it. This was the condition of the Jews in Babylon, and afterwards, for a time, under Antiochus. It is often the condition of Christian churches, and of particular believers; without are fightings, within are fears; like the disciples in a storm, ready to perish, and where is their faith?

Secondly. The glorious state the church is here advanced to by the promise of God. God takes notice of the afflicted, distressed state of his church, and comforts her when she is most disconsolate and has no other comforter. Let the people of God, when they are afflicted and tossed, think they hear God speaking comfortably to them by these words, taking notice of their griefs and fears, what afflictions they are under, what tosses they are in, and what comforts their case calls for; when they bemoan themselves, God bemoans them and speaks to them with pity; "O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted," for in all their afflictions he is afflicted. But this is not all; he engageth to raise her up out of her affliction, and encourageth her with the assurance of great things he would do for her, both for her prosperity and for the securing of that prosperity to her.

1. Whereas now she lay in disgrace, God promiseth that which would be her beauty and honour, which would make her easy to herself, and amiable in the eyes of others.

1st. This is here promised by a similitude taken from a city; and it is an apt similitude, for the church is the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem; whereas now Jerusalem lay in ruins, a heap of rubbish, it shall not only be rebuilt, but beautified, and appear more splendid than ever; the stones shall not only be laid firm, but fine, laid with fair colours; they shall be glittering stones, 1 Chr. xxix. 2. The foundations shall be laid, or garnished, with sapphire, the most precious of all the precious stones here mentioned; for Christ, (the church's foundation,) and the foundation of the apostles and prophets, are precious above any thing else. The windows of this house, city or temple, shall be made of agate; the "gates of carbuncles," and "all the borders," the walls that enclose the courts, or the boundaries, by which her limits are marked, the mere stones, shall be "of pleasant stones," ver. 12. Never was this literally true; but it intimates, First. That God having graciously undertaken to build his church, we may expect that to be done for it, that to be wrought in it, which is very great and uncommon. Secondly. That the glory of the New Testament church shall far exceed that of the Jewish church, not in external pomp and splendour, but in those gifts and graces of the Spirit, which are infinitely more valuable; that wisdom which is more precious than rubies, Pr. iii. 15, than the precious onyx and the sapphire, and which the topaz of Ethiopia cannot equal, Job xxviii. 16—19. Thirdly. That the wealth of this world, and those things of it that are accounted most precious, shall be despised by all the true living members of the church, as having no value, no glory in comparison with that which far excelleth; that which the children of this world lay up in their treasures, and too often in their hearts, the children of God make pavements of, and put under their feet, the fittest place for it.

2nd. It is here promised in the particular instances of those things that shall be the beauty and honour of the church, which are, knowledge, holiness, and love, the very image of God in which man was created, renewed and restored upon it; and these are the sapphires and carbuncles, the precious and pleasant stones, with which the gospel temple shall be enriched and beautified; and these wrought by the power and efficacy of those doctrines which the apostle compares to gold, silver, and precious stones, that are to be built upon the foundation, 1 Cor. iii. 12. Then the church is all glorious, First. When it is full of the knowledge of God, and that is promised here; ver. 13, "all thy children shall be taught of the Lord." The church's children, being born of God, shall be taught of God; being his children by adoption, he will take care of their education. It was promised ver. 1, that the church's children shall be many; but, lest we should think that being many, as sometimes it happens in numerous families, they will be neglected, and not have instruction given them so carefully as if they were but few, God here takes that work into his own hands; they shall all be taught of the Lord, and none teacheth like him. 1*st.* It is a promise of the means of instruction, and those means authorized by a Divine institution; they shall be taught of God, that is, they shall be taught by those whom God shall appoint, and whose labours shall be under his direction and blessing. He will ordain the methods of instruction, and, by his word and ordinances, will diffuse a much greater light than the Old Testament church had. Care shall be taken for the teaching of the church's children, that knowledge may be transmitted from generation to generation, and that all may be enriched with it, from the least even to the greatest. 2*nd.* It is a promise of the Spirit of illumination. Our Saviour quotes it with application to gospel grace, and makes it to have its accomplishment in all those that were brought to believe in him, Jno. vi. 45; "It is written in the prophets, they shall be all taught of God;" from whence he infers, that those and those only come to him by faith that have "heard and learned of the Father," that are "taught by him as the truth is in Jesus," Eph. iv. 21. There shall be a plentiful effusion of the Spirit of grace upon Christians, to teach them all things, Jno. xiv. 26. Secondly. When the members of it live in love and unity among themselves; "Great shall be the peace of thy children." Peace may be taken here for all good; as where no knowledge of God is no good is to be expected, so those that are taught of God to know him are in a fair way to prosper for both worlds; great peace have they that know and love God's law, Ps. cxix. 165. But it is often put for love and unity, and so we may take it. All that are taught of God are taught to love one another, 1 Thes. iv. 9, and that will keep peace among the church's children, and prevent their falling out by the way. Thirdly. When holiness reigns, for that, above anything, is the beauty of the church, ver. 14; "In righteousness shalt thou be established." The reformation of manners, the reformation of purity, the due administration of public justice, and the prevailing of honesty and fair dealing among men, are the strength and stability of any church or state. The kingdom of God, set up by the Gospel of is very probable that some kind of ornamental stone is meant. The Hebrew word for sapphires is sapphirim. The word rendered "windows" is otherwise explained of battlements or minarets. For "agates" some have "ruby," but it is not certain what particular gem is meant. For "carbuncles," again, some have "sparkling gems," &c. Throughout the Bible the identification of precious stones is an acknowledged difficulty, but happily not one of much importance.

liv. 15. There has been much variety in the interpretation of this verse. Fürst says the verb rendered "gather together" means to be angry or exasperated. That some hostile display is meant can scarcely be doubted, but its exact form is uncertain.

liv. 16. The sense of this verse may be, "I create the smith who forms the weapons of war, and the destroyer who employs them." Some explain the latter clause, "I create destruction to destroy them;" i.e., to destroy the weapons forged by the smith; so Jarchi, Gesenius, &c.

Christ, is not meat and drink, but this righteousness and peace, holiness and love.

2. Whereas now she lay in danger, God promiseth that which would be her protection and security. God engageth here that though, in the day of her distress, without were fightings and within were fears, now she should be safe from both.

1st. There shall be no fears within; ver. 14, "Thou shalt be far from oppression;" those that have oppressed thee shall be removed; those that would oppress thee shall be restrained, and therefore thou shalt not fear; but mayest look upon it as a thing at a mighty distance, that thou art now in no danger of. Thou shalt be far from terror; not only from evil, but from the fear of evil, for "it shall not come near thee," so as to do thee any hurt, or to put thee in any fright. Note, Those are far from terror that are far from oppression; for it is as great a terror as any other to a people to have the rod of government turned into the serpent of oppression, because against this there is no fence, nor flight from it.

2nd. There shall be no fightings without. Though attempts should be made upon them to insult them, to invade their country, or besiege their towns, they should all be in vain, and none of them succeed, ver. 15. It is granted, "they shall surely gather together" against thee; thou must expect it; the confederate force of hell and earth will be renewing their assaults. As long as there is a devil in hell, and a persecutor out of it, God's people must expect frequent alarms; but, (1.) God will not own them, will not give them either commission or countenance; They gather together, hand joins in hand, but it is not by me. God gave them no such order as he did to Sennacherib, to take the spoil, and take the prey, ch. x. 6; and therefore, (2.) Their attempt will end in their own ruin. "Whosoever shall gather together against thee," be they never so many, and never so mighty, they shall not only be baffled, but they "shall fall for thy sake," or, they shall fall before thee, which shall be the just punishment of their enmity to thee. God will make them to fall for the sake of the love he bears to his church, and the care he hath of it, in answer to the prayers made by his people, and in pursuance of the promises made to them: they shall fall, that thou mayest stand, Ps. xxvii. 2.

Now, that we may with the greatest assurance depend upon God for the safety of his church, we have here,

First. The power of God over the church's enemies asserted, ver. 16. The truth is, they have no power but what is given them from above, and he that gave them their power can limit and restrain them; hitherto they shall go, and no farther.

1*st.* They cannot carry on their design without arms and weapons of war; and the smith that makes those weapons is God's creature, and he gave him his skill to work in iron and brass, Ex. xxxi. 3, 4, and particularly to make proper instruments for warlike purposes. It is melancholy to think, as if men did not die fast enough of themselves, how ingenious and industrious they are to make instruments of death, and to find out ways and means to kill one another. The smith blows the coals in the fire, to make his iron malleable, to soften it first, that it may be hardened into steel, and so he may bring forth an instrument proper for their work that seek to destroy. It is the iron age that is the age of war. But God has created the smith, and therefore can tie his hands, so that the project of the enemy shall miscarry, as many a project has done, for want of arms and ammunition. Or, the smith that forges the weapons, is perhaps put here for the council of war that forms the design, blows the coals of contention, and brings forth the plan of the war; these can do no more than God will let them.

2*nd.* They cannot carry it on without men, they must have soldiers, and it is God that createth the waster to destroy. Military men value themselves upon their great offices and splendid titles, and even the common soldiers call themselves gentlemen, but God calls them wasters made to destroy, for wasting and destruction is their business. They think their own ingenuity, labour, and experience made them soldiers, but it was God that created them, and gave them strength and spirit for that hazardous employment, and therefore he not only can restrain them, but will serve his own purposes and designs by them.

Secondly. The promise of God concerning the church's safety solemnly laid down, as "the heritage of the servants of the Lord," ver. 17, as that which they may depend upon, and be confident of:—that God will protect them from their adversaries both in camps and courts.

1*st.* From their field adversaries, that think to destroy them by force, and violence, and dint of sword; "No weapon that is formed against thee," though never so artfully formed by the smith that blows the coals, ver. 16, though never so skilfully managed by the waster that seeketh to destroy, "shall prosper;" it shall not prove strong enough to do any harm to the people of God; it shall miss its mark, shall fall out of the hand, or perhaps recoil in the face of him that useth it against thee. It is the happiness of the church that no weapon formed against it shall prosper long, and therefore the folly of its enemies will at length be made manifest to all, for they are but preparing instruments of ruin for themselves.

2*nd.* From their law adversaries, that think to run them down, under colour of right and justice. When the weapons of war do not prosper, there are tongues that rise in judgment; both are included in the gates of hell, that seek to destroy the church, for they had their courts of justice, as well as their magazines and military stores, in their gates. The tongues that rise in judgment against the church are such as either demand a dominion over it, as if God's children were their lawful captives, pretending an authority to oppress their consciences, or such as misrepresent them, and falsely accuse them, and by slanders and calumnies endeavour to make them odious to the people, and obnoxious to the government. This the enemies of the Jews did to incense the kings of Persia against them, Ezr. iv. 12; Est. iii. 8. But these insulting, threatening tongues thou shalt condemn; thou shalt have wherewith to answer their insolent demands, and to put to silence their malicious reflections. Thou shalt do it by well-doing, 1 Pet. ii. 15; by doing that which will make thee manifest in the consciences even of thine adversaries, that thou art not what thou art represented to be. "Thou shalt condemn" them, that is, God shall condemn them for thee; "he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light," Ps. xxxvii. 6. Thou shalt condemn them as Noah condemned the old world that reproached him, by building the ark, and so saving his house in contempt of their contempts. The day is coming when God will reckon with wicked men for all their hard speeches which they have spoken against him, Jude 15.

The last words refer not only to this promise, but to all that go before: "This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord." God's servants are his sons, for he has provided an inheritance for them, rich, sure, and indefeasible; God's promises are their heritage for ever, Ps. cxix. 111. "And their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord." God will clear up the righteousness of their cause before men; it is with him, for he knows it; it is with him, for he will plead it. Or, their reward for their righteousness, and for all that which they have suffered unrighteously, is of God, that God who judgeth in the earth, and with whom verily there is a reward for the righteous. Or, their righteousness itself, all that in them that is good and right; it is of God, who works it in them; it is of Christ, who is made righteousness to them. Whoever God designs a heritage for hereafter, in them he will work righteousness now.

CHAPTER LV.

As we had much of Christ in ch. liii., and much of the church of Christ in ch. liv., so in this chapter we have much of the covenant of grace made with us in Christ. The sure mercies of David which are promised here, ver. 3, are understood by the apostle of the benefits which flow to us from the resurrection of Christ, Acts xiii. 34, which may serve as a key to this chapter; not but that it was intended for the comfort of the people of God that lived then, especially of the captives in Babylon, and other the dispersed of Israel; but unto us was this Gospel preached as well as unto them, and much more clearly and fully in the New Testament. Here is, I. A free and gracious invitation to all, to come and take the benefit of Gospel grace, ver. 1. II. Pressing arguments to enforce this invitation, ver. 2—4. III. A promise of the success of this invitation among the Gentiles, ver. 5. IV. An exhortation to repentance and reformation, with great encouragement given to hope for pardon and forgiveness thereupon, ver. 6—9. V. The ratification of all this, with the certain efficacy of the word of God, ver. 10, 11. And a particular instance of the accomplishment of it in the return of the Jews out of their captivity, which was intended for a sign of the accomplishment of all these other promises.

HO, every one that thirsteth,
Come ye to the waters,
And he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat;
Yea, come, buy wine and milk
Without money and without price.
2 Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread?
And your labour for that which satisfieth not?
Hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good,
And let your soul delight itself in fatness.
3 Incline your ear, and come unto me:
Hear, and your soul shall live;
And I will make an everlasting covenant with you,
Even the sure mercies of David.
4 Behold, I have given him for a witness to the people,
A leader and commander to the people.
5 Behold, thou shalt call a nation that thou knowest not,
And nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee
Because of the LORD thy God, [thee
And for the Holy One of Israel; for he hath glorified

Here, First. We are all invited to come and take the benefit of that provision which the grace of God has made for poor souls in the new covenant, of that which is the "heritage of the servants of the Lord," ch. liv. 17, and not only their heritage hereafter, but their cup now, ver. 1. Observe,

1. Who are invited; "Ho, every one." Not the Jews only, to whom first the word of salvation was sent, but the Gentiles, the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind, are called to this marriage supper; whoever can be picked up out of the highways and the hedges. It intimates, that in Christ there is enough for all, and enough for each; that ministers are to make a general offer of life and salvation to all; that in gospel times the invitation should be more largely made than it had been, and should be sent to the Gentiles; and that the gospel covenant excludes none that do not exclude themselves. The invitation is published with an Oyez, "Ho," take notice of it; "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

2. What is the qualification required in those that shall be welcome; they must thirst. All shall be welcome to gospel grace, upon those terms only that gospel grace be welcome to them. Those that are satisfied with the world and its enjoyments for a portion, and seek not for a happiness in the favour of God,—those that depend upon the merit of their own works for a righteousness, and see no need they have of Christ and his righteousness,—these do not thirst; they have no sense of their need, are in no pain or uneasiness about their souls, and therefore will not condescend so far as to be beholden to Christ. But those that thirst are invited to the waters, as those that labour and are heavy laden are invited to Christ for rest. Note, Where God gives grace, he first gives to thirst after it; and where he has given to thirst after it, he will give it, Ps. lxxxi. 10.

3. Whither they are invited; "Come ye to the waters." Come to the water side, to the ports, and quays, and wharfs on the navigable rivers, into which goods are imported, thither come and buy, for that is the market-place of foreign commodities; and to us they would have been for ever foreign, if Christ had not brought in an everlasting righteousness. Come to Christ, for he is the fountain opened, he is the rock smitten. Come to holy ordinances, to those streams that make glad the city of our God; come to them, and though they may seem to you plain and common things, like waters, yet to those who believe in Christ the things signified will be as wine and milk, abundantly refreshing. Come to the healing waters, come to the living waters; whoever will, let him come and "take the water of life," Rev. xxii. 17. And our Saviour referred to it, Jno. vii. 37, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink."

4. What they are invited to do; 1st. Come and buy. Never did any tradesman court customers that he hopes to get by so as Christ courts us to that which we only are to be the gainers by; Come and buy, and we can assure you you shall have a good bargain, which you will never repent of, or lose by. Come and buy, that is, make it your own, by an application of the grace of the Gospel to yourselves; make it your own upon Christ's terms, nay, your own upon any terms, and stand not chaffering about the terms, or deliberating whether you shall agree to them. 2nd. Come and eat; make it still more your own, as that which we eat is more our own than that which we only buy. We must buy the truth; not that we may lay it by to be looked at, but that we may feed and feast upon it, and that the spiritual life may be nourished and strengthened by it. We must buy necessary provisions for our souls; be willing to part with any thing, though never so dear to us, so that we may but have Christ, and his graces and comforts; part with sin, because it is an opposition to Christ; part with all opinion of our own righteousness, as standing in competition with Christ; and part with life itself, and its most necessary supports, rather than quit our interest in Christ. And when we have bought what we need, let us not deny ourselves the comfortable use of it, but enjoy it, and eat the labour of our hands; "Buy, and eat."

5. What is the provision they are invited to; "Come, buy wine and milk," lv. 2. For "spend" the margin gives the literal rendering, "weigh." Gold and silver were not originally coined when used for money, but were weighed. The earliest mention of coined money in the Bible is when the Jews were under Persian control.

lv. 3. "The sure mercies of David" are the faithful promises made to David. For "mercies" the Greek has "holy things;" so the Greek of Acts xiii. 34.

lv. 4. This verse may refer to David, and may be rendered, "Behold, I made him a witness to peoples, a leader and commander to peoples." At the same time the application of the words to the Messiah must be maintained, especially in view of the next verse.

lv. 13. Dr. Tristram says of the sukk of the Arabs, which is thought to be the "thorn" of this verse, that it is "a tree which is found in all the warmer parts of Palestine and about Jerusalem, but which absolutely overruns a great part of the Jordan valley, making it one impenetrable thicket." By the "fir-tree" most modern writers which will not only quench the thirst, fair water would do that, but nourish the body, and revive the spirits. The world comes short of our expectations; we promise ourselves at least water in it, but we are disappointed of that, as the troops of Tema, Job vi. 19. But Christ outdoes our expectations; we come to the waters, and would be glad of them, but we find there wine and milk, which were the staple commodities of the tribe of Judah, and which the Shiloh of that tribe is furnished with to entertain the gathering of the people to him, Gen. xlix. 10, 12. "His eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk." We must come to Christ to have milk for babes, to nourish and cherish them that are but lately born again; and with him strong men shall find that which will be a cordial to them, they shall have wine to make glad their hearts. We must part with our puddle water, nay, with our poison, that we may procure this wine and milk.

6. The free communication of this provision; Buy it "without money, and without price." A strange way of buying, not only without ready money, that is common enough, but without any money, or the promise of any; yet it seems not so strange to those who have observed Christ's counsel to Laodicea, that was wretchedly poor, to come and buy, Rev. iii. 17, 18. Our buying without money intimates, 1st. That the gifts offered us are invaluable, and such as no price can be set upon: wisdom is that which cannot be gotten for gold. 2nd. That he who offers them has no need of us, or of any returns we can make him; he makes us these proposals, not because he has occasion to sell, but because he has a disposition to give. 3rd. That the things offered are already bought and paid for; Christ purchased them at the full value, with price, not with money, but his own blood, 1 Pet. i. 19. 4th. That we shall be welcome to the benefits of the promise, though we are utterly unworthy of them, and cannot make a tender of any thing that looks like a valuable consideration. We ourselves are not of any value, nor any thing we have, or can do; and we must own it, that if Christ and heaven be ours, we may see ourselves for ever indebted to free grace.

Secondly. We are earnestly pressed and persuaded (and O that we would be prevailed with!) to accept this invitation, and make this good bargain for ourselves.

1. That which we are persuaded to is to hearken to God and to his proposals; "Hearken diligently unto me," ver. 2. Not only give me the hearing, but approve of what I say, and apply it to yourselves, ver. 3. "Incline your ear," as we do to that which we find ourselves concerned in, and pleased with; bow the ear, and let the proud heart stoop to the humbling methods of the Gospel; bend the ear this way, that you may hear with attention and remark; hear "and come unto me," not only come and treat with me, but comply with me, come up to my terms. Accept God's offers, as very advantageous; answer his demands, as very fit and reasonable.

2. The arguments used to persuade us to this are taken,

1st. From the unspeakable wrong we do to ourselves if we neglect and refuse this invitation. "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread," which will not yield you, no, not beggar's food, dry bread, when with me you may have wine and milk without money; wherefore do you spend your labour and toil for that which will not be so much as dry bread to you, for it "satisfieth not." See here, First. The vanity of the things of this world; they are not bread, nor proper food for a soul, they afford no suitable nourishment or refreshment. Bread is the staff of the natural life, but it affords no support at all to the spiritual life. All the wealth and pleasure in the world will not make one meal's meat for a soul. Eternal truth and eternal good are the only food for a rational and immortal soul, the life of which consists in reconciliation and conformity to God, and in union and communion with him, which the things of the world will not at all befriend. They satisfy not, they yield not any solid comfort and content to the soul, nor enable it to say, Now I have what I would have; nay, they do not satisfy even the appetites of the body; the more men have, the more they would have, Eccl. i. 8. Haman was unsatisfied in the midst of his abundance. They flatter, but they do not fill; they please for a while, like the dream of a hungry man who wakes and his soul is empty. They soon surfeit, but they never satisfy; cloy a man, but not content him, or make him truly easy. It is all vanity and vexation. Secondly. The folly of the children of this world; they spend their money and labour for these uncertain, unsatisfying things. Rich people live by their money, poor people by their labour, but both mistake their true interest; while the one is trading, the other toiling, for the world, both promising themselves satisfaction and happiness in it, but both miserably disappointed, God vouchsafes compassionately to reason with them: Wherefore do you thus act against your own interest? Why do you suffer yourselves to be thus imposed upon? Let us reason thus with ourselves, and let the result of these reasonings be a holy resolution not to labour for the meat that perisheth, but for that which endures to everlasting life, Jno. vi. 27. Let all the disappointments we meet with in the world help to drive us to Christ, and to seek for satisfaction in him only. This is the way to make that sure that will be made sure.

2nd. From the unspeakable kindness we do to ourselves if we accept this invitation, and comply with it. First. Hereby we secure to ourselves present pleasure and satisfaction. If you hearken to Christ, you eat that which is good, which is both wholesome and pleasant, good in itself and good for you. God's good word and promise, a good conscience, and the comforts of God's good Spirit, are a continual feast to those that hearken diligently and obediently to Christ. Their souls shall delight themselves in fatness, that is, in the richest and most grateful delights. Here the invitation is not, Come and buy, lest that should discourage, but, Come and eat; come and entertain yourselves with that which will be abundantly pleasing: "Eat, O friends." It is sad to think that men should need to be courted thus to their own bliss. Secondly. Hereby we secure to ourselves lasting happiness; "Hear, and your soul shall live;" you shall not only be saved from perishing eternally, but you shall be eternally blessed, for less than that cannot be the life of an immortal soul. The words of Christ are spirit and life, life to spirits, Jno. vi. 33, 63, the words of this life, Acts v. 20. On what easy terms is happiness offered us! it is but, Hear, and you shall live. Thirdly. The great God graciously secures all this to us: Come to me, and "I will make an everlasting covenant with you," will put myself into covenant relations, and under covenant engagements to you, and thereby settle upon you the "sure mercies of David." Note, 1*st.* If we come to God to serve him, he will covenant with us to do us good, and make us happy; such is his condescension to us and concern for us. 2*nd.* God's covenant with us is an everlasting covenant, its contrivance from everlasting, its continuance to everlasting. 3*rd.* The benefits of this covenant are mercies suited to our case, who being miserable, are the proper objects of mercy; they come from God's mercy, and are ordered every way in kindness to us. 4*th.* They are the mercies of David, such mercies as God promised to David, Ps. lxxxix. 28, 29, &c., which are called the mercies of David his servant, and are appealed to by Solomon, 2 Chr. vi. 42. It shall be a covenant as sure as that with David, Jer. xxxiii. 25, 26. The covenant of royalty was a figure of the covenant of grace, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. Or, rather, by David here we are to understand the Messiah. Covenant mercies are all his mercies; they are purchased by him, they are promised in him, they are treasured up in his hand, and out of his hand they are dispensed to us; he is the mediator and trustee of the covenant; to him this is applied, Acts xiii. 34. They are the τα ὁσια, the holy things of David, (the word used there, and by the Seventy here,) for they are confirmed by the holiness of God, Ps. lxxxix. 35, and are intended to advance holiness among men. 5*th.* They are sure mercies; the covenant being well ordered in all things is sure. It is sure in the general proposal of it; God is real and sincere, serious and in earnest, in the offer of these mercies. It is sure in the particular application of it to believers; God's gifts and callings are without repentance; they are the "mercies of David," and therefore sure, for in Christ the promises are all Yea and Amen.

Thirdly. Jesus Christ is promised for the making good of all the other promises which we are here invited to accept of, ver. 4. He is that David whose sure mercies all the blessings and benefits of the covenant are. And God hath given him in his purpose and promise, hath constituted and appointed him, and in the fulness of time will as surely send him as if he were already come, to be all that to us which is necessary to our having the benefit of these preparations. He has given him freely, for what more free than gift? There was nothing in us to merit such a favour, but Christ is the gift of God. We want one, 1. To attest the truth of the promises which we are invited to take the benefit of; and Christ is given for a witness that God is willing to receive us into his favour upon gospel terms, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers, that we may venture our souls upon those promises with an entire satisfaction. Christ is a faithful witness, we may take his word; a competent witness, for he lay in the bosom of the Father from eternity, and was perfectly apprised of the whole matter. Christ as a prophet testifies the will of God to the world, and to believe is to receive his testimony. 2. To assist us in closing with the invitation, and coming up to the terms of it. We know not how to find the way to the waters where we are to be supplied, but Christ is given to be a leader; nor what to do that we may be qualified for it, and sharers in it, but he is given for a commander, to shew us what to do, and enable us to do it. Much difficulty and opposition lies in our way to Christ; we have spiritual enemies to grapple with, but to animate us for the conflict we have a good captain, like Joshua; a leader and commander to tread our enemies under our feet, and to put us in possession of the land of promise. Christ is commander by his precept, and a leader by his example; our business is to obey him, and follow him.

Fourthly. The master of the feast being fixed, it is next to be furnished with guests, for the provision shall not be lost, or made in vain, ver. 5. 1. The Gentiles shall be called to this feast, shall be invited out of the highways and the hedges. "Thou shalt call a nation that thou knowest not," that is, that was not formerly called and owned as thy nation; that thou didst not send prophets to as to Israel, that people which God knew above all the families of the earth. The Gentiles shall now be favoured so as they never were before; their knowing God is said to be rather their being "known of God," Gal. iv. 9. 2. They shall come at the call; "Nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee." Those that had long been afar off from Christ shall be made nigh; that had been running from him shall run to him with the greatest speed and alacrity imaginable. There shall be a concourse of believing Gentiles to Christ, who, being lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to him. Now see the reason, 1st. Why the Gentiles will thus flock to Christ. It is because of the Lord his God, because he is the Son of God, and is declared to be so with power; because they now see his God is one with whom they have to do, and there is no coming to him as their God but by making an interest in his Son. Those that are brought to be acquainted with God, and understand how the concern lies between them and him, cannot but run to Jesus Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man, and there is no coming to God but by him. 2nd. Why God will bring them to him. Because he is the Holy One of Israel, true to his promises, and he hath promised to glorify him, by giving him the heathen for his inheritance. When Greeks began to inquire after Christ, he said, "The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified," Jno. xii. 22, 23. And his being glorified in his resurrection and ascension was the great argument by which multitudes were wrought upon to run to him.

6 Seek ye the LORD while he may be found,
Call ye upon him while he is near:
7 Let the wicked forsake his way,
And the unrighteous man his thoughts:
And let him return unto the LORD, and he will have mercy upon him;
And to our God, for he will abundantly pardon.
8 For my thoughts are not your thoughts,
Neither are your ways my ways, saith the LORD.
9 For as the heavens are higher than the earth,
So are my ways higher than your ways,
And my thoughts than your thoughts
10 For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven,
And returneth not thither,
But watereth the earth,
And maketh it bring forth and bud,
That it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater:
11 So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth:
It shall not return unto me void,
But it shall accomplish that which I please,
And it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.
12 For ye shall go out with joy,
And be led forth with peace: [into singing,
The mountains and the hills shall break forth before you
And all the trees of the field shall clap their hands.
13 Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree,
And instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree:
And it shall be to the LORD for a name,
For an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off.

understand the cypress. The so-called brier does not seem to be clearly identified. The myrtle is a common favourite in Bible lands.

lvi. 3—5. "The son of the stranger" is a man of foreign parentage, who has in this case become a proselyte to the Hebrew religion. The eunuch would also usually be a foreigner, as there is no reason to believe that any Jews were such, unless made so in contravention of the law, by which they were excluded from a place in the congregation. It would appear, however, that eventually eunuchs, whether foreigners or Jews made such by foreigners, were admitted to all religious privileges.

lvi. 8. This verse ends the paragraph commencing at verse 1, and shows that spiritual blessings were to be extended beyond the domain of Israel, and that the Church of the future would comprehend more than the law of Moses did.

lvi. 9. Strange foes are here summoned to afflict the faithless Israelites, whose very leaders and monitors were blind, ignorant, and

We have here a farther account of that covenant of grace which is made with us in Jesus Christ, both what is required and what is promised in the covenant, and those considerations that are sufficient abundantly to confirm our believing compliance with and reliance on that covenant. And this gracious discovery of God's good will to the children of men is not to be confined either to the Jew or to the Gentile, to the Old Testament or to the New, much less to the captives in Babylon. No, both the precepts and the promises here are given to all, to every one that thirsts after happiness, ver. 1. And who doth not? Hear this and live.

First. Here is a gracious offer made of pardon, and peace, and all happiness, to poor sinners, upon gospel terms, ver. 6, 7.

1. Let them pray, and their prayers shall be heard and answered; ver. 6, "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found." Seek him whom you have left by revolting from your allegiance to him; and whom you have lost by provoking him to withdraw his favour from you. "Call upon him" now "while he is near," and within call. Observe here, 1st. The duties required. First. Seek the Lord, seek to him, and inquire of him as your oracle; "ask the law at his mouth." "What wilt thou have me to do?" Seek for him, and inquire after him as your portion and happiness; seek to be reconciled to him, and acquainted with him, and to be happy in his favour. Be sorry that you have lost him, be solicitous to find him; take the appointed method of finding him, making use of Christ as your way, the Spirit as your guide, and the word as your rule. Secondly. Call upon him, pray to him to be reconciled, and, being reconciled, pray to him for every thing else you have need of. 2nd. The motives made use of to press these duties upon us; "While he may be found, while he is near." First. It is implied that now God is near, and will be found, so that it shall not be in vain to seek him, and to call upon him. Now his patience is waiting on us, his word is calling to us, and his Spirit striving with us; now improve your advantages and opportunities, for "now is the accepted time." But, Secondly. There is a day coming when he will be afar off, and will not be found; when the day of his patience is over, and his Spirit will strive no more. There may come such a time in this life, when the heart is incurably hardened; however, at death and judgment the door will be shut, Lu. xvi. 26; xiii. 25, 26. Mercy is now offered, but then judgment without mercy will take place.

2. Let them repent and reform, and their sins shall be pardoned, ver. 7. Here is a call to the unconverted, to the wicked, and the unrighteous man; to the wicked that live in known gross sins, to the unrighteous that live in the neglect of plain duties; to them is the word of this salvation sent, and all the assurance given that can be, that penitent sinners shall find God a pardoning God. Observe here, 1st. What it is to repent. There are two things in it: First. It is to turn from sin, it is to forsake it; it is to leave it, and to leave it with loathing and abhorrence, never to return to it again. The wicked must forsake his way, his evil way, as one would forsake a false way that will never bring us to the happiness we aim at; and a dangerous way, that leads to destruction. Let him not take one step more in that way. Nay, there must be not only a change of the way, but a change of the mind; the unrighteous must forsake his thoughts; repentance, if it be true, strikes at the root, and washeth the heart from wickedness. We must alter our judgments concerning persons and things, dislodge the corrupt imaginations, and quit the vain pretences which an unsanctified heart shelters itself with. Note, It is not enough to break off from evil practices, but we must enter a caveat against evil thoughts. Yet this is not all. Secondly. To repent is to return to the Lord; to return to him as our God; return to him as to our sovereign Lord, against whom we have rebelled, and to whom we are concerned to reconcile ourselves; as to the fountain of life and living waters, which we had forsaken for broken cisterns. 2nd. What encouragement we have thus to repent. If we do so, First. God will have mercy; he will not deal with us as our sins have deserved, but will have compassion on us. Misery is the object of mercy. Now, both the consequences of sin, by which we are become truly miserable, Eze. xvi. 5, 6, and the nature of repentance, by which we are made sensible of our misery, and are brought to bemoan ourselves, Jer. xxxi. 18, both make us objects of pity, and with God there are tender mercies. Secondly. "He will abundantly pardon." He will 'multiply to pardon,' so the word is, as we have multiplied to offend. Though our sins have been very great, and very many; and though we have often backslidden, and are still prone to offend, yet God will repeat his pardon, and welcome even backsliding children that return to him in sincerity.

Secondly. Here are encouragements given us to accept this offer, and to venture our souls upon it; for, look which way we will, we find enough to confirm us in our belief of the validity and value of it.

1. If we look up to heaven, we find God's counsels there high and transcendent, his thoughts and ways infinitely above ours, ver. 8, 9. The wicked are told to forsake their evil ways and thoughts, (ver. 7,) and to return to God; that is, to bring their ways and thoughts to concur and comply with his, for, saith he, My thoughts and ways are not as yours; yours are conversant only about things beneath, they are of the earth, earthy; but mine are above, as the heaven is high above the earth; and if you would approve yourselves true penitents, yours must be so too, and your affections be set on things above. Or rather, it is to be understood as an encouragement to us to depend upon God's promise to pardon sin upon repentance. Sinners may be ready to fear that God will not be reconciled to them, because they could not find in their hearts to be reconciled to one that had so basely and so frequently offended them; but, saith God, My thoughts in this matter are not as yours, but as far above them as heaven above the earth. They are so in other things. Men's sentiments concerning sin, and Christ, and holiness, concerning this world and the other, are vastly different from God's; but in nothing more than in the matter of reconciliation. We think God apt to take offence, and backward to forgive; that if he forgives once he will not forgive a second time. Peter thought it a great deal to forgive seven times, Mat. xviii. 21. A hundred pence goes far with us, but God meets returning sinners with pardoning mercy; he forgives freely, and as he gives: it is without upbraiding. We forgive, and cannot forget; but when God forgives sin he remembers it no more. Thus God invites sinners to return to him, by possessing them with good thoughts of him, as Jer. xxxi. 20.

2. If we look down to this earth, we find God's word there, powerful and effectual, and answering all its great intentions, ver. 10, 11. Observe here,

1st. The efficacy of God's word in the kingdom of nature; "He saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth," appoints when it shall come, to what degree, and how long it shall lie there; he saith so to "the small rain and the great rain of his strength," Job xxxvii. 6; and, according to his order, they come down from heaven, and do "whatsoever he commandeth them upon the face of the world, whether it be for correction, or for his land, or for mercy," as it follows here, ver. 12, 13. It returneth not re infecta,—'without having accomplished its end,' but watereth the earth, which he is therefore said to do from his chambers, Ps. civ. 13. And the watering of the earth is in order to its fruitfulness; thus he "maketh it to bring forth and bud," for the products of the earth depend upon the dews of heaven; and thus it gives not only bread to the eater, present maintenance to the owner and his family, but seed likewise to the sower, that he may have food for another year. The husbandman must be a sower as well as an eater, else he will soon see the end of what he has.

2nd. The efficacy of his word in the kingdom of providence and grace, which is as certain as the former: "So shall my word be," as powerful in the mouth of prophets as it is in the hand of Providence; "it shall not return unto me void," as unable to effect what it was sent for, or meeting with an insuperable opposition; no, "it shall accomplish that which I please," for it is the declaration of his will, according to the counsel of which he worketh all things, "and it shall prosper in the thing for which I sent it." This assures us, First. That the promises of God shall all have their full accomplishment in due time, an not one iota or tittle of them shall fail, 1 Kin. viii. 56. These promises of mercy and grace shall have as real an effect upon the souls of believers, for their sanctification and comfort, as ever the rain had upon the earth to make it fruitful. Secondly. That, according to the different errands on which the word is sent, it will have its different effects; if it be not a savour of life unto life it will be a savour of death unto death. If it doth not convince the conscience, and soften the heart, it will sear the conscience, and harden the heart; if it do not ripen for heaven, it will ripen for hell: see ch. vi. 9. One way or other it will take effect. Thirdly. That Christ's coming into the world, as the dew from heaven, (Hos. xiv. 5,) will not be in vain. For if Israel is not gathered, he will be glorious in the conversion of the Gentiles; to them, therefore, the tenders of grace must be made, when the Jews refuse them, that the wedding may be furnished with guests, and the Gospel not return void.

3. If we take a special view of the church, we shall find what great things God hath done and will do for it; ver. 12, 13, "Ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace." This refers, 1st. To the deliverance and return of the Jews out of Babylon; they shall go out of their captivity, and be led forth towards their own land again. God will go before them as surely, though not as sensibly, as before their fathers in the pillar of cloud and fire. They shall go out, not with trembling, but with triumph; not with any regret to part with Babylon, or any fear of being fetched back, but with joy and peace. Their journey home over the mountains shall be pleasant, and they shall have the good will and good wishes of all the countries they pass through. The hills and their inhabitants shall, as in a transport of joy, break forth into singing; and, if the people should altogether hold their peace, even the trees of the field would attend them with their applauses and acclamations. And when they come to their own land, it shall be ready to bid them welcome; for whereas they expected to find it all overgrown with briars and thorns, it shall be set with fir-trees and myrtle-trees; for, though it lay desolate, yet it enjoyed its sabbaths, Lev. xxvi. 34, which when they were over, like the land after the sabbatical year, it was the better for. And this shall redound much to the honour of God, and be to him for a name. But, 2nd. Without doubt it looks farther, this shall be "for an everlasting sign;" that is, First. The redemption of the Jews out of Babylon shall be a ratification of those promises that relate to gospel times. The accomplishment of the predictions relating to that great deliverance would be a pledge and earnest of the performance of all the other promises, for thereby it shall appear that "he is faithful who hath promised." Secondly. It shall be a representation of the blessings promised, and a type and figure of them. 1*st.* Gospel grace will set those at liberty that were in bondage to sin and Satan. They shall go out, and be led forth; Christ shall make them free, and then they shall be free indeed. 2*nd.* It will fill those with joy that were melancholy; Ps. xiv. 7, "Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad." The earth, and the inferior part of the creation, shall share in the joy of this salvation, Ps. xcvi. 11, 12. 3*rd.* It will make a great change in men's characters. Those that were as thorns and briars, good for nothing but the fire, nay, hurtful and vexatious, shall become graceful and useful as the fir-tree and the myrtle-tree. Thorns and briars came in with sin, and were the fruits of the curse, Gen. iii. 18; the raising of pleasant trees in the room of them, signifies the removal of the curse of the law, and the introduction of gospel blessings. The church's enemies were as thorns and briars, but instead of them God will raise up friends to be her protection and ornament. Or, it may note the world's growing better; instead of a generation of thorns and briars, there shall come up a generation of fir-trees and myrtles; the children shall be wiser and better than the parents. And, lastly, in all this God shall be glorified; "It shall be to him for a name," by which he will be made known and praised, and by it the people of God shall be encouraged. It shall be "for an everlasting sign" of God's favour to them, assuring them that, though it may for a time be clouded, it shall never be cut off. The covenant of grace is an everlasting covenant, for the present blessings of it are signs of everlasting ones.

CHAPTER LVI.

After the exceeding great and precious promises of gospel grace, typified by temporal deliverances, which we had in the foregoing chapter, we have here, I. A solemn charge given to us all to make conscience of our duty, as we hope to have the benefit of those promises, ver. 1, 2. II. Great encouragement given to strangers that were willing to come under the bonds of the covenant, assuring them of the blessings of the covenant, ver. 3—8. III. A high charge drawn up against the watchmen of Israel that were careless and unfaithful in the discharge of their duty, ver. 9—12; which seems to be the beginning of a new sermon, by way of reproof and threatening, which is continued in the following chapters. And the word of God was intended for conviction, as well as for comfort and instruction in righteousness.

THUS saith the LORD,
Keep ye judgment, and do justice:
For my salvation is near to come,
And my righteousness to be revealed.
2 Blessed is the man that doeth this,
And the son of man that layeth hold on it;
That keepeth the sabbath from polluting it,
And keepeth his hand from doing any evil.

The scope of these verses is to shew that when God is coming towards us in a way of mercy we must go forth to meet him in a way of duty.

First. God here tells us what are his intentions of mercy to us; ver. 1, "My salvation is near to come." The great salvation wrought out by Jesus Christ, (for that was the salvation of which "the prophets inquired and searched diligently," 1 Pet. i. 10,) typified by the salvation of the Jews from Sennacherib, or out of Babylon. Observe, 1. The Gospel salvation is the salvation of the Lord; it was contrived and brought about by him, he glories in it as his. 2. In that salvation God's righteousness is revealed, which is so much the beauty of the Gospel that St. Paul makes this the ground of his glorying in it, Rom. i. 17, "Because therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith." The law revealed that righteousness of God by which all sinners stand condemned, but the Gospel reveals that by which all believers stand acquitted. 3. The Old Testament saints saw this salvation coming, and drawing near to dumb, as well as idle; or industrious only in the pursuit of self-indulgence and worldly gain.

lvi. 11. The Hebrew for "from his quarter" is "from his end," and is variously explained "from all quarters," "without exception," &c.

lvii. 1. For "merciful men" the margin has "men of kindness, or godliness." We might say "men of grace," because good men are meant, or men of piety. The words "from the evil to come" are not quite correct, the sense being "from the presence of evil."

lvii. 2. Divers explanations of this verse have been proposed, especially of the first clause, which may be translated either "he shall come to peace," or "peace shall come." The Syriac and Latin Vulgate have the latter, but most moderns agree with the former. The next clause, "they shall rest in their beds," alludes to funeral couches, the word for bed being used of both. The final clause is obscure in our version, and in the Hebrew too; but the sense probably is that what has just been said is true of every one who them, long before it came; and they had notice by the prophets of its approach. As Daniel understood by Jeremiah's books the approach of the redemption out of Babylon at the end of seventy years, so others understood by Daniel's books the approach of our redemption by Christ at the end of seventy weeks of years.

Secondly. He tells us what are his expectations of duty from us in consideration thereof. Say not, We see the salvation near, and therefore we may live as we list, for there is no danger now of missing it, or coming short of it,—that is turning the grace of God into wantonness; but, on the contrary, when the salvation is near double your guard against sin. Note, The fuller assurances God gives us of the performance of his promises the stronger obligations he lays us under to obedience. Now the salvation here spoken of is come; yet, there being still a farther salvation in view, the apostle presseth duty upon us Christians with the same argument, Rom. xiii. 11, "Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed." That which is here required to qualify and prepare us for the approaching salvation is,

1. That we be honest and just in all our dealings. "Keep ye judgment, and do justice;" walk by rule, make conscience of what ye say and do, that you do no wrong to any; render to all their due exactly, and in exacting what is due to you keep up a court of equity in your own bosom, to moderate the rigours of the law. Be ruled by that golden rule of doing as you would be done by. Magistrates must administer justice wisely and faithfully. This is required to evidence the sincerity of our faith and repentance, and to open the way of mercy. "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." God is true to us, let us be so to one another.

2. That we religiously observe the sabbath day, ver. 2. We are not just if we rob God of his time. Sabbath sanctification is here put for all the duties of the first table, the fruit of our love to God, as justice and judgment for all those of the second table, the fruits of our love to our neighbour. Observe, 1st. The duty required, which is to keep the sabbath; to keep it as a talent we are to trade with, as a treasure we are intrusted with; keep it holy, keep it safe, keep it with care and caution, keep it from polluting it; allow neither yourselves nor others either to violate the holy rest nor omit the holy work of that day. If this be intended primarily for the Jews in Babylon, it was fit they should be particularly put in mind of this; because, when by reason of their distance from the temple they could not observe the other institutions of their law, yet they might distinguish themselves from the heathen by putting a difference between God's day and other days; but it being required more generally of man, and the son of man, it intimates that sabbath sanctification should be a duty in gospel times, when the bounds of the church should be enlarged, and other rites and ceremonies abolished. Observe, Those that would keep the sabbath from polluting it must put on resolution; must not only do this, but lay hold on it, for sabbath time is precious; but it is very apt to slip away if we take not great care; and therefore we must lay hold on it, and keep our hold; must do it, and persevere in it. 2nd. The encouragement we have to do this duty; Blessed is he that doeth it. The way to have the blessing of God upon our employments all the week is to make conscience and make a business of sabbath sanctification; and in doing so we shall be the better qualified to do judgment and justice. The more godliness the more honesty, 1 Tim. ii. 2.

3. That we have nothing to do with sin. Blessed is the man that keepeth his hand from doing evil; any wrong to his neighbour, in body, goods, or good name; or, more generally, any thing that is displeasing to God, and hurtful to his own soul. Note, The best evidence of our having kept the sabbath well will be a care to keep a good conscience all the week. By this it will appear we have been in the mount with God, if our faces shine in a holy conversation before men.

3 Neither let the son of the stranger, that hath joined himself to the LORD, speak, [people:
Saying, The LORD hath utterly separated me from his Neither let the eunuch say, Behold, I am a dry tree
4 For thus saith the LORD unto the eunuchs
That keep my sabbaths,
And choose the things that please me,
And take hold of my covenant;
5 Even unto them will I give in mine house
And within my walls a place and a name
Better than of sons and of daughters:
I will give them an everlasting name,
That shall not be cut off. [LORD,
6 Also the sons of the stranger, that join themselves to the
To serve him, and to love the name of the LORD,
To be his servants,
Every one that keepeth the sabbath from polluting it,
And taketh hold of my covenant;
7 Even them will I bring to my holy mountain,
And make them joyful in my house of prayer:
Their burnt offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted upon mine altar;
For mine house shall be called an house of prayer unto all people. [saith,
8 The Lord GOD which gathereth the outcasts of Israel
Yet will I gather others to him,
Beside those that are gathered unto him.

The prophet is here, in God's name, encouraging those that were hearty in joining themselves to God, and yet laboured under great discouragements.

First. Some were discouraged because they were not of the seed of Abraham. They had joined themselves to the Lord, had bound their souls with a bond to be his for ever. This is the root and life of religion, to break off from the world and the flesh, and devote ourselves entirely to the service and honour of God; but they questioned whether God would accept of them, because they were of the sons of the stranger, ver. 3. They were Gentiles that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and aliens to the covenants of promise; and therefore feared they had no part or lot in the matter. They said, "The Lord hath utterly separated me from his people," and will not own me as one of them, nor admit me to their privileges. It was often said that there should "be one law for the stranger and for him that was born in the land," Ex. xii. 49, and yet they may make this melancholy conclusion. Note, Unbelief many times suggests things to the discouragement of good people which are directly contrary to what God himself hath said; things which he hath expressly guarded against. Let not the sons of the stranger therefore say thus, for they have no reason to say it. Note, Ministers must have answers ready to the disquieting fears and jealousies of weak Christians; which, how unreasonable soever, they must take notice of.

Secondly. Others were discouraged because they were not fathers in Israel. The eunuch said, "Behold, I am a dry tree;" so he looked upon himself, and it was his grief; so others looked upon him, and it was his reproach. He was thought to be of no use, because he had no children, nor was ever likely to have any. This was then the more grievous, because eunuchs were not admitted to be priests, Lev. xxi. 20, nor to enter into the congregation, Deu. xxiii. 1; and because the promise of a numerous posterity was the particular blessing of Israel, and the more valuable because from among them the Messiah was to come. Yet God would not have the eunuchs to make the worst of their case, nor to think that they should be excluded from the gospel church, and from being spiritual priests, because they were shut out from the congregation of Israel, and the Levitical priesthood. No; as the taking down of the partition wall (contained in ordinances) admitted the Gentiles, so it let in likewise those that had been kept out by ceremonial pollutions. Yet, by the reply here given to this suggestion it should seem the chief thing which the eunuch laments in his case is his being written childless. Now, suitable encouragements are given to each of these.

1. To those that have no children of their own, that, though they had the honour to be the children of the church and the covenant themselves, yet had none to whom they might transmit that honour; none to receive the sign of circumcision, and the privileges secured by that sign. Now observe, 1st. What a good character they have, though they lie under this ignominy and affliction; and those only are entitled to the following comforts who in some measure answer these characters. First. They keep God's sabbaths as he hath appointed them to be kept. In the primitive times, if a Christian were asked, 'Hast thou kept holy the Lord's day?' he would readily answer, 'I am a Christian, and dare not do otherwise.' Secondly. In their whole conversation they choose those things that please God. They do that which is good; they do it with a sincere design to please God in it; they do it of choice, and with delight. And if sometimes through infirmity they come short of doing that which pleased God, yet they choose it, they endeavour it, and aim at it. Note, Whatever is God's pleasure should, without dispute, be our choice. Thirdly. They take hold of his covenant, and that is a thing that pleaseth God as much as any thing. The covenant of grace is proposed and proffered to us in the Gospel; to take hold on it, is to consent to it, to accept the offer, and come up to the terms, deliberately and sincerely to take God to be to us a God, and to give up ourselves to him, to be to him a people. Taking hold of the covenant notes an entire and resolute consent to it; taking hold, as those that are afraid of coming short; catching at it as a good bargain, and as those that are resolved never to let it go, for it is our life; and we take hold of it as a criminal took hold of the horns of the altar to which he fled for refuge. 2nd. What a great deal of comfort they may have if they answer this character, though they are not built up into families; ver. 5, "Unto them will I give a better place and name." It is supposed that there is a place and a name, which we have from sons and daughters, that is valuable and desirable. It is a pleasing notion we have that we live in our children when we are dead. But there is a better place, and a better name, which those have that are in covenant with God, and it is sufficient to balance the want of that. A place, and a name, rest, and reputation; a place to live comfortably in themselves, and a name to live creditably with among their neighbours; they shall be happy, and may be easy both at home and abroad. Though they have not children to be the music of their house, or arrows in their quiver, to keep them in countenance when they speak with their enemies in the gate, yet they shall have a place and a name more than equivalent. For, First. God will give it them, will give it them by promise; he will himself be both their habitation and their glory, their place and their name. Secondly. He will give it them in his house, and within his walls; there they shall have a place, shall be planted so as to take root, Ps. xcii. 13; shall dwell all the days of their life, Ps. xxvii. 4. They shall be at home in communion with God, as Anna, that departed not from the temple night or day. There they shall have a name. A name for good things with God and good people is "a name better than that of sons and daughters." Our relation to God, our interest in Christ, our title to the blessings of the covenant, and our hopes of eternal life, are things that give us in God's house a blessed place and a blessed name. Thirdly. It shall be an everlasting name, that shall never be extinct, shall never be cut off; like the place and name of angels, who therefore marry not because they die not. Spiritual blessings are unspeakably better than those of sons and daughters; for children are a certain care, and may prove the greatest grief and shame of a man's life; but the blessings we partake of in God's house are a sure and constant joy and honour, comforts which cannot be embittered.

2. To those that are themselves the children of strangers.

1st. It is here promised that they shall now be welcome to the church, ver. 6, 7. When God's Israel come out of Babylon, let them bring as many of their neighbours along with them as they can persuade to come, and God will find room enough for them all in his house. And here, as before, we may observe,

First. Upon what terms they shall be welcome. Let them know that God's Israel, when they come out of Babylon, will not be plagued as they were when they came out of Egypt with a mixed multitude that went with them, but were not cordially for them; no, the sons of the stranger shall have a place and a name in God's house, provided, 1*st.* That they forsake other gods, all rivals and pretenders whatsoever, and "join themselves to the Lord," so as to become one spirit, 1 Cor. vi. 17. 2*nd.* That they join themselves to him, as subjects to their prince, and soldiers to their general, by an oath of fidelity and obedience to serve him, not occasionally, as one would serve a turn, but to be constantly his servant, entirely subject to his command, and devoted to his interest. 3*rd.* That they join themselves to him as friends to his honour, and the interests of his kingdom in the world, "to love the name of the Lord," to be well pleased with all the discoveries he hath made of himself, and all the memorials they make of him. Observe, Serving him and loving him go together; for those that love him truly will serve him faithfully; and that obedience is most acceptable to him which flows from a principle of love, as well as most pleasant to us; for then "his commandments are not grievous," 1 Jno. v. 3. 4*th.* That they "keep the sabbath from polluting it;" for "the stranger that is within thy gates" is particularly required to do that. 5*th.* That walks in the path of rectitude: "They go into peace and find rest in the grave who are just and good" (as in verse 1).

lvii. 3. From this verse to verse 13 we have a terrible indictment against those in Israel who apostatised from God. The word for "sorceress" is curious. No doubt it means one who practised sorcery in the popular sense, but what kind of sorcery? Was it by observing the clouds, by calculating and observing days, by looking about for signs and omens, by practising legerdemain, by giving oracles, or by any other special method? The answer is not obvious, but the "black art" in some form is meant.

lvii. 4. "Sport yourselves" signifies "luxuriate;" i.e., revel in mockery. The signs of this were opening the mouth wide, and putting out the tongue. The words "a seed of falsehood," or "a seed of mendacity," mean a false and insincere generation.

lvii. 5. For "idols" the margin has "oaks," but needlessly, as idol gods and their zealous worship must be meant. Besides,

"they take hold of the covenant;" that is, that they come under the bonds of it, and put in for the benefits of it.

Secondly. To what privileges they shall be welcome, ver. 7. Three things are here promised them in their coming to God: 1*st*. Assistance. "I will bring them to my holy mountain;" not only bid them welcome when they come, but incline them to come; will shew them the way, and lead them in it. David himself prays that God, by his light and truth, would bring him to his holy hill, Ps. xliii. 4. And the sons of the stranger shall be under the same conduct. The church is God's holy hill, on which he hath set his King; and in bringing them to Zion hill he brings them to be subjects to Zion's King, as well as worshippers in Zion's holy temple. 2*nd*. Acceptance. "Their burnt offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted on mine altar;" and be never the less acceptable for being theirs, though they are sons of the stranger. The prayers and praises (these spiritual sacrifices) of devout Gentiles shall be as pleasing to God as those of the pious Jews, and no difference shall be made between them; for though they are Gentiles by birth, yet, through grace, they shall be looked upon as the believing seed of faithful Abraham, and the praying seed of wrestling Jacob; for "in Christ Jesus there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision." 3*rd*. Comfort. They shall not only be accepted, but they themselves shall have the pleasure of it; "I will make them joyful in my house of prayer." They shall have grace not only to serve God, but to serve him cheerfully and with gladness; and that shall make the service the more acceptable to him; for when we sing in the ways of the Lord, then great is the glory of our God. They shall go away and eat their bread with joy, because God now accepteth their works, Eccl. ix. 7. Nay, though they came mourning to the house of prayer, they shall go away rejoicing, for they shall there find such ease by casting their cares and burthens upon God, and referring themselves to him, that, like Hannah, they shall go away, and their countenance shall be no more sad. Many a sorrowful spirit has been made joyful in the house of prayer.

2nd. It is here promised that multitudes of the Gentiles shall come to the church; not only those few that come dropping in shall be bid welcome, but that great numbers shall come in, and the door be thrown open to them; "My house shall be called a house of prayer for all people." The temple was then God's house, and to that Christ applies these words, Mat. xxi. 13; but with an eye to it as a type of the gospel church, Heb. ix. 8, 9; for Christ calls it his house, Heb. iii. 6. Now, concerning this house it is promised. First. That it shall not be a house of sacrifice, but a house of prayer. The religious meetings of God's people shall be meetings for prayer; in which they shall join together as a token of their united faith and mutual love. Secondly. That it shall be a house of prayer, not for the people of the Jews only, but for all people. This was fulfilled when Peter was made, not only to perceive it himself, but to tell it the world, that "in every nation he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of him," Acts x. 35. It had been declared again and again that "the stranger that comes nigh shall be put to death;" but Gentiles shall now be looked upon no longer as strangers and foreigners, Eph. ii. 19. And it appears, by Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple, both that it was primarily intended for a house of prayer and that strangers should be welcome to it, 1 Kin. viii. 30, 41.

And it is intimated here, ver. 8, that when the Gentiles are called in they shall be incorporated into one body with the Jews, that, as Christ saith, Jno. x. 16, "there may be one fold, and one shepherd;" for, 1*st*. God "will gather the outcasts of Israel." Many of the Jews that had by their unbelief cast themselves out shall by faith be brought in again, "a remnant according to the election of grace," Rom. xi. 5. Christ came "to the lost sheep of the house of Israel," Mat. xv. 24, to gather their outcasts, Ps. cxlvii. 2, and restore their preserved, ch. xlix 6, and to be their glory, Lu. ii. 32. 2*nd*. He will gather others also to him, besides his own outcasts that are gathered to him; or, though some of the Gentiles have come over now and then into the church, that shall not serve, as some may think, to answer the extent of these promises; no, there are still more and more to be brought in; I will gather others to him besides these; these are but the firstfruits, in comparison with the harvest that shall be gathered for Christ in the nations of the earth, when the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in. Note, The church is a growing body; when some are gathered to it, yet still we may hope there shall be more, till the mystical body be completed: "Other sheep I have."

9 All ye beasts of the field, come to devour,
Yea, all ye beasts in the forest.
10 His watchmen are blind: they are all ignorant,
They are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark;
Sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber.
11 Yea, they are greedy dogs which can never have enough,
And they are shepherds that cannot understand:
They all look to their own way,
Every one for his gain, from his quarter.
12 Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine,
And we will fill ourselves with strong drink,
And to morrow shall be as this day,
And much more abundant.

From words of comfort the prophet here, by a very sudden change of his style, passeth to words of reproof and conviction, and goes on in that strain, for the most part, in the three following chapters; and therefore some here begin a new sermon. He had assured the people that in due time God would deliver them out of captivity; which was designed for the comfort of those that should live when God would do this. Now here he shews what their sins and provocations were, for which God would send them into captivity; and this was designed for the conviction of those that lived in his own time, near a hundred years before the captivity, who were now filling up the measure of the nation's sin; and to justify God in what he brought upon them. God will lay them waste by the fierceness of their enemies, for the falseness of their friends.

First. Desolating judgments are here summoned up, ver. 9. The sheep of God's pasture are now to be made the sheep of his slaughter, to fall as victims to his justice; and therefore the beasts of the field and the forest are called to come and devour. They are beasts of prey, and do it from their own ravenous disposition; but God permits them to do it, nay, he employs them as his servants in doing it; the ministers of his justice, though they "mean not so, neither doth their heart think so." If this refers primarily to the descent made upon them by the Babylonians, and their devouring of them, yet it may look farther to the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation by the Romans, after these outcasts of them, mentioned ver. 8, were gathered into the Christian church. The Roman armies came upon them as beasts of the forest to devour them, and they quite took away their place and nation. Note, When God has bloody work to do he has beasts of prey within call to be employed in doing it.

Secondly. The reason of these judgments is here given. The shepherds that should have been the watchmen of the flock, to discover the approaches of the beasts of prey, to keep them off and protect the sheep, were treacherous and careless, minded not their business, nor made any conscience of the trust reposed in them, and so they became an easy prey to the wild beasts. Now this may refer to the false prophets that lived in Isaiah's, Jeremiah's, and Ezekiel's time, that flattered the people in their wicked ways, and told them they should have peace, though they went on; and to the priests that bare rule by their means, or to the wicked princes, the sons of Josiah, that did evil in the sight of the Lord, and other wicked magistrates under them that betrayed their trust, were vicious and profane, and instead of making up the breach at which the judgments of God were breaking in upon them, made it wider, and augmented the fierce anger of the Lord, instead of doing any thing to turn it away. They should have kept judgment and justice, ver. 1, but they abandoned both, Jer. v. 1. Or it may refer to those who were the nation's watchmen in our Saviour's time, the chief priests and the scribes, who should have discerned the signs of the times, and have given notice to the people of the approach of the Messiah; but instead of that opposed him, and did all they could to keep people from coming to the knowledge of him, and to prejudice them against him. It is a very sad character that is here given of these watchmen. Woe unto thee, O land, when thy guides are such.

1. They had no sense or knowledge of their business; they were wretchedly ignorant of their work, and were very unfit to teach others, who were so ill taught themselves. "His watchmen are blind," and therefore utterly unfit to be watchmen. If the seers see not, who shall see for us? "If the light that is in us be darkness, how great is that darkness!" Christ describes the Pharisees to be blind leaders of the blind, Mat. xv. 14. The beasts of the field come to devour, and the watchmen are blind, and are not aware of them. They are "all ignorant," ver. 10; "Shepherds that cannot understand," ver. 11; that know not what is to be done about the sheep, nor can feed them with understanding, Jer. iii. 15.

2. What little knowledge they had they made no use of it; nobody was the better for it. As they were blind watchmen that could not discern the danger, so they were dumb dogs that would not give warning of it. And why are the dogs set to guard the sheep, if they cannot bark to awaken the shepherd and frighten the wolf? Such were these; they that had the charge of souls never reproved men for their faults, nor told them what would be in the end thereof; never gave them notice of the judgments of God that were breaking in upon them. They barked at God's prophets, and bit them too, and worried the sheep, but made no opposition to the wolf or thief.

3. They were very lazy, and would take no pains; they loved their ease, and hated business; were "always sleeping, lying down, and loving to slumber." They were not overcome and overpowered by sleep, as the disciples, through grief and fatigue; but they lay down on purpose to invite sleep, and said, "Soul, take thine ease; yet a little sleep." It is bad with a people when their shepherds slumber, Nah. iii. 18; and well for God's people that their shepherd, "the keeper of Israel, neither slumbers nor sleeps."

4. They were very covetous and eager after the world; "greedy dogs, that can never have enough." If they had never so much, they would think it too little; they so love silver as never to be satisfied with silver, Eccl. v. 10. All their inquiry is what they shall get, not what they shall do. Let them have the wages, and they care not whether the work be done or no; they feed not the flock, but fleece it. They are every one "looking to his own way," minding his own private interests, and have no regard at all to the public welfare. It was St. Paul's complaint of the watchmen in his time, Phil. ii. 21, "All seek their own, not the things that are Jesus Christ's." Every one is for propagating his own opinion, advancing his own party, raising his own family, and having every thing to his own mind, while the common concerns of the public are wretchedly neglected and postponed. They "look every one to his gain from his quarter," from his end or part of the work; they are for gain from every quarter; Rem, rem, quocunque modo rem,—'Money, money, by fair means or foul, we must have money;' but especially from their own quarter, where they will be sure to take care that they lose nothing, nor miss any thing that is to be got. He that putteth not into their mouths, they not only will do him no service, but they prepare war against him, Mic. iii. 5.

5. They were perfect epicures, given to their pleasures, never so much in their element as in their drunken revels; ver. 12, "Come ye," say they, "I will fetch wine." They have that at command; their cellars are better furnished than their closets, "and we will fill ourselves," or be drunk, "with strong drink." They were often drunk, not overseen, as we say, or overtaken in drink, but designedly. The watchmen did thus invite and encourage one another to drink to excess; or, they courted the people to sit and drink with them, and so confirmed them in their wicked ways and hardened their hearts, whom they should have reproved. How could they think it any harm to be drunk, when the watchmen themselves joined with them and led them to it?

6. They were mighty secure and confident of the continuance of their prosperity and ease; they said, "To-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant." We shall have as much to spend upon our lusts to-morrow as we have to-day. They had no thought at all of their own frailty and mortality, though they were shortening their days and hastening their deaths by their excesses. They had no dread of the judgments of God, though they were daily provoking him and making themselves liable to his wrath and curse. They never considered the uncertainty of all the delights and enjoyments of sense, how they perish in the using, and pass away with the lusts of them. They resolved to continue in this wicked course, whatever their consciences said to the contrary, to be as merry to-morrow as they are to-day. But "boast not thyself of to-morrow," when perhaps "this night thy soul shall be required of thee."

CHAPTER LVII.

The prophet, in this chapter, makes his observations, I. Upon the deaths of good men, comforting them that were taken away in their integrity, and reproving those that did not make a due improvement of such providences, ver. 1, 2. II. Upon the gross idolatries, and spiritual whoredoms which the Jews were guilty of, and the destroying judgments they were thereby bringing upon themselves, ver. 3—12. III. Upon the gracious returns of God to his people, to put an end to their captivity, and re-establish their prosperity, ver. 13—21.

1 THE righteous perisheth, and no man layeth it to heart:
And merciful men are taken away, none considering
That the righteous is taken away from the evil to come.

in the next words there is a reference to the well-known practice of erecting idols under trees, which is still continued in India. The reference to the slaughtering of children as sacrifices to idols indicates that the service of Moloch or of Baal was continued even in the days of Isaiah. Observe that the prophet does not call this dreadful rite "sacrificing," but "slaying," or "slaughtering;" the Hebrew word being the one which is appropriate for killing cattle meant for food. For "clifts" read clefts, or fissures. The ravines and dry watercourses, with their clefts and crevices, were appropriate shrines for such abominable worship.

lvii. 6. The worship of stones rounded naturally, or otherwise remarkable for their form, was practised among the Phœnicians and other ancient peoples. The word for "portion" was used among the Syrians for fate, or fortune—as something divine—and some such idea is perhaps implied in this verse. The black stone or Kaaba of Mecca is said to have been once an idol.

2 He shall enter into peace:
They shall rest in their beds,
Each one walking in his uprightness.

The prophet, in the close of the foregoing chapter, had condemned the watchmen for their ignorance and sottishness; here he shews the general stupidity and senselessness of the people likewise. No wonder they were inconsiderate, when their watchmen were so, that should have awakened them to consideration. We may observe here,

First. The providence of God removing good men apace out of this world. "The righteous" as to this world "perish;" they are gone, and their place knows them no more. Piety exempts none from the arrests of death; nay, in persecuting times, the most righteous are most exposed to the violences of bloody men; the first that died died a martyr. Righteousness delivereth from the sting of death, but not from the stroke of it. They are said to perish, because they are utterly removed from us, and to express the great loss which this world sustains by the removal of them; not that their death is their undoing, but it often proves an undoing to the places where they lived and were useful. Nay, even "merciful men are taken away;" those good men that are distinguished from the righteous, for whom some would even dare to die, Rom. v. 7. Oftentimes those are removed that could be worst spared; the fruitful trees are cut down by death, and the barren left still to cumber the ground. Merciful men are often taken away by the hand of men's malice; many good works they have done, and for some of them they are stoned. Before the captivity in Babylon perhaps there was a more than ordinary mortality of good men, so that there were scarce any left, Jer. v. 1. The godly ceased and the faithful failed, Ps. xii. 1.

Secondly. The careless world slighting these providences and disregarding them; "No man lays it to heart," none considers it. There are very few that lament it as a public loss, very few that take notice of it as a public warning. The death of good men is a thing to be laid to heart and considered more than common deaths. Serious inquiries ought to be made wherefore God contends with us; what good lessons are to be learned by such providences; what we may do to help to make up the breach, and to fill up the room of those that are removed. God is justly displeased when such events are not laid to heart; when the voice of the rod is not heard, nor the intentions of it answered, much more when it is rejoiced in, as the slaying of the witnesses is, Rev. xi. 10. Some of God's choicest blessings to mankind being thus easily parted with, are really undervalued, and it is an evidence of very great incogitancy. Little children, when they are little, least lament the death of their parents, because they know not what a loss it is to them.

Thirdly. The happiness of the righteous in their removal.

1. They are "taken away from the evil to come," then when it is just coming, 1st. In compassion to them that they may not see the evil, 2 Kin. xxii. 20, nor share in it, nor be in temptation by it. When the deluge is coming they are called into the ark, and have a hiding-place and rest in heaven, where there was none for them under heaven. 2nd. In wrath to the world, to punish them for all the injuries they have done to the righteous and merciful ones. These are taken away that stood in the gap to turn away the judgments of God; and then what can be expected but a deluge of them? It is a sign God intends war when he calls home his ambassadors.

2. They go to be easy out of the reach of that evil. The righteous man that, while he lived, walked in his uprightness, when he dies enters into peace, and rests in his bed. Note, 1st. Death is gain, and rest, and bliss to those only that walked in their uprightness, and that, when they die, can appeal to God concerning it, as Hezekiah, 2 Kin. xx. 3, "Now, Lord, remember it." 2. They that practised uprightness, and persevered in it to the end, shall find it well with them when they die. Their souls then enter into peace, into the world of peace, where peace is in perfection, and where there is no trouble, "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Their bodies rest in their beds. Note, The grave is a bed of rest to all the Lord's people; there they rest from all their labours, Rev. xiv. 13; and the more weary they were the more welcome will that rest be to them, Job iii. 17. This bed is made in the darkness, but that makes it the more quiet. It is a bed out of which they shall rise refreshed in the morning of the resurrection.

3 But draw near hither, ye sons of the sorceress,
The seed of the adulterer and the whore.
4 Against whom do ye sport yourselves?
Against whom make ye a wide mouth,
And draw out the tongue?
Are ye not children of trangression, a seed of falsehood,
5 Enflaming yourselves with idols
Under every green tree,
Slaying the children in the valleys
Under the clifts of the rocks?
6 Among the smooth stones of the stream is thy portion;
They, they are thy lot:
Even to them hast thou poured a drink offering,
Thou hast offered a meat offering.
Should I receive comfort in these?
7 Upon a lofty and high mountain hast thou set thy bed:
Even thither wentest thou up to offer sacrifice.
8 Behind the doors also and the posts hast thou set up thy remembrance:
For thou hast discovered thyself to another than me,
And art gone up; thou hast enlarged thy bed,
And made thee a covenant with them;
Thou lovedst their bed where thou sawest it.
9 And thou wentest to the king with ointment,
And didst increase thy perfumes,
And didst send thy messengers far off,
And didst debase thyself even unto hell.
10 Thou art wearied in the greatness of thy way;
Yet saidst thou not, There is no hope:
Thou hast found the life of thine hand;
Therefore thou wast not grieved.
11 And of whom hast thou been afraid or feared,
That thou hast lied,
And hast not remembered me, nor laid it to thy heart?
Have not I held my peace even of old,
And thou fearest me not?
12 I will declare thy righteousness,
And thy works; for they shall not profit thee.

We have here a high charge, but a just one no doubt, drawn up against that wicked generation out of which God's righteous ones were removed, because the world was not worthy of them. Observe,

First. The general character here given of them, or the name and title by which they stand indicted, ver. 3. They are bid to draw near and hear the charge, are set to the bar and arraigned there as sons of the sorceress, or of a witch, the seed of an adulterer and a whore; that is, they were such themselves, they were strongly inclined to be such, and their ancestors were such before them. Sin is sorcery and adultery, for it is departing from God and dealing with the devil, and they were children of disobedience. Come, saith the prophet, draw near hither, and I will read you your doom. To the righteous death will bring peace and rest, but not to you, "You are children of transgressors and a seed of falsehood," ver. 4, that have it by kind, and have it woven into your very nature, to backslide from God and to deal treacherously with him, ch. xlviii. 8.

Secondly. The particular crimes laid to their charge:

1. Scoffing at God and his word. They were a generation of scorners, ver. 4, "Against whom do you sport yourselves?" You think it is only against the poor prophets whom you trample upon as contemptible men; but really it is against God himself, who sends them, and whose message they deliver. Mocking the messengers of the Lord was Jerusalem's measure-filling sin, for what was done to them God took as done to himself. When they were reproved for their sins and threatened with the judgments of God, they ridiculed the word of God with all the rude, indecent gestures and expressions of disdain that could be. They sported themselves and made themselves merry with that which should have made them serious, and under which they should have humbled themselves. They made wry mouths at the prophets and drew out the tongue, contrary to all the laws of good breeding. Nor did they treat God's prophets with the common civility with which they would have treated a gentleman's servant that had been sent to them of an errand. Note, Those who mock at God, and bid defiance to his judgments, had best consider who it is towards whom they carry it so insolently.

2. Idolatry. This was that sin which the people of the Jews were most notoriously guilty of before the captivity, but that affliction cured them of it. In Isaiah's time it abounded, witness the abominable idolatries of Ahaz, which some think are particularly referred to here, and of Manasseh. 1st. They were dotingly fond of their idols, were inflamed with them, as those that burn in unlawful, unnatural lusts, Rom. i. 27; they were "mad upon their idols," Jer. l. 38. They inflamed themselves with them by their violent passions in the worship of them, as those of Baal's prophets, that leaped upon the altar and cut themselves, 1 Kin. xviii. 26, 28. Note, Vile corruptions, the more they are gratified the more they are inflamed. They worshipped their "idols under every green tree," in the open air and in the shade; yet that did not cool the heat of their impetuous lusts, but rather, the charming beauty of the green trees made them the more fond of their idols which they worshipped there. Thus that in nature which is pleasing, instead of drawing them to the God of nature, drew them from him. The flame of their zeal in the worship of false gods may shame us for our coldness and indifferency in the worship of the true God. They strove to inflame themselves, but we distract and deaden ourselves. 2nd. They were barbarous and unnaturally cruel in the worship of their idols. They slew their children and offered them in sacrifice to their idols, not only in the valley of the son of Hinnom, the head-quarters of that monstrous idolatry, but in other valleys in imitation of that, and under the clefts of the rocks, in dark and solitary places, the fittest for such works of darkness. 2nd. They were abundant and insatiable in their idolatries; they never thought they could have idols enough, nor could spend enough upon them and do enough in their service. The Syrians had once a notion of the God of Israel that he was a god of the hills, but not a god of the valleys, 1 Kin. xx. 28; but these idolaters, to make sure work, had both.

First. They had gods of the valleys, which they worshipped in the low places by the water side; ver. 6, "Among the smooth stones of the valley," or brook, "is thy portion." If they saw a smooth, carved stone, though set up but for a waymark or a mere stone, they were ready to worship it, as the Papists do crosses. Or in stony valleys they set up their gods, which they called their portion, and took for their lot, as God's people take him for their lot and portion. But these gods of stone would really be no better a portion for them, no better a lot, than the smooth stones of the stream, near which they were set up, for sometimes they worshipped their rivers. They, they are thy lot, which thou trustest to and art pleased with; but thou shalt be put off with it for thy lot, and miserable will thy case be. See the folly of sinners, who take the smooth stones of the stream for their portion, when they might have the precious stones of God's Jerusalem and the high priest's ephod to portion themselves with. Having taken these idols for their lot and portion, they stick at no charge in doing honour to them, "To them hast thou poured a drink offering and offered a meat offering," as if they had given thee thy meat and drink. They loved their idols better than their children, for their own tables must be robbed to replenish the altars of their idols. Have we taken the true God for our portion? Is he, even he, our lot? Let us then serve him with our meat and drink, not as they did, by depriving ourselves of the use of it, but by eating and drinking to his glory. Here, in a parenthesis, comes in an expression of God's just resentment of this wickedness of theirs, "Should I receive comfort in these," in such a people as this? Can they expect that God should take any pleasure in them, or accept their devotions at his altar, who thus serve Baal with the gifts of his providence? God takes comfort in his people while they are faithful to him; but what comfort can he take in them, when they that should be his witnesses against the idolatries of the world do themselves fall in with them? 'Should I have compassion on these?' so some; or, 'Should lvii. 7. This verse alludes to idolatrous worship on mountain tops. The figure of whoredom is kept up in the first clause.

lvii. 8. The zikkaron, i.e., the declaration that Jehovah is the only God, which the Israelites were to write upon the posts of their houses, and upon the entrances (Deut. vi. 9, xi. 20) for a constant reminder, she had put behind the door and post, that she might not be reminded, to her shame, of her unfaithfulness. Obscenity was a common adjunct of idolatry.

lvii. 9. Israel sought the favour of idolatrous kings, and did all that was possible to court their friendship and alliance.

lvii. 10. The nation wearied itself with its efforts to procure foreign aid, but did not despair; on the contrary, it found encouragement in one form or another, and was not troubled. "The life of thine hand" may mean a renewal of vigour and energy.

lvii. 13. "When thou criest;" i.e., with a cry of distress. "Let thy companies deliver thee" is an allusion to the multitudes for

I repent me concerning these?' so others. How can they expect that I should spare them, and either adjourn or abate their punishment, when they are so very provoking? "Shall I not visit for these things?" Jer. v. 7, 9.

Secondly. They had gods of the hills too; ver. 7, "Upon a lofty and high mountain" (as if thou wouldst vie with the High and Lofty One himself, ver. 15) "hast thou set thy bed," thine idol, thine idol's temple and altar, the bed of thine uncleanness, where thou committest spiritual whoredom with all the wantonness of an idolatrous fancy, and in direct violation of the covenant of thy God. "Thither wentest thou up" readily enough, though it was uphill, "to offer sacrifice." Some think this speaks the impudence they arrived to in their idolatries; at first they had some sense of shame, when they worshipped their idols in the valleys, in obscure places, but they soon conquered that, and came to do it upon the lofty high mountains; they were not ashamed, neither could they blush.

Thirdly. As if these were not enough, they had household gods too, their lares and penates; ver. 8, "Behind the doors and the posts;" where the law of God should be written for a memorandum to them of their duty, there they "set up the remembrance of their idols;" not so much to keep up their own remembrance of them, they were so fond of them they could not forget them, but to shew to others how mindful they were of them, and to put their children in mind of them, and possess them betimes with a veneration for those dunghill deities.

4th. As they were insatiable in their idolatries, so they were inseparable from them. They were hardened in their wickedness; they worshipped their idols openly, and in public view, as being neither ashamed of the sin nor afraid of the punishment; they went as publicly, and in as great crowds, to the idol temples as ever they had gone to God's house. This was like an impudent harlot; "discovering themselves to another than to God,"—making profession of other than the true religion. They took a pride in making proselytes to their idolatries; and not only went up themselves to their high places, but enlarged their bed, that is, their idol temples, and (as the margin reads the following words) 'thou hewedst for thyself larger than theirs,'—than theirs from whom thou copiedst it, and tookest the platform of it, as Ahaz of his altar, from that which he saw at Damascus, 2 Kin. xvi. 10; and, being thus involved over head and ears as it were in their idolatries, there is no parting them from them. Ephraim is now joined to idols, both in love and league. First. In league. "Thou hast made a covenant with them," with the idols, with the idol worshippers, to live and die together. This was a complete renunciation of their covenant with God, and an avowed resolution to persist in their apostacy from him. Secondly. In love. "Thou lovedst their bed," that is, the temple of an idol, "wherever thou sawest it." Justly, therefore, were they given up to their own hearts' lusts.

3. Another sin charged upon them is their trusting in and seeking to foreign aids and succours, and contracting a communion with the Gentile powers; ver. 9, "Thou wentest to the king," which some understand of the idol they worshipped, particularly Moloch, which signifies a king; thou didst every thing to ingratiate thyself with those idols, didst offer incense and sweet ointments at their altars. Or, it may be meant of the king of Assyria, whom Ahaz made his court to; or of the king of Babylon, whose ambassadors Hezekiah caressed; or of other the kings of the nations, whose idolatrous usages they admired, and were desirous to learn and imitate; and for that end went and sent to cultivate an acquaintance and correspondence with them, that they might be like them, and strengthen themselves by an alliance with them. See here, 1st. What an expence they were at in forming and procuring this grand alliance. They went with ointment and perfumes, either bestowed upon themselves, to beautify their own faces, and so make themselves considerable, and worthy the friendship of the greatest king, or to be presented to those whose favour they were ambitious of, because "a man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men." When the first present of rich perfumes was thought too little, thou didst increase them; and thus "many seek the ruler's favour," forgetting that, after all, "every man's judgment proceedeth from the Lord." So fond were they of those heathen princes, that they not only went themselves, in all their airs, to those that were near them, but sent messengers to those that were afar off, ch. xviii. 2. 2nd. How much they hereby disparaged themselves, and laid the honour of their crown and nation in the dust; "Thou didst debase thyself even unto hell;" so they did by their idolatries. It is a dishonour to the children of men, that are endued with the powers of reason, to worship that as their God which is the creature of their own fancy, and the work of their own hands, to "bow down to the stock of a tree." It is much more a dishonour to the children of God, that are blessed with the privilege of Divine revelation, to forsake such a God as they know theirs to be, for a thing of nought; their own mercies for lying vanities. They likewise debase themselves by truckling to their heathen neighbours, and depending upon them, when they had a God to go to that is all-sufficient, and in covenant with them. How did they shame themselves to the highest degree, and sink themselves to the lowest, that forsook the Fountain of life for broken cisterns, and the Rock of ages for broken reeds. Note, Sinners disparage and debase themselves; the service of sin is an ignominious slavery, and they who thus debase themselves to hell will justly have their portion there.

Thirdly. The aggravations of their sin.

1. They had been tired with disappointments in their wicked courses, and yet they would not be convinced of the folly of them; ver. 10, "Thou art wearied in the greatness of thy way;" thou hast undertaken a mighty task to find out true satisfaction and happiness in that which is vanity and a lie. Those that set up idols instead of God for the object of their worship, and princes instead of God for the object of their hope and confidence, and think thus to better themselves and make themselves easy, go a great way about, and will never come to their journey's end. "Thou art wearied in the multitude," or multiplicity of thy ways, so some read it; those that forsake the only right way wander endlessly in a thousand bypaths, and lose themselves in the many inventions which they have sought out. They weary themselves with fresh chases, and fierce ones, but never gain their point; like the Sodomites, that wearied themselves to find the door, Gen. xix. 11, and could not find it at last. The pleasures of sin will soon surfeit, but never satisfy; a man may quickly tire himself in the pursuit of them, but can never repose himself in the enjoyment of them. They found this by experience, the idols they had often worshipped never did them any kindness; the kings they courted distressed them, and helped them not; and yet they were so wretchedly besotted, that they could not say, "There is no hope." It is in vain any longer to expect that satisfaction in creature confidences, and in the worship of idols, which we have so often looked for, and never met with. Note, Despair of happiness in the creature, and of satisfaction in the service of sin, is the first step towards a well grounded hope of happiness in God, and a well fixed resolution to keep to his service. And those are inexcusable who have had sensible conviction of the vanity of the creature, and yet will not be brought to say, There is no hope to be happy short of the Creator.

2. Though they were convinced that the way they were in was a sinful way, yet, because they had found some present sensual pleasure and worldly profit by it, they could not persuade themselves to be sorry for it. "Thou hast found the life of thy hand," or the living of it; thou boastest how fortune smiles upon thee, and therefore thou art not grieved, no more than Ephraim, when he said, (Hos. xii. 8,) "I am become rich, I have found me out substance." Note, Prosperity in sin is a great bar to conversion from sin. Those that live at ease in their sinful pleasures, and raise estates by their sinful projects, are tempted to think God favours them, and therefore they have nothing to repent of. Some read it ironically, or by way of question, 'Thou hast found the life of thy hand,' hast found true satisfaction and happiness; no doubt thou hast, hast thou not? And therefore thou art so far from being grieved that thou "blessest thyself in thine own evil way;" but review thy gains once more, and come to a balance of profit and loss, and then say what fruit thou hast of those things whereof thou art ashamed, and for which "God shall bring thee into judgment," Rom. vi. 21.

3. They had dealt very unworthily with God by their sin; for, 1st. It should seem they pretended that the reason why they left God was, because he was too terrible a majesty for them to deal with, they must have gods that they could be more free and familiar with; but, saith God, "of whom hast thou been afraid or feared, that thou hast lied?" that is, that thou hast dealt falsely and treacherously with me, and dissembled in thy covenants with me, and prayers to me; 'What did I ever do to frighten thee from me?' What occasion have I given thee to think hardly of me, that thou hast gone to seek a kinder master? 2nd. However, it is certain they had no true reverence of God, nor any awful regard to him. So that question is commonly understood, "Of whom hast thou been afraid, or feared?" Of none; for thou hast not feared me, whom thou shouldest fear; for "thou hast lied to me." Those that dissemble with God make it to appear they stand in no awe of him. "Thou hast not remembered me," neither what I have said nor what I have done, neither the promises nor the threatenings, nor the performances of either; thou hast not laid them to thy heart, as thou wouldest have done if thou hadst feared me. Note, Those who lay not the word of God and his providences to their hearts, it is a sign they have not the fear of God before their eyes. And multitudes are ruined by fearlessness, forgetfulness, and mere carelessness; they do not aright, nor to good purpose, fear any thing, remember any thing, nor lay any thing to heart. Nay, 3rd. They were hardened in their sin, by the patience and forbearance of God; "Have not I held my peace of old," and for a long time? "these things thou hast done, and I kept silence." And therefore, as it follows here, "thou fearest me not," as if, because God had spared long, he would never punish, Eccl. viii. 11. Because he kept silence, the sinner thought him altogether such a one as himself, and stood in no awe of him.

Lastly. Here is God's resolution to call them to an account, though he had long borne with them; ver. 12, "I will declare," like that, Ps. l. 21, "But I will reprove thee." "I will declare thy righteousness," which thou makest thy boast of, and let the world see, and thyself too, to thy confusion, that it is all a sham, all a cheat, it is not what it pretends to be. When thy righteousness comes to be examined it will be found unrighteousness, and that there is no sincerity in all thy pretensions. I will declare thy works, what they have been, and what the gain thou pretendest to have gotten by them; and it will appear, that at long run "they shall not profit thee," nor turn to any account. Note, Sinful works, as they are works of darkness, and there is no reason or righteousness in them, so they are unfruitful works, and there is nothing got by them; and, however they look now, it will be made to appear so another day. Sin doth not profit, nay, it doth ruin and destroy.

13 When thou criest, let thy companies deliver thee;
But the wind shall carry them all away;
Vanity shall take them:
But he that putteth his trust in me
Shall possess the land,
And shall inherit my holy mountain;
14 And shall say, Cast ye up, cast ye up, prepare the way,
Take up the stumblingblock out of the way of my people
15 For thus saith the high and lofty One
That inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy;
I dwell in the high and holy place,
With him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit,
To revive the spirit of the humble,
And to revive the heart of the contrite ones
16 For I will not contend for ever,
Neither will I be always wroth:
For the spirit should fail before me,
And the souls which I have made.

Here, First. God shews how insufficient idols and creatures were to relieve and succour those that worshipped them, and confided in them; ver. 13, "When thou criest" in thy distress and anguish, lamentest thy misery, and callest for help, "let thy companies deliver thee," thy idol gods, which thou hast heaped to thyself companies of, the troops of the confederate forces which thou hast relied so much upon; let them deliver thee if they can; expect no other relief but what they can give. Thus God said to Israel, when in their trouble they called upon him, Jud. x. 14, "Go and cry to the gods which you have chosen, let them deliver you." But in vain is salvation hoped for from them; "The wind shall carry them all away," the wind of God's wrath, that breath of his mouth, which shall slay the wicked; they have made themselves as chaff, and therefore the wind will of course hurry them away. Vanity they are, and vanity shall take them away; to vanity they shall be reduced, and vanity shall be their recompence. Both the idols and their worshippers shall come to nothing.

Secondly. He shews that there was a sufficiency, an all-sufficiency, in him for the comfort and deliverance of all those that put their confidence in him, and made their application to him. And their safety and satisfaction appears the more comfortable, because their hopes are crowned with fruition, when those that seek to other helpers have their hopes frustrated; "but he that putteth his trust in me," and in me only, he shall be happy, both for soul and body, for this world and the other. 1. They that trust in God's providence take the best course to secure their secular interests; "They shall possess the land," as much of it as is good for them, and what they have they shall have it from a good hand, and hold it by a good title; Ps. xxxvii. 3, "They shall dwell in the land, and verily they shall be fed." 2. They that trust in God's grace take the best course to secure their sacred interests; "They shall inherit my holy mountain."

whom apostate Israel forsook the Lord. The companies are usually understood to be idols, but idolatrous allies may be included.

lvii. 14. For "and shall say," which makes the speaker the man that trusts in the Lord, we should prefer to render "and he shall say;" i.e., the Lord himself shall say. To this, however, some object, and render the words vaguely, "it shall be said," or "one shall say." One reason for not adopting this is the speaker's calling Israel "my people," which here is best understood of Jehovah. Another important suggestion is that we should translate the first words "and I will say," which is favoured by Lowth and J. D. Michaelis.

lvii. 16. The sense is that God will restrain or limit his anger, for otherwise the spirit and life of man would become extinct. The two words rendered "spirit" and "souls" may be taken as practically equivalent, in the common sense of vital principle. The expression "the spirit should fail" at least requires the change of "should" into "would," unless we give a different turn to the whole, by trans-

They shall enjoy the privileges of the church on earth, and be brought at length to the joys of heaven, and no wind shall carry them away. More particularly,

1st. The captives that trust in God shall be released; ver. 14, "They shall say," that is, the messengers of his word, and all the ministers of his providence, in that great event shall say, "Cast ye up, cast ye up, prepare the way." When God's time is come for their deliverance, the way of bringing it about shall be made plain and easy; obstacles shall be removed, difficulties that seemed insuperable shall presently be got over, and all things shall concur both to accelerate and to facilitate their return: see ch. xl. 3, 4. This refers to the provision which the Gospel, and the grace of it, hath made for our ready passage through this world to a better. The way of religion is now cast up; it is a highway; ministers' business is to direct people in it, and to help them over the discouragements they meet with, that nothing may offend them.

2nd. The contrite that trust in God shall be revived, ver. 15. They that trusted in idols and creatures for help went with their ointments and perfumes, ver. 9, but here God shews that those who may expect help from him are such as are destitute of, and set themselves at a distance from, the gaieties of the world, and the delights of sense. God's glory appears here very bright,

First. In his greatness and majesty. He is "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity." Let this possess us with very high and honourable thoughts of the God with whom we have to do. 1*st.* That his being and perfections are exalted infinitely above every creature, not only above what they have themselves, but above what they can conceive concerning him, "far above all" their "blessing and praise," Neh. ix. 5. He is "the high and lofty One," and there is no creature like him, nor any to be compared with him. It speaks likewise his sovereign dominion over all, and the incontestable right he has to give both law and judgment to all. He is higher than the highest, Eccl. v. 8; than the highest heavens, Ps. cxiii. 4. 2*nd.* That with him there is neither beginning of days, nor end of life, nor change of time; he is both immortal and immutable; he only hath immortality, 1 Tim. vi. 16; he hath it of himself, and he hath it constantly; he inhabits it, and cannot be dispossessed of it. We must shortly remove into eternity, but God always inhabits it. 3*rd.* That there is an infinite rectitude in his nature, and an exact conformity with himself, and a steady design of his own glory in all that he doth; and this appears in every thing by which he has made himself known; for his name is holy, and all that desire to be acquainted with him must know him as a holy God. 4*th.* That the peculiar residence and discovery of his glory is in the mansions of light and bliss above; "I dwell in the high and holy place," and will have all the world to know it. Whoever have any business with God must direct to him as their Father in heaven, for there he dwells. These great things are here said of God to possess us with a holy reverence of him, to encourage our confidence in him, and to magnify his compassion and condescension to us; that though he is thus high, yet he hath respect unto the lowly. He that rides on the heavens by his name Jah, stoops to concern himself for poor widows and fatherless, Ps. lxviii. 4, 5.

Secondly. In his grace and mercy. He hath a tender pity for the humble and contrite; for those that are so in respect to their state, if they be his people, he will not overlook them, though they are poor and low in the world, and despised and trampled upon by men. But it refers to the temper of their mind; he will have a tender regard to those that, being in affliction, accommodate themselves to their affliction, and bring their mind to their condition, be it never so low, and never so sad, and sorely broken; those that are truly penitent for sin, and mourn in secret for it, and have a dread of the wrath of God, which they have made themselves obnoxious to, and are submissive under all his rebukes. Now, 1*st.* With these God will dwell; he will visit them graciously, will converse familiarly with them, by his word and Spirit, as a man doth with those of his own family; he will be always nigh to them, and present with them; he that dwells in the highest heavens dwells in the lowest hearts, and inhabits sincerity as surely as he inhabits eternity; in these he delights. 2*nd.* He will revive their heart and spirit; will speak that to them, and work that in them, by the word and Spirit of his grace, which will be reviving to them, as a cordial to one that is ready to faint. He will give them reviving joys and hopes, sufficient to balance all the griefs and fears that break their spirits. He dwells with them, and his presence is reviving.

3rd. Those he contends with, if they trust in him, shall be relieved, and received into favour, ver. 1. He will "revive the heart of the contrite ones," for he will not contend for ever. Nothing makes a soul contrite so as God's contending, and therefore nothing revives it so as his ceasing his controversy. Here is,

First. A gracious promise. It is not promised that he will never be angry with his people, for their sins are displeasing to him; or that he will never contend with them, for they must expect the rod; but he "will not contend for ever," nor be always wroth. As he is not soon angry so he is not long angry; "he will not always chide." Though he contend with them by convictions of sin, he will not contend for ever; but, instead of the spirit of bondage they shall receive the spirit of adoption: he hath torn, but he will heal. Though he contend with them by the rebukes of providence, yet the correction shall not last always, shall not last long; no longer than there is need, 1 Pet. i. 6; no longer than they can bear, and no longer than till it has done its work. Though their whole life be calamitous, yet their end will be peace, and so will their eternity be. Secondly. A very compassionate consideration, upon which this promise is grounded; "If I should contend for ever, the spirit would fail before me, even the souls which I have made." Note, 1*st.* God is the Father of spirits, Heb. xii. 9; it is the soul that he has made, that he gave being to by creation, and a new being to by regeneration. 2*nd.* Though the Lord is for the body, yet he concerns himself chiefly for the souls of his people, that the spirit do not fail, and its graces and comforts. 3*rd.* When troubles last long, the spirit, even of good men, is apt to fail. They are tempted to entertain hard thoughts of God, to think it in vain to serve him. They are ready to put comfort away from them, and to despair of relief, and then the spirit fails. 4*th.* It is in consideration of this that God will not contend for ever; for he will not forsake the work of his own hands, nor defeat the purchase of his Son's blood. The reason is taken, not from our merit, but from our weakness and infirmity; for "He remembers that we are flesh," Ps. lxxviii. 39, and the flesh is weak.

17 For the iniquity of his covetousness was I wroth,
And smote him: I hid me, and was wroth,
And he went on frowardly in the way of his heart.
18 I have seen his ways, and will heal him:
I will lead him also, and restore comforts
Unto him and to his mourners.
19 I create the fruit of the lips;
Peace, peace to him that is far off, and to him that is near,
Saith the LORD; and I will heal him.
20 But the wicked are like the troubled sea,
When it cannot rest,
Whose waters cast up mire and dirt.
21 There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked

The body of the people of Israel, in this account of God's dealings with them, is spoken of as a particular person, ver. 17, 18; but divided into two sorts, that were differently dealt with; some that were sons of peace, to whom peace is spoken, ver. 19, and others that were not, who have nothing to do with peace, ver. 20, 21. Observe here,

First. The just rebukes which that people were brought under for their sin; "For the iniquity of his covetousness I was wroth, and smote him." Covetousness was a sin that abounded very much among that people; Jer. vi. 13, "From the least to the greatest of them, every one is given to covetousness." Those that did not worship images yet were carried away by this spiritual idolatry, for so covetousness is, it is making money the god, Col. iii. 5. No marvel the people were covetous, when their watchmen themselves were notoriously so, ch. lvi. 11. Yet, as covetous as they were, in the service of their idols they were prodigal, ver. 6; and it is hard to say whether their profuseness in that, or their covetousness in every thing else, was more provoking. But for this iniquity, among others, God was angry with them, and brought one judgment after another upon them, and their destruction at last by the Chaldeans. 1. God was wroth, he resented it, took it very ill that a people who were devoted to himself, and portioned in himself, should be so entirely given up to the world, and choose that for their portion. Note, Covetousness is an iniquity that is very displeasing to the God of heaven; it is a heart-sin, but he sees it, and therefore hates it, and looks upon it with jealousy, because it sets up a rival with him in the soul. It is a sin which men bless themselves in, Ps. xlix. 18, and in which their neighbours bless them, Ps. x. 3, but God abhors it. 2. He smote him, reproved him for it by his prophets, corrected him by his providence, punished him in those very things he so doted upon, and was covetous of. Note, Sinners shall be made to feel from the anger of God. Whom he is wroth with he smites; and covetousness particularly lays men under the tokens of God's displeasure. They that set their hearts upon the wealth of this world, either they are disappointed of it or it is embittered to them; it is either clogged with a cross or turned into a curse. 3. God hid himself from him when he was under these rebukes; and continued wroth with him. When we are under the rod, if God manifest himself to us, we may bear it the better; but if he both smite us, and hide himself from us, send us no prophets, speak to us no comfortable word, shew us no token for good, if he tear and go away, Hos. v. 14, we are very miserable.

Secondly. Their obstinacy and incorrigibleness under these rebukes. "He went on frowardly in the way of his heart," in his evil way. He was not sensible of the displeasure of God that he was under; he felt the smart of the rod, but had no regard at all to the hand; the more he was crossed in his worldly pursuits the more eager he was in them. He either would not see his error, or, it he saw it, would not amend it. Covetousness was the way of his heart, it was what he was inclined to, and intent upon, and he would not be reclaimed, but in his distress he trespassed yet more, 2 Chr. xxviii. 22. See the strength of the corruption of men's hearts, and the sinfulness of sin; it will take its course in despite of God himself, and all the flames of his wrath. See also how insufficient afflictions of themselves are to reform men, unless God's grace work with them.

Thirdly. God's wonderful return in mercy to them, notwithstanding the obstinacy of the generality of them. The greater part of them went on frowardly; but there were some among them that were mourners for the obstinacy of the rest, and with an eye to them, or rather, for his own name's sake, God determines not to contend for ever with them. With the froward God may justly shew himself froward, Ps. xviii. 26, and walk contrary to those that walk contrary to him, Lev. xxvi. 24. When this sinner here "went on frowardly in the way of his heart," one would think it should have followed, "I have seen his ways," and will destroy him, will abandon him, will never have any thing more to do with him; no, such are the riches of Divine mercy and grace, and so do they rejoice against judgment, that it follows, "I have seen his ways, and will heal him." See how God's goodness takes occasion from man's badness to appear so much the more illustrious; and "where sin hath abounded, grace doth much more abound." God's reasons of mercy are fetched from within himself, for in us there appears nothing but what is provoking. "I have seen his ways, and yet I will heal him," for my own name's sake. God knew how bad that people were, and yet would not cast them off. But observe the method; God will first give him grace, and then, and not till then, give him peace. "I have seen his ways," that he will never turn to me of himself, and therefore I will turn him. Those whom God has mercy in store for he has grace in readiness for, to prepare and qualify them for that mercy, which they were as fast as they could running from. 1. God will heal him of his corrupt and vicious disposition, will cure him of his covetousness, though it be never so deeply rooted in him, and his heart has been long exercised to covetous practices. There is no spiritual disease so inveterate, but Almighty grace can conquer it. 2. God will lead him also; not only amend what was amiss in him, that he may cease to do evil, but direct him into the way of duty, that he may learn to do well. He goes on frowardly, as Saul, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter; but God will lead him into a better mind, a better path. And then, 3. He will restore those comforts to him which he had forfeited and lost, and for the return of which he had thus prepared him. There was a wonderful reformation wrought upon the captives in Babylon, and then a wonderful redemption wrought for them; which brought comfort to them, that is, to their mourners; to those among them that mourned for their own sins, and the sins of their people, and the desolations of the sanctuary. To those mourners the mercy would be most comfortable, and to them God had an eye in working it out. "Blessed are they that mourn," for to them comfort belongs, and they shall have it.

Fourthly. Now, as when that people went into captivity, some of them were good figs, very good; others of them bad figs, very bad; and accordingly their captivity was to them for their good, or for their hurt, Jer. xxiv. 8, 9, so when they came out of captivity, still some of them were good, others bad, and accordingly the deliverance was to them.

1. To those among them that were good, their return out of captivity was peace, such peace as was a type and earnest of the peace which should be preached by Jesus Christ; ver. 19, "I create the fruit of the lips, peace." 1st. God designed to give them matter for praise and thanksgiving; for that is the fruit of the lips, Heb. xiii. 15, the calves of the lips, Hos. xiv. 2; I create this. Creation is out of nothing, and this is surely out of worse than nothing, when God creates matter of praise for those that went on frowardly in the way of their heart. 2nd. In order to this, peace shall be published. "Peace, peace," perfect peace, all kinds of peace, "to him that is afar off" from the general rendezvous, or from the head-quarters, as well "to him that is near." Peace with God; though he has contended with them, he will be reconciled, and let lating "for the spirit is feeble before me," i.e., is incapable of contending with me, and of enduring the trial to which I subject it.

lvii. 17. We may render this, "I was angry at the iniquity of his covetousness, and I smote him, hiding myself, and angry, yet he went on perversely in the way of his heart." There is no doubt that the people of Israel are here personified.

lvii. 20. This comparison is very striking. The sea is never absolutely quiet, and even when most calm it deposits on the shore, wherever practicable, decayed seaweed and other refuse. When the sea is troubled it casts up in some localities enormous quantities of slime and mud. So the wicked man is always restless, and producing what is evil.

lvii. 3. The question and answer in this verse are from one speaker, the Lord, who shows why he rejects the religious observances of hollow-hearted worshippers. Critics differ as to the rendering of the second clause, but we regard the sense as being, "When you fall his controversy; peace of conscience, a holy security, and serenity of mind, after the many reproaches of conscience, and tosses of spirit they had been under in their captivity. Thus God creates the fruit of the lips, fresh matter for thanksgiving; for when he speaks peace to us we must speak praises to him. This peace is itself of God's creating; he, and he only, can work it; it is the fruit of the lips; of his lips, he commands it; of the ministers' lips, he speaks it by them, ch. xl. 1. It is the fruit of preaching lips, and praying lips; it is the fruit of Christ's lips, whose lips drop as a honeycomb; for to him this is applied, Eph. ii. 17, "He came and preached peace to you who were afar off," you Gentiles, as well as to the Jews who were nigh; to after ages, who were afar off in time, as well as to those of the present age.

2. To those among them that were wicked, though they might return with the rest, yet to them their return was no peace, ver. 20. The wicked, wherever he is, in Babylon or in Jerusalem, carries about with him the principle of his own uneasiness, and is like the troubled sea. God healed those to whom he spoke peace; ver. 19, "I will heal them," all shall be well again, and set to rights; but the wicked would not be healed by the grace of God, and therefore shall not be healed by his comforts. They are always like the sea in a storm, for they carry about with them, 1st. Unmortified corruptions. Those are not cured and conquered, and their ungoverned lusts and passions make them "like the troubled sea when it cannot rest," vexatious to all about them, and therefore uneasy to themselves; noisy and dangerous. When the intemperate heats of the spirit break out in scurrilous and abusive language, then the troubled sea casts forth mire and dirt. 2nd. Unpacified consciences. They are under a frightful apprehension of guilt and wrath, that they cannot enjoy themselves; when they seem settled they are in a toss; when they seem merry, they are in heaviness; like Cain, that always dwelt in the land of shaking. The terrors of conscience muddy all their enjoyments, and cast forth such mire and dirt as make them a burthen to themselves. Though this doth not appear, it may be, at present, yet it is a certain truth, what this prophet had said before, ch. xlviii. 22, and here repeats, ver. 21, "There is no peace to the wicked;" no reconciliation to God, nor can they be upon good terms with him, while they "go on still in their trespasses;" no quietness or satisfaction in their own mind, no real good, no peace in death, because no hope. My God hath said it, and all the world cannot unsay it, that there is no peace to those that allow themselves in any sin; what have they to do with peace?

CHAPTER LVIII.

The prophet in this chapter hath his commission and charge renewed to reprove the sinners in Zion, particularly the hypocrites, to shew them their transgressions, ver. 1; and it is intended for admonition and warning to all hypocrites, and is not to be confined to those of any one age. Some refer it primarily to those at that time when Isaiah prophesied: see ch. xxxiii. 14; xxix. 13. Others to the captives in Babylon; the wicked among them, to whom the prophet had declared there was no peace, ch. lvii. 21. Against the terror of that word they thought to shelter themselves with their external performances, particularly their fastings, which they kept up in Babylon, and for some time after their return to their own land, Zec. vii. 3, &c. The prophet therefore here shews them that their devotions would not entitle them to peace, while their conversations were not all of a piece with them. Others think it is principally intended against the hypocrisy of the Jews, especially the Pharisees, before and in our Saviour's time; they boasted of their fastings, but Christ, as the prophet here, shewed them their transgressions, Mat. xxiii.; much the same with those they are here charged with. Observe, I. The plausible profession of religion which they made, ver. 2. II. The boasts they made of that profession, and the blame they laid upon God, for taking no more notice of it, ver. 3. III. The sins they are charged with, which spoiled the acceptableness of their fasts, ver. 4, 5. IV. Instructions given them how to keep fasts aright, ver. 6, 7. V. Precious promises made to those who do so keep fasts, ver. 8—12. VI. The like precious promises made to those that sanctify sabbaths aright, ver. 13, 14.

CRY aloud, spare not,
Lift up thy voice like a trumpet,
And shew my people their transgression,
And the house of Jacob their sins.
2 Yet they seek me daily,
And delight to know my ways,
As a nation that did righteousness,
And forsook not the ordinance of their God:
They ask of me the ordinances of justice;
They take delight in approaching to God.

When our Lord Jesus promised to send the Comforter, he added, "When he is come, he shall convince," Jno. xvi. 7, 8; for conviction must prepare for comfort, and must also separate between the precious and the vile, and mark out those to whom comfort doth not belong. God had appointed this prophet to comfort his people, ch. xl. 1; here he appoints him to convince them, and shew them their sins.

First. He must tell them how very bad they really were, ver. 1.

1. He must deal faithfully and plainly with them. Though they were called the people of God, and the house of Jacob, though they were an honourable title and character, by which they were interested in many glorious privileges, yet do not flatter them, but "shew them their transgressions and their sins;" be particular in telling them their faults, what sins are committed among them which they do not know of; nay, what sins are committed by them, which they do not acknowledge to be sins. Though in some things they are reformed, let them know that in other things they are still as bad as ever. "Shew them their transgressions and their sins;" that is, 'all their transgressions in their sins;' their sins, and all the aggravations of them, Lev. xvi. 21. Note, 1st. God sees sin in his people, in the house of Jacob, and is displeased with it. 2nd. They are oftentimes unapt and unwilling to see their own sins, and need to have them shewed them, and to be told, "Thus and thus thou hast done."

2. He must be vehement and in good earnest herein, must cry aloud, and not spare. Not spare them, not touch them with his reproofs as if he were afraid of hurting them, but search the wound to the bottom; lay it bare to the bone; not spare himself or his own pains, but cry as loud as he can. Though he spend his strength and waste his spirits; though he get their ill-will by it, and get himself into an ill name; yet he must not spare. He must lift up his voice like a trumpet, to make those hear of their faults that were apt to be deaf on that ear. He must give his reproofs in the most powerful and pressing manner possible, as one who desired to be heeded. The trumpet doth not give an uncertain sound, but, though loud and shrill, is intelligible. So must his alarms be, giving them warning of the fatal consequences of sin, Eze. xxxiii. 3.

Secondly. He must acknowledge how very good they seemed to be notwithstanding; ver. 2, "Yet they seek me daily." When the prophet went about to shew them their transgressions, they pleaded they could see no transgressions they were guilty of; for they were diligent and constant in attending on God's worship; and what more would he have of them? Now, 1. He owns the matter of fact to be true. As far as hypocrites do that which is good, they shall not be denied the praise of it; let them make their best of it. It is owned that they have a form of godliness. 1st. They go to church, and observe their hours of prayer; "They seek me daily;" they are very constant in their devotions, and never omit them, nor suffer any thing to put them by. 2nd. They love to hear good preaching; They "delight to know my ways," as Herod, who heard John gladly, and the stony ground, that received the seed of the word with joy; it is to them as a lovely song, Eze. xxxiii. 32. 3rd. They seem to take a great pleasure in the exercises of religion, and to be in their element when they are at their devotions; "They delight in approaching to God," not for his sake to whom they approach, but for the sake of some pleasing circumstance, the company, or the festival. 4th. They are inquisitive concerning their duty, and seem desirous only to know it, making no question but that then they should do it; "They ask of me the ordinances of justice," the rules of piety in the worship of God, the rules of equity in their dealings with men, both which are ordinances of justice. 5th. They appear to the eye of the world as if they made conscience of doing their duty. They are "as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinances of their God." Others took them for such, and they themselves took on them to be such; nothing lay open to view that was a contradiction to their profession, but they seemed to be such as they should be. Note, Men may go a great way towards heaven, and yet come short; nay, may go to hell with a good reputation. But, 2. He intimates that this was so far from being a cover or excuse for their sin, that really it was an aggravation of it. Shew them their sins which they go on in, notwithstanding their knowledge of good and evil, sin and duty, and the convictions of their consciences concerning it.

3 Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not?
Wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge?
Behold, in the day of your fast ye find pleasure,
And exact all your labours.
4 Behold, ye fast for strife and debate,
And to smite with the fist of wickedness:
Ye shall not fast as ye do this day
To make your voice to be heard on nigh
5 Is it such a fast that I have chosen?
A day for a man to afflict his soul?
Is it to bow down his head as a bulrush,
And to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast,
And an acceptable day to the LORD?
6 Is not this the fast that I have chosen?
To loose the bands of wickedness,
To undo the heavy burdens,
And to let the oppressed go free,
And that ye break every yoke?
7 Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, [house?
And that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy
When thou seest the naked, that thou cover him;
And that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?

Here we have,

First. The displeasure which these hypocrites conceived against God, for not accepting the services which they themselves had a mighty opinion of; ver. 3, "Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not?" Thus they went in the way of Cain, who was angry at God, and resented it as a mighty affront, that his offering was not accepted. Having gone about to put a cheat upon God by their external services, here they go about to pick a quarrel with God for not being pleased with their services, as if he had not done fairly or justly by them. Observe, 1. How they boast of themselves, and magnify their own performances. "We have fasted and afflicted our souls;" not only sought God daily, ver. 2, but have kept some certain times of more solemn devotion. Some think it refers to the yearly fast, which was called the day of atonement; others to their arbitrary, occasional fasts. Note, It is common for unhumbled hearts to be proud of their professions of humiliation, as the Pharisee, Lu. xviii. 12, "I fast twice in the week." 2. What they expected from their performances. They thought God should take great notice of, and own himself a debtor to them for, their services. Note, It is a common thing for hypocrites, while they perform the external services of religion, to promise themselves that acceptance with God which he hath promised only to the sincere; as if they must be accepted of course, or for a compliment. 3. How heinously they take it that God had not put some particular marks of his favour upon them; that he had not presently delivered them out of their troubles, and advanced them to honour and prosperity. They charge God with injustice and partiality; and seem resolved to throw up their religion, and justify themselves in doing so with this, that they had found no profit in praying to God, Job xxi. 14, 15; Mal. iii. 14. Note, Reigning hypocrisy often breaks out in daring impiety and an open contempt and reproach of God and religion for that which the hypocrisy itself must bear all the blame of. Sinners reflect upon religion as a hard and melancholy service, and which there is nothing to be got by; when really it is long of themselves that it seems so to them, because they are not sincere in it.

Secondly. The true reason assigned why God did not accept their fastings, nor answer the prayers they made on their fast-days. It was because they did not fast aright; to God, even to him, Zec. vii. 5. They fasted indeed, but they persisted in their sins, and did not, as the Ninevites, turn every one from his evil way; but in the day of their fast, and notwithstanding the professed humiliations and covenants of that day, they went on to find pleasure; that are observing a fast, you are also pursuing your pleasures, or what you take delight in, and urge on your labourers, or work."

lviii. 4. For "and to smite," &c., the Greek has, "And ye smite the humble man with your fists. Wherefore fast ye unto me as to-day, that your voice should be heard with a cry?" Lowth in part follows this translation, but for a reason more ingenious than solid.

lviii. 6. "The bands" or fetters of wickedness are fetters or bonds wickedly imposed, as in false imprisonment.

lviii. 8. For "the glory of the Lord shall be thy rereward," the margin has more literally, "shall gather thee up;" but the text gives the sense.

lviii. 9. "The putting forth of the finger" means pointing scornfully. "Speaking vanity" is speaking in a wicked or contemptuous manner.

lviii. 12. The restored Israelites shall build again ancient ruins, upon foundations laid by earlier generations.

is, to do whatsoever seemed right in their own eyes, lawful or unlawful, quicquid libet, licet,—'making their inclinations their law;' though they seemed to afflict their souls, they still gratified their lusts as much as ever. 1. They were as covetous and unmerciful as ever. "Ye exact all your labours" from your servants, and will neither release them according to the law nor relax the rigour of their servitude: see Jer. xxxiv. 8, where we find this to be their fault before the captivity; and Neh. v. 2, where we find it to be no less their fault after their captivity, notwithstanding all their solemn fasts. 'Ye exact all your dues,' or debts, so some read it; are as rigorous and severe in extorting what you demand from those that are poor as ever you were, though it was at the close of the yearly fast that the release was proclaimed. 2. They were contentious and spiteful; ver. 4, "Behold, ye fast for strife and debate." When they proclaimed a fast to deprecate God's judgments, they pretended to search for those sins which provoked God to threaten them with his judgments; and, under that pretence, perhaps, particular persons were falsely accused, as Naboth in the day of Jezebel's fast, 1 Kin. xxi. 12. Or, the contending parties among them, upon those occasions, were bitter and severe in their reflections one upon another; one side crying out, It is long of you; and the other, It is long of you, that our deliverance is not wrought. Thus, instead of judging themselves, which is the proper work of a fast-day, they condemned one another. They fasted for strife; that is, with emulation, which should make the most plausible appearance on a fast-day, and humour the matter best. Nor was it only tongue quarrels that were fomented in the times of their fasting, but they came to blows too. "Ye smite with the fists of wickedness." The cruel taskmasters beat their servants, and the creditors their insolvent debtors, whom they delivered to the tormentors. They abused poor innocents with wicked hands. Now while they thus continued in sin, in those very sins which were directly contrary to the intention of a fasting day, 1st. God would not allow them the use of such solemnities. "Ye shall not fast" at all, if ye fast "as ye do this day, causing your voice to be heard on high," in the heat of your clamours one against another; or, in your devotions, which you perform so as to make them to be taken notice of for ostentation. Bring me no more of these empty, noisy, vain oblations, ch. i. 13. Note, Those are justly forbidden the honour of a profession of religion that will not submit to the power of it. 2nd. He would not accept of them in the use of them. "Ye shall not fast;" that is, it shall not be looked upon as a fast, nor shall the voice of your prayers on those days be heard on high in heaven. Note, Those that fast and pray, and yet go on in their wicked ways, do but mock God, and deceive themselves.

Thirdly. Plain instructions given concerning the true nature of a religious fast. In general a fast is intended, 1. For the honouring and pleasing of God. It must be such a performance as he hath chosen, ver. 5. It must be an acceptable day to the Lord, in the duties of which we must study to approve ourselves to him, and obtain his favour; else it is not a fast, else there is nothing done to any purpose. 2. For the humbling and abasing of ourselves. A fast is a day to afflict the soul; if it do not express a genuine sorrow for sin, and do not promote a real mortification of sin, it is not a fast. The law of the day of atonement was, that on that day they should afflict their souls, Lev. xvi. 29. That must be done on a fast-day which is a real affliction to the soul, as far as it is yet unregenerate and unsanctified, though a real pleasure and advantage to the soul, as far as it is itself. It concerns us therefore to inquire on a fast-day, what it is that will be acceptable to God, and afflictive to our corrupt nature, and tending to its mortification.

1st. We are here told negatively what is not the fast that God hath chosen, and which doth not amount to the afflicting of the soul. First. It is not enough to look demure, to put on a grave and melancholy aspect, "to bow down the head like a bulrush" that is withered and broken; as the hypocrites, that were "of a sad countenance, and disfigured their faces, that they might appear unto men to fast," Mat. vi. 16. Hanging down the head did indeed well enough become the publican, whose heart was truly humbled and broken for sin, and therefore, in token of that, "would not so much as lift up his eyes to heaven," Lu. xviii. 13. But when it was only mimicked, (as here it was justly ridiculed,) it is but hanging down the head like a bulrush, which nobody regards, or takes any notice of. As the hypocrite's humiliations are but like the hanging down of a bulrush, so his elevations in his hopes are but like the flourishing of a bulrush, Job viii. 11, 12, which, "while it is yet in its greenness, withers before any other herb." Secondly. It is not enough to do penance to mortify the body a little, while the body of sin is untouched. It is not enough for a man "to spread sackcloth and ashes under him," which doth indeed give him some uneasiness for the present, but is soon forgotten when he returns to stretch himself upon his beds of ivory, Am. vi. 4. "Wilt thou call this a fast?" No, it is but the shadow and carcase of a fast. Wilt thou call this "an acceptable day to the Lord?" No; so far from being so, that the hypocrisy of it is an abomination to him. Note, The shows of religion, though they shew never so well in the eye of the world, will not be accepted of God without the substance of it.

2nd. We are here told positively what is the fast that God hath chosen; what that is which will recommend a fast day to the Divine acceptance, and what is indeed afflicting the soul; that is, crushing and subduing the corrupt nature. It is not 'afflicting the soul for a day,' (as some read it, ver. 5,) that will serve; no, it must be the business of our whole lives. It is here required,

First. That we be just to those with whom we have dealt hardly. The fast that God hath chosen consists in reforming our lives, and undoing what we have done amiss; ver. 6, "To loose the bands of wickedness," that is, the bands which we have wickedly tied, and by which others are bound out from their right, or bound down under severe usage. Those which perhaps were at first bands of justice, tying men to pay a due debt, yet, when the debt is exacted with rigour from those whom Providence hath reduced and emptied, they become bands of wickedness, and they must be loosed, or they will bring us into bonds of guilt, much more terrible. It is "to undo the heavy burthen," laid on the back of the poor servant, under which he is ready to sink. It is "to let the oppressed go free" from the oppression which makes his life bitter to him; let the prisoner for debt, that has nothing to pay, be discharged; let the vexatious action be let fall; let the servant, that is forcibly detained beyond the time of his servitude, be released; and thus break every yoke. Not only let go those that are wrongfully kept under the yoke, but break the yoke of slavery itself, that it may not serve again another time, nor any be made again to serve under it.

Secondly. That we be charitable to those that stand in need of charity, ver. 7. The particulars in the former verse may be taken as acts of charity; that we not only release those whom we have unjustly oppressed, that is justice, but that we contribute to the rescue and ransom of those that are oppressed by others, to the release of captives, and the payment of the debts of the poor; but those in this verse are plainly acts of charity. This, then, is the fast that God hath chosen, 1*st.* To provide food for those that want it; that is put first as the most necessary, and which the poor can but a little while live without. It is "to break thy bread to the hungry." Observe, It must be thy bread; that which is honestly got, not that which thou hast robbed others of; the bread which thou thyself hast occasion for, the bread of thine allowance. We must deny ourselves that we "may have to give to him that needeth." Thy bread which thou hast spared from thyself and thy family on the fast-day, if that, or the value of it, be not given to the poor, it is the miser's fast, which he makes a hand of; it is fasting for the world, not for God. It is "to break thy bread to the hungry." Not only to give them that which is already broken meat, but break bread on purpose for them; give them loaves, and do not put them off with scraps. 2*nd.* To provide lodging for those that want it. It is to take care of the poor that are cast out, that are forced from their dwellings, turned out of house and harbour; are cast out as rebels, so some critics render it; that are attainted, and whom therefore it is highly penal to protect, yet if they suffer unjustly, make no difficulty of sheltering them; do not only find out quarters for them, and pay for their lodging elsewhere, but, which is a greater act of kindness, bring them to thine own house, make them thine own guests. "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers;" for, though thou mayest not (as some have done) thereby entertain angels, thou mayest entertain Christ himself, who will recompense it in the resurrection of the just. "I was a stranger, and ye took me in." 3*rd.* To provide clothing for those that want it; "When thou seest the naked, that thou cover him;" both to shelter him from the injuries of the weather, and to enable him to appear decently among his neighbours. Give him clothes to come to church in; and in these, and other instances, "hide not thyself from thine own flesh." Some understand it more strictly of thine own kindred and relations; if those of thine own house and family fall into decay, thou art worse than an infidel if thou dost not provide for them, 1 Tim. v. 8. Others more generally; all that partake of the human nature are to be looked upon as our own flesh; for have we not all one Father? And for this reason we must not hide ourselves from them, not contrive to be out of the way when a poor petitioner inquires for us; not look another way, when a moving object of charity and compassion presents itself. Let us remember they are flesh of our flesh, and therefore we ought to sympathize with them; and in doing good to them we really do good to our own flesh and spirit too at long run; for thus we lay up for ourselves a good foundation, a good bond, for the time to come.

8 Then shall thy light break forth as the morning,
And thine health shall spring forth speedily:
And thy righteousness shall go before thee;
The glory of the LORD shall be thy rereward.
9 Then shalt thou call, and the LORD shall answer;
Thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am.
If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke,
The putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity;
10 And if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry,
And satisfy the afflicted soul;
Then shall thy light rise in obscurity,
And thy darkness be as the noon day:
11 And the LORD shall guide thee continually,
And satisfy thy soul in drought,
And make fat thy bones: [of water,
And thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring
Whose waters fail not. [places:
12 And they that shall be of thee shall build the old waste
Thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations;
And thou shalt be called, The repairer of the breach,
The restorer of paths to dwell in.

Here are precious promises for those to feast freely and cheerfully upon by faith, who keep the fasts that God has chosen. Let them know that God will make it up to them. Here is,

First. A farther account of the duty to be done, in order to our interest in these promises, ver. 9, 10. And here, as before, it is required that we both do justly and love mercy; that we "cease to do evil, and learn to do well." 1. We must abstain from all acts of violence and fraud. Those must be taken away from the midst of thee, from the midst of thy person; that is, out of thy heart, so some. Thou must not only refrain from the practice of injury, but mortify in thee all inclination and disposition towards it. Or, from the midst of thy people. Those in authority must not only not be oppressive themselves, but must do all they can to prevent and restrain it in all within their jurisdiction. They must not only break the yoke, ver. 6, but take away the yoke, that those who have been oppressed may never be re-enslaved, as they were, Jer. xxxiv. 10, 11. They must likewise forbear threatening, Eph. vi. 9, and take away the putting forth of the finger; which seems to have been then, as sometimes with us, a sign of displeasure, and the indication of a purpose to correct. Let not the finger be put forth, to point at those that are poor and in misery, and so to expose them to contempt. Such expressions of contumely as are provoking, and the products of ill nature, ought to be banished from all societies; and let them not speak vanity, flattery, or fraud, to one another, but let all conversation be governed by sincerity. And perhaps that dissimulation which is the bane of friendship is meant by the putting forth of the finger, as Pr. vi. 13; by touching with the finger; or, it is putting forth the finger with the ring on it, which was the badge of authority, and which therefore they produced when they spake iniquity, that is, gave unrighteous sentences. 2. We must abound in all acts of charity and beneficence. We must not only give alms according as the necessities of the poor require, but, 1st. We must give freely and cheerfully, and from a principle of charity. We must draw out our soul to the hungry, ver. 10. Not only draw out the money, and reach forth the hand, but do this from the heart, heartily, and without grudging; from a principle of compassion, and with a tender affection to such as thou seest to be in misery. Let the heart go along with the gift, for God loves a cheerful giver, and so doth a poor man too. When our Lord Jesus healed and fed the multitude, it was with a compassion on them. 2nd. We must give plentifully and largely, so as not to tantalize, but to satisfy the afflicted soul. Do not only fill the belly of the hungry, but gratify the desire of the afflicted, and, if it lies in your power, make them easy. What are we born for, and what have we our abilities of body, mind, and estate for, but to do all the good we can in this world with them? And the poor we have always with us.

Secondly. Here is a full account of the blessings and benefits which attend the performance of this duty. If a person, a family, a people, be thus disposed lviii. 13. The phrase, "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath," may mean, "If thou trample not upon that holy ordinance by doing," &c. This disobedience might consist in attending to ordinary pursuits, by pleasure-seeking, and by idle gossip.

lviii. 14. "I will cause thee to ride," &c.; i.e., "I will place thee in an exalted position, and thou shalt enjoy the inheritance granted to Jacob."

lix. 5. For "cockatrice" the margin has "adder," but some prefer the word "basilisk," which is objectionable, because some rea serpent of venomous character is meant, and not a fabulous one. An adder may be the kind, but it is uncertain. It is generally agreed that the word viper at the end of the verse is correct, but even to this objections have been made. In reference to both the serpents mentioned there is necessarily obscurity as to the species, but none as to their actuality.

lix. 10. The last clause is by Lowth rendered "in the midst of to every thing that is good, let them know for their comfort that they shall find God their bountiful rewarder, and what they lay out in works of charity shall be abundantly made up to them.

1. God will surprise them with the return of mercy after great affliction, which shall be as welcome as the light of the morning after a long and dark night; ver. 8, "Then shall thy light break forth as the morning;" and, ver. 10, "Thy light shall rise in obscurity." Though thou hast been long buried alive, thou shalt recover thine eminency; long overwhelmed with grief, thou shalt again look pleasant as the dawning day. They that are cheerful in doing good, God will make them cheerful in enjoying good; and this also is a special gift of God, Eccl. ii. 24. They that have shewed mercy shall find mercy. Job, who in his prosperity had done a great deal of good, though he was reduced, yet God then raised him up friends that helped to set him up again, and his light rose in obscurity. And not only thy light which is sweet, but thy health too, or the healing of the wounds thou hast long complained of, shall spring forth speedily. All thy grievances shall be redressed, and thou shalt renew thy youth, and recover thy vigour. Those that have helped others out of trouble, God will help them when it is their turn.

2. God will put honour upon them. Good works shall be recompensed with a good name. This is included in that light which riseth out of obscurity. Though a man's extraction be mean, his family obscure, and he has no external advantages to gain him honour, yet, if he do good in his place, that will procure him respect and veneration, and his darkness shall by this means become as the noonday, that is, he shall become very eminent, and shine bright in his generation. See here, what is the surest way for a man to make himself illustrious; let him study to do good. He that would be the greatest of all, and best beloved, let him, by humility and industry, make himself a servant of all. "Thy righteousness shall" then "go before thee," that is, it shall introduce thee into the esteem of many, and make thee an interest; "Thy righteousness shall answer for thee," as Jacob saith, Gen. xxx. 33; that is, it shall silence reproaches; nay, it shall bespeak thee more praises than thy humility can be pleased with. He that "hath given to the poor, his righteousness endures for ever," that is, the honour of it, Ps. cxii. 9.

3. They shall always be safe under the Divine protection. "Thy righteousness shall go before thee," as the vanguard, to secure thee from enemies that charge thee in the front; and "the glory of the Lord shall be thy rearward," the gathering host, to bring up those of thee that are weary, and are left behind, and to secure thee from the enemies that, like Amalek, fall upon thy rear. Observe, How good people are safe on all sides; look which way they will, behind them, before them, look back, look forward, they see themselves safe, and find themselves easy, and quiet from the fear of evil. And observe what it is that is their defence. It is their righteousness, and the glory of the Lord, that is, Christ, so some understand it; for it is by him that we are justified, and God is glorified. He it is that goes before us, and is the Captain of our salvation, as he is the Lord our righteousness. He it is that is our rearward, on whom alone we can depend for safety, when our sins pursue us, and are ready to take hold on us. Or, God himself, in his providence and grace, shall both go before thee, as thy guide to conduct thee and attend thee, as thy rearward to protect thee. And this shall be the reward of thy righteousness, and so shall be for the glory of the Lord as the rewarder of it.

4. God will be always nigh unto them to hear their prayers, ver. 9. As on the one hand, "he that shuts his ears to the cry of the poor shall himself cry, and God will not hear him," so, on the other hand, he that is liberal to the poor, his prayers shall come up with his alms for a memorial before God, as Cornelius' did, Acts x. 4. "Then shalt thou call" on thy fast-days, (which ought to be days of prayer,) "and the Lord shall answer," shall give thee the things thou callest to him for; "thou shalt cry," when thou art in any distress, or sudden fright, "and he shall say, Here I am," which is a very condescending expression of God's readiness to hear prayer. When God calls to us by his word, it becomes us to say, "Here we are; what saith our Lord unto his servants?" But that God should say to us, "Behold me, here I am," is strange. When we cry to him, as if he were at a distance, he will let us know that he is near, even at our right hand, nearer than we thought he was; "It is I, be not afraid." When danger is near, our Protector is nearer, a very present help; "Here I am," ready to give you what you want, and do for you what you desire. What have you to say to me? God is attentive to the prayers of the upright, Ps. cxxx. 2. No sooner do they call to him, but he answers, Ready, ready. Wherever they are praying, God saith, Here I am hearing; I am in the midst of you, nigh unto them in all things, Deu. iv. 7.

5. God will direct them in all difficult and doubtful cases; ver. 11, "The Lord shall guide thee continually." Whilst we are here in the wilderness of this world, we have need of continual direction from Heaven; for if at any time we be left to ourselves we shall certainly miss our way; and therefore it is to those who are good in God's sight, he gives that wisdom which in all cases is profitable to direct, and will be to them instead of eyes, Eccl. ii. 26. And his providence will make their way plain to them, both what is their duty and what will be most for their comfort.

6. God will give them abundance of satisfaction in their own minds. The world, as it is a wilderness in respect of wanderings, so that they need to be guided continually, so also in respect of wants, which makes it necessary that they have continual supplies; as Israel, in the wilderness, had not only the pillar of cloud to guide them continually, but manna, and water out of the rock, to satisfy their souls in drought, in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is, Ps. lxiii. 1. To a good man God gives not only wisdom and knowledge, but joy; he is satisfied in himself with the testimony of his conscience, and the assurances of God's favour. These will satisfy the soul, will put gladness into the heart, even in the drought of affliction. These will make fat the bones, and fill them with marrow; will give thee that pleasure which will be a support to thee, as the bones to the body, that joy of the Lord which will be thy strength. He shall give thy bones rest, so some read it; rest from pain and sickness, which they have laboured under, and been chastened with. So it agrees with that promise made to the merciful, Ps. xli. 1, 2, "The Lord shall make all his bed in his sickness." "Thou shalt be like a watered garden," so flourishing and fruitful in graces and comforts, "and like a spring of water," like a garden that has a spring of water in it, "whose waters fail not" either in droughts or frosts. The principle of holy love in those that are good shall be a well of living water, Jno. iv. 14; as a spring of water, though it is continually sending forth its streams, yet is always full, so the charitable man abounds in good, as he abounds in doing good, and is never the poorer for his liberality. "He that watereth shall himself be watered."

7. They and their families shall be public blessings. It is a good reward to those that are fruitful and useful, to be more so; and especially to have those who descend from them to be so too. This is here promised, ver. 12. They that now are of thee, thy princes and nobles, and great men, shall have such authority and influence as they never had. Or, those that hereafter shall be of thee, thy posterity, shall be serviceable to their generation, as thou art to thine; which completes the satisfaction of a good man as to this world, to think that those that come after him shall be doing good when he is gone. 1st. They shall re-edify cities that have been long in ruins; "shall build the old waste places," which had lain so long desolate, that the rebuilding of them was quite despaired of. This was fulfilled when the captives, after their return, repaired the cities of Judah, and dwelt in them, and many of those in Israel too, which had lain waste ever since the carrying away of the ten tribes. 2nd. They shall carry on and finish that good work which was begun long before, and shall be helped over the obstructions that had retarded the progress of it. They shall raise up to the top that building, the foundation of which was laid long since, and has been for many generations in the rearing. This was fulfilled when the building of the temple was revived, after it had stood still for many years, Ezr. v. 1. Or, they shall raise up foundations, which shall continue for many generations yet to come; they shall do that good which shall be of lasting consequence. 3rd. They shall have the blessing and praise of all about them; "Thou shalt be called," and celebrated as "the repairer of the breach," the breach made by the enemy in the wall of a besieged city, which whoso has the courage and dexterity to make up, or make good, gains great applause. Happy they who make up the breach at which virtue is running out, and judgments breaking in. Thou shalt be "the restorer of paths," safe and quiet paths, not only to travel in, but "to dwell in;" so safe and quiet, that people shall make no difficulty of building their houses by the roadside. The sum is, that if they keep such fasts as God hath chosen, he will settle them again in their former peace and prosperity, and there shall be none to make them afraid: see Zec. vii. 5, 9; viii. 3—5. And it teacheth us that those who do justly, and love mercy, shall have the comfort of it in this world.

13 If thou turn away thy foot from the sabbath,
From doing thy pleasure on my holy day;
And call the sabbath a delight,
The holy of the LORD, honourable;
And shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways,
Nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own
14 Then shalt thou delight thyself in the LORD; [words.
And I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth,
And feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father:
For the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it.

Great stress was always laid upon the due observation of the sabbath day; and it was particularly required from the Jews when they were captives in Babylon, because by keeping that day in honour of the Creator they distinguished themselves from the worshippers of the gods that have not made the heavens and the earth: see ch. lvi. 1, 2, where keeping the sabbath is joined, as here, with keeping judgment and doing justice. Some indeed understand this of the day of atonement which they think is the fast spoken of in the former part of the chapter, and which is called a sabbath of rest, Lev. xxiii. 32; but as the fasts before spoken of seem to be those that were occasional, so this sabbath is doubtless the weekly sabbath, that great sign between God and his professing people; his appointing it, a sign of his favour to them, and their observing it, a sign of their obedience to him. Now observe here,

First. How the sabbath is to be sanctified, ver. 13; and, there remaining still a sabbatism for the people of God, this law of the sabbath is still binding to us on our Lord's day.

1. Nothing must be done that puts contempt upon the sabbath day, or looks like having mean thoughts of it, when God has so highly dignified it. We must turn away our foot from the sabbath, from trampling upon it, as profane atheistical people do, from travelling on that day; so some. Turn away our foot from doing our pleasure on that holy day; that is, from living at large, and taking a liberty to do what we please on sabbath days, without the control and restraint of conscience; or, from indulging ourselves in the pleasures of sense, in which the modern Jews wickedly place the sanctification of the sabbath, though it is as great a profanation of it as any thing. On sabbath days we must not do our own ways, that is, not follow our callings; not find our own pleasure, that is, not follow our sports and recreations. Nay, we must not speak our own words, not words that concern either our callings or our pleasures; we must not allow ourselves a liberty of speech on that day as on other days, for we must then mind God's ways, make religion the business of the day, must choose the things that please him, and speak his words, speak of Divine things as we sit in the house, and walk by the way. In all we say and do, we must put a difference between this day and other days.

2. Every thing must be done that puts an honour on the day, and is expressive of our high thoughts of it. We must call it a delight, not a task and a burthen; must delight ourselves in it, in the restraints it lays upon us, and the services it obligeth us to. We must be in our element when we are worshipping God, and in communion with him: "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!" We must not only count it a delight, but call it so; must openly profess the complacency we take in the day and the duties of it; call it so to God in thanksgiving for it, and earnest desire of his grace, to enable us to do the work of the day in its day, because we delight in it; call it so to others, to invite them to come share in the pleasure of it; and we must call it so to ourselves, that we may not entertain the least thought of wishing the sabbath gone, that we may sell corn. We must call it the Lord's holy day, and honourable; call it holy, separated from common use, and devoted to God, and to his service; call it the holy of the Lord, the day which he hath sanctified to himself. Even in the Old Testament times, the sabbath was called the Lord's day, and therefore is fitly called so still; and for a farther reason, it is the Lord Christ's day, Rev. i. 10. It is holy, because it is the Lord's day; and upon both accounts it is honourable. It is a beauty of holiness that is upon it: and it is ancient, and its antiquity is its honour; and we must make it appear that we look upon it as honourable, by honouring him, that is, God, on that day. We then put honour upon the day, when we give honour to him that instituted it, and to whose honour it is dedicated.

Secondly. What the reward is of sabbath sanctification, ver. 14. If we thus "remember the sabbath day to keep it holy,"

1. We shall have the comfort it; the work will be its own wages. If we "call the sabbath a delight," then shall we delight ourselves in the Lord; he will more and more manifest himself to us, as the delightful subject of our thoughts and meditations, and the delightful object of our best affections. Note, The more pleasure we take in serving God, the more pleasure we shall find in it. If we go about duty with cheerfulness, we shall go from it with satisfaction, and shall have reason to say, "It is good to be here," good to draw near to God.

2. We shall have the honour of it: "I will make thee to ride upon the high places of the earth;" which notes not only great security, as that, ch. xxxiii. 16, "He shall dwell on high," but great dignity and advancement. Thou shalt delicacies, as among the dead;" by Barnes, "in fertile regions we are like the dead;" by Delitzsch, "among the living like the dead;" by Alexander, "in thick darkness, like the dead;" and there are still other variations. The old versions mainly agree with ours, and some critics believe them so far correct. The Hebrew word which causes the difficulty is found nowhere else, and is of disputed derivation.

lix. 19. The mention of the west and east (or "rising of the sun") here is intended to set forth the universality of the reverence with which the Lord should be regarded. The rendering of the second clause is disputed. For "when the enemy shall come in like a flood," we may translate, "when he shall come like a river straitened;" i.e., like a swollen stream confined in a narrow bed, rushing violently. The words, "the Spirit of the Lord," &c., are by many said to mean "a wind from the Lord," or a mighty wind, "drives it along," or "away." It is a most difficult expression, and one respecting which ride in state, shalt appear conspicuous, and the eyes of all thy neighbours shall be upon thee. It was said of Israel, when God led them triumphantly out of Egypt, that he "made them to ride on the high places of the earth," Deu. xxxii. 12, 13. Those that honour God and his sabbath, he will thus honour them. If God by his grace enable us to live above the world, and so to manage it, as not only not to be hindered by, but to be furthered and carried on by it, in our journey towards heaven, then he makes us to ride on the high places of the earth.

3. We shall have the profit of it: "I will feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father;" that is, with all the blessings of the covenant, and all the precious products of Canaan, which was a type of heaven, and which were the heritage of Jacob. Observe, the heritage of believers is what they shall not only be portioned with hereafter, but fed with now; fed with the hopes of it, and not flattered; fed with the earnests and foretastes of it; and they that are so fed have reason to say that they are well fed. And that we may depend upon it, it is added, "The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." You may take God's word for it, for he cannot lie nor deceive. What his mouth hath spoken his hand will give, his hand will do; and not one iota or tittle of his good promise shall fall to the ground. Blessed, therefore, thrice blessed, is he that doth this, and lays hold on it, that keeps the sabbath from polluting it.

CHAPTER LIX.

In this chapter we have sin appearing exceeding sinful, and grace appearing exceeding gracious; and as what is here said of the sinner's sin, ver. 7, 8, is applied to the general corruption of mankind, Rom. iii. 15, so what is here said of a redeemer, ver. 20, is applied to Christ, Rom. xi. 26. I. It is here charged upon this people, that they had themselves stopped the current of God's favours to them, and the particular sins are instanced in, which kept good things from them, ver. 1—8. II. It is here charged upon them, that they had themselves procured the judgments of God upon them; and they are told both what the judgments were which they had brought upon their own heads, ver. 9—11, and what the sins were that provoked God to send those judgments, ver. 12—15. III. It is here promised that, notwithstanding this, God would work deliverance for them, purely for his own name's sake, ver. 16—19; and would reserve mercy in store for them, and entail it upon them, ver. 20, 21.

BEHOLD, the LORD's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save;
Neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear: [God,
2 But your iniquities have separated between you and your
And your sins have hid his face from you, that he will 3 For your hands are defiled with blood, [not hear.
And your fingers with iniquity; [perverseness.
Your lips have spoken lies, your tongue hath muttered
4 None calleth for justice, nor any pleadeth for truth:
They trust in vanity, and speak lies;
They conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity,
5 They hatch cockatrice' eggs,

PHRYGIAN BOA AND CERASTES.

And weave the spider's web:
He that eateth of their eggs dieth,
And that which is crushed breaketh out into a viper.
6 Their webs shall not become garments,
Neither shall they cover themselves with their works:
Their works are works of iniquity,
And the act of violence is in their hands
7 Their feet run to evil,
And they make haste to shed innocent blood:
Their thoughts are thoughts of iniquity;
Wasting and destruction are in their paths.
8 The way of peace they know not;
And there is no judgment in their goings:
They have made them crooked paths:
Whosoever goeth therein shall not know peace

The prophet here rectifies the mistake of those who had been quarrelling with God because they had not the deliverances wrought for them which they had been often fasting and praying for, ch. lviii. 3. Now here he shews,

First. That it was not owing to God. They had no reason to lay the fault upon him, that they were not saved out of the hands of their enemies. For, 1. He was still as able to help as ever; "His hand is not shortened," that is, his power is not at all lessened, straitened, or abridged, whether we consider the extent of his power or the efficacy of it. God can reach as far as ever, and with as strong a hand as ever. Note, The church's salvation comes from the hand of God, and that is not waxed weak, nor at all shortened. "Is the Lord's hand waxen short?" saith God to Moses, Num. xi. 23. No, it is not; he will not have it thought so. Neither length of time, nor strength of enemies, nor weakness of instruments, can shorten or straiten the power of God, with which it is "all one to save by many or by few." 2. He was still as ready and willing to help as ever, in answer to prayer. "His ear is not heavy, that it cannot hear." Though he has many prayers to hear and answer, and though he has been long hearing prayer, yet he is still as ready to hear prayer as ever. The prayer of the upright is as much his delight as ever it was; and the promises which are pleaded and put in suit and prayer are still Yea and Amen, inviolably sure. More is implied than is expressed; not only his ear is not heavy, but he is quick of hearing, even before they call he answers, ch. lxv. 24. If our prayers be not answered, and the salvation we wait for be not wrought for us, it is not because God is weary of hearing prayer, but because we are weary of praying; not because his ear is heavy when we speak to him, but because our ears are heavy when he speaks to us.

Secondly. That it was owing to themselves; they stood in their own light, and put a bar in their own door. God was coming towards them in ways of mercy, and they hindered him; "Your iniquities have kept good things from you," Jer. v. 25.

1. See what mischief sin doth. 1st. It hinders God's mercies from coming down upon us; it is a partition wall, that separates between God and us. Notwithstanding the infinite distance that is between God and man by nature, there was a correspondence settled between them, till sin set them at variance, justly provoked God against man, and unjustly alienated man from God. Thus it separates between them and God. He is your God, yours in profession; and therefore there is so much the more malignity and mischievousness in sin, which separates between us and him. It hides his face from us, which notes great displeasure, Deu. xxxi. 17. It provokes him in anger to withdraw his gracious presence, to suspend the tokens of his favour, and the instances of his help. He hides his face, as refusing to be seen or spoken with. See here sin in its colours, sin exceeding sinful, withdrawing the creature from his allegiance to his Creator; and see sin in its consequence, sin exceeding hurtful, separating us from God, and so separating us not only from all good, but to all evil, Deu. xxix. 13, which is the very quintessence of the curse. 2nd. It hinders our prayers from coming up unto God; it provokes him to hide his face, that he will not hear, as he hath said, ch. i. 15. If we regard iniquity in our heart, if we indulge it, and allow ourselves in it, God will not hear our prayers, Ps. lxvi. 18. We cannot expect he should countenance us while we go on to affront him.

2. Now, to justify God in hiding his face from them, and proceeding in his controversy with them, the prophet shews very largely, in the following verses, how many and great their iniquities were, according to the charge given him, ch. lviii. 1, to shew God's people their transgressions; and it is a black bill of indictment that is here drawn up against them, consisting of many particulars, any one of which was enough to separate between them and a just and holy God. Let us endeavour to reduce these articles of impeachment to proper heads.

1st. We must begin with their thoughts, for there all sin begins, and thence it takes its rise. Their thoughts are thoughts of iniquity, ver. 7. Their imaginations are so, only evil continually; their projects and designs are so, they are continually contriving some mischief or other, how to compass the gratification of some base lust; ver. 4, "They conceive mischief" in their fancy, purpose, counsel, and resolution; thus the embryo receives its shape and life and then "they bring forth iniquity," put it in execution when it is ripened for it. Though it be in pain, perhaps, that the iniquity is brought forth, through the oppositions of providence, and the checks of their own consciences, yet when they have compassed their wicked purpose, they look upon it with as much pride and pleasure as if it were a man child born into the world. "Thus when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin," Jas. i. 15; this is called, ver. 5, "hatching the cockatrice' eggs, and weaving the spider's web." See how the thoughts and contrivances of wicked men are employed, and about what they set their wits on work. First. At the best it is about that which is foolish and frivolous. Their thoughts are vain, like weaving the spider's web, which the poor silly animal takes a great deal of pains about, and when all is done it is a weak insignificant thing, a reproach to the place where it is, and which the besom sweeps away in an instant. Such are the thoughts which worldly men entertain themselves with, building castles in the air, and pleasing themselves with imaginary satisfactions; like the spider, that takes hold with her hands very finely, Pr. xxx. 28, but cannot keep her hold. Secondly. Too often it is about that which is malicious and spiteful; "They hatch the eggs of the cockatrice," or adder, which are poisonous, and produce venomous creatures. Such are the thoughts of the wicked that delight in doing mischief. "He that eats of their eggs," that is, that has any dealing with them, "dieth," that is, he is in danger of having some mischief or other done him; "and that which is crushed" in order to be eaten of, or which begins to be hatched, and you promise yourself some useful fowl from it, it "breaks out into a viper," which it is at your peril if you meddle with it. Happy they that have least to do with such ill men. Even the spider's web they wove was with a spiteful design to catch flies in it, and make a prey of them; for, rather than not be doing mischief, they will play at small game.

2nd. Out of this abundance of wickedness in the heart their mouth speaks; and yet it doth not always speak out the wickedness that is within, but, for the more effectual compassing of the mischievous design, it is dissembled and covered with much fair speech; ver. 3, "Your lips have spoken lies;" and again, ver. 4, they speak lies, pretending kindness, where they intend the greatest mischief. Or, by slanders and false accusations, they blasted the credit and reputation of those they had a spite to, and so did them a real mischief unseen; and perhaps, by suborning witnesses against them, took from them their estates and lives. For a false tongue is sharp arrows and coals of juniper, and every thing that is mischievous. "Your tongue has muttered perverseness." When they could not for shame speak their malice against their neighbours aloud, or durst not, for fear of being disproved and put to confusion, they muttered it secretly. Backbiters are called whisperers.

3rd. Their actions were all of a piece with their thoughts and words. They were guilty of shedding innocent blood, a crime of the most heinous nature; "Your hands are defiled with blood," ver. 3. For blood is defiling, leaves an indelible stain of guilt upon the conscience, which nothing but the blood of Christ can cleanse it from; and this not by surprise, or when there was something of a force put upon them, ver. 7, their feet run to this evil, naturally and eagerly, and hurried on by the impetus of their malice and revenge; "They make haste to shed innocent blood," as if they were afraid of losing an opportunity to do a barbarous thing, Pr. i. 16; Jer. xxii. 17. "Wasting and destruction are in their paths." Wherever they go they carry mischief along with them; and the tendency of their way is to lay waste and destroy, nor do they c[illegible] what we must speak modestly. The sense conveyed by our version is not at all to be undervalued. It should be added that the other idea is suggested in the margin for the last words—"put him to flight."

lx. 5. The first clause may be somewhat differently rendered thus: "Then shalt thou see and be bright (or cheerful), and thy heart shall throb and dilate." The second clause involves no special difficulty; the word rendered "abundance" means wealth, which would flow to Israel; and the word for "forces" also means riches.

lx. 6. Camels are still a source of wealth in Western Asia. Instead of "dromedaries" some understand "young camels," and others a choicer variety of camel. The Midianites inhabited the north-western portion of Arabia. The Arabian tribe of Epha were located near the Midianites. Sheba here must be treated as another Arabian name, and not as the appellation of an African race. Dr. Henderson explains Sheba as Arabia Felix, or the regions between the Persian Gulf and the Red Sea, and now called the Hejaz. He says its havock they make. Nor do they only thirst after blood; but with other iniquities are their fingers defiled, ver. 3. They wrong people in their estates, and make every thing their own that they can lay their hands on; "They trust in vanity," ver. 4, that is, they depend upon their arts of cozenage to enrich themselves with, which will prove vanity to them, and their deceiving others will but deceive themselves. Their work, which they take so much pains about, and have their hearts so much upon, are all works of iniquity. Their whole business is one continued course of oppressions and vexations, and the act of violence is in their hands, according to the arts of violence that are in their heads, and the thoughts of violence in their hearts.

4th. No methods are taken to redress these grievances, and reform these abuses; ver. 4, "None calleth for justice." None complains of the violation of the sacred laws of justice, nor seeks to right those that suffer wrong, or to get the laws put in execution against vice and profaneness, and those lewd practices which are the shame, and threaten to be the bane, of the nation. Note, When justice is not done, there is blame to be laid, not only upon the magistrates that should administer justice, but upon the people that should call for it. Private persons ought to contribute to the public good, by discovering secret wickedness, and giving those an opportunity to punish it that have it in the power of their hands; but it is ill with a state when princes rule ill, and the people love to have it so. Truth is opposed, and there is not any that pleadeth for it, nor any that has the conscience and courage to appear in defence of an honest cause, and confront a prosperous fraud and wrong. The way of peace is as little regarded as the way of truth. They know it not; that is, they never study the things that make for peace. No care is taken to prevent or punish the breakers of the peace, and to accommodate matters in difference among neighbours; they are utter strangers to every thing that looks quiet and peaceable, and affect that which is blustering and turbulent. "There is no judgment in their goings," that is, they have not any sense of justice in their dealings; it is a thing they make no account of at all, but can easily break through all its fences, if they stand in the way of their malicious covetous designs.

5th. In all this they act foolishly, very foolishly, and as much against their interest as against reason and equity. They that practise iniquity trust in vanity, which will certainly deceive them; ver. 4, "Their webs" which they weave with so much art and industry, "shall not become garments, neither shall they cover themselves," either for shelter or for ornament, "with their works," ver. 6. They may do hurt to others with their projects, but can never do any real service or kindness to themselves by them. There is nothing to be got by sin; and so it will appear, when profit and loss come to be compared. Those paths of iniquity are crooked paths, ver. 8, which will perplex them, but will never bring them to their journey's end. Whosoever goes therein, though they say they shall have peace, though they go on, deceive themselves; for they shall not know peace, as appears by the following verses.

9 Therefore is judgment far from us,
Neither doth justice overtake us:
We wait for light, but behold obscurity;
For brightness, but we walk in darkness
10 We grope for the wall like the blind,
And we grope as if we had no eyes:
We stumble at noon day as in the night;
We are in desolate places as dead men
11 We roar all like bears,
And mourn sore like doves:
We look for judgment, but there is none;
For salvation, but it is far off from us.
12 For our transgressions are multiplied before thee,
And our sins testify against us.
For our transgressions are with us;
And as for our iniquities, we know them;
13 In transgressing and lying against the LORD,
And departing away from our God,
Speaking oppression and revolt,
Conceiving and uttering from the heart words of falsehood.
14 And judgment is turned away backward,
And justice standeth afar off:
For truth is fallen in the street,
And equity cannot enter
15 Yea, truth faileth;
And he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey:
And the LORD saw it,
And it displeased him that there was no judgment.

The scope of this paragraph is the same with that of the last, to shew that sin is the great mischief-maker; as it is that that keeps good things from us, so it is that that brings evil things upon us. But, as there it is spoken by the prophet in God's name to the people for their conviction and humiliation, and that God might be justified when he speaketh, and clear when he judgeth, so here it seems to be spoken by the people to God, as an acknowledgment of that which was there told them, and an expression of their humble submission and subscription to the justice and equity of God's proceedings against them. Their uncircumcised hearts here seem to be humbled in some measure, and they are brought to confess,—the confession is at least extorted from them,—that God hath justly walked contrary to them, because they had walked contrary to him.

First. They acknowledge that God had contended with them, and had walked contrary to them. Their case was very deplorable, ver. 9—11. 1. They were in distress, trampled upon, and oppressed by their enemies; unjustly dealt with, and ruled with rigour, and God did not appear for them to plead their just and injured cause. "Judgment is far from us, neither doth justice overtake us." Though, as to our persecutors, we are sure we have right on our side and they are the wrong-doers, yet we are not relieved, we are not righted, we have not done justice to one another, and therefore God suffers our enemies to deal thus unjustly with us, and we are as far as ever from being restored to our right, and recovering our property again. Oppression is near us, and "judgment is far from us;" our enemies are far from giving our case its due consideration, but still hurry us on with the violence of their oppressions, and "justice does not overtake us," to rescue us out of their hands. 2. Herein their expectations were sadly disappointed, which made their case the more sad. "We wait for light," as they that wait for the morning, "but behold obscurity;" we cannot discern the least dawning of the day of our deliverance; "we look for judgment, but there is none," ver. 11; neither God nor man appears for our succour. "We look for salvation," because God, we think, has promised it, and we have prayed for it with fasting. We looked for it as for brightness, "but it is far off from us," as far off as ever, for aught we can perceive, and still "we walk in darkness;" and the higher our expectations have been raised the sorer is the disappointment. 3. They were quite at a loss what to do to help themselves, and were at their wit's end; ver. 10, "We grope for the wall like the blind;" we see no way open for our relief, nor know which way to expect it, or what to do in order to it. If we shut our eyes against the light of Divine truth, it is just with God to hide from our eyes the things that belong to our peace; and, if we use not our eyes as we should, to let us be as if we had no eyes. They that will not see their duty shall not see their interest. They whom God hath given up to a judicial blindness are strangely infatuated; "they stumble at noonday as in the night;" they see not either those dangers or those advantages which all about them see. Quos Deus vult perdere, eos dementat,—'God infatuates those whom he means to destroy.' Those that love darkness rather than light, so shall their doom be. 4. They sunk into despair, and were quite overwhelmed with grief, the marks of which appeared in every man's countenance; they grew melancholy upon it, shunned conversation, and affected solitude. "We are in desolate places as dead men." The state of the Jews in Babylon is represented by dead and dry bones, Eze. xxxvii. 1, and the reddition of the comparison there, ver. 11, explains this text, "Our hope is lost, we are cut off for our parts." In this despair the sorrow and anguish of some was loud and noisy, "We roar like bears;" the sorrow of others was silent, and preyed more upon their spirits, "We mourn sore like doves," like doves of the valleys; we mourn both for our iniquities, Eze. vii. 16, and "for our calamities." Thus they own that "the hand of the Lord was gone out against them."

Secondly. They acknowledge that they had provoked God thus to contend with them; that he had done right, for they had done wickedly, ver. 12—15. 1. They owned that they had sinned, and that to this day they were in a great trespass, as Ezra speaks, Ezr. x. 7, "Our transgressions are with us," the guilt of them is upon us, the power of them prevails among us. We are not yet reformed, nor have we parted with our sins, though they have done us so much mischief; nay, "our transgressions are multiplied," they are more numerous, and more heinous than they have been formerly. Look which way we will, we cannot look off them; all places, all orders and degrees of men, are infected. The sense of our transgression is with us, as David said, "My sin is ever before me;" it is too plain to be denied or concealed, too bad to be excused or palliated. God is a witness to them; they are multiplied before thee, in thy sight, under thine eye. We are witnesses against ourselves; "As for our iniquities we know them," though they may have foolishly endeavoured to cover them; nay, they themselves are witnesses; our sins stare us in the face, and testify against us, so many have they been, and so deeply aggravated. 2. They own the great evil and malignity there is in sin, in their sin; it is "transgressing and lying against the Lord," ver. 13. The sins of those that profess themselves God's people, and bear his name, are, upon this account, worse than the sins of others, that, in transgressing, they "lie against the Lord;" that is, they falsely accuse him; they misrepresent and belie him, as if he had dealt hardly and unfairly with them; or they perfidiously break covenant with him, and falsify their most sacred and solemn engagements to him. That is lying against him; it is departing away from our God, to whom we are obliged as ours, and to whom we ought to cleave with purpose of heart. From him we have departed, as the rebellious subject from his allegiance to his rightful prince, and the adulterous wife from the guide of her youth, and the covenant of her God. 3. They own that there was a general decay of moral honesty; and it is not strange that those who were false to their God are never faithful to one another. They spoke oppression, declared openly for that, though it was a revolt from their God, and a revolt from truth, by the sacred bonds of which we should always be tied, and held fast. They "conceived and uttered words of falsehood." Many an ill thing is conceived in the mind, yet is prudently stifled there, and not suffered to go any farther; but these sinners were so impudent, so daring, that whatever wickedness they conceived they gave it an imprimatur,—'a sanction,' and made no difficulty of publishing it. To think an ill thing is bad, but to say it is much worse. Many a word of falsehood is uttered in haste, for want of consideration; but these were conceived and uttered, were uttered deliberately, and of malice prepense. They were words of falsehood, and yet they are said to be uttered from the heart; because, though they differed from the real sentiments of the heart, and therefore were words of falsehood, yet they agreed with the malice and wickedness of the heart, and were the natural language of that; it was a double heart, Ps. xii. 2. Those who by the grace of God kept themselves free from these enormous crimes yet put themselves into the confession of sin, because members of that nation which was generally thus corrupted. 4. They own that that was not done which might have been done to reform the land, and to amend what was amiss; ver. 14, "Judgment," that should go forward, and bear down the opposition that is made to it, that should run its course like a river, like a mighty stream, "is turned away backward" a contrary course. The administration of justice is become but an umbrage to the greatest injustice. "Judgment," that should check the proceedings of fraud and violence, "is driven back," and so they go on triumphantly. "Justice stands afar off," even from our courts of judicature, which are so crowded with the patrons of oppression, that "equity cannot enter," cannot have admission into the court, cannot be heard, or at least shall not be heeded. Equity enters not into the unrighteous decrees which they decree; ch. x. 1, "Truth is fallen in the street," and there she may lie, to be trampled upon by every foot of pride, and she has never a friend that will lend a hand to help her up; yea, truth faileth in common conversation, and in dealings between man and man, so that one knows not whom to believe, nor whom to trust. 5. They own that there was a prevailing enmity in men's minds to those that were good. He that doth evil goes unpunished, but "he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey" to those beasts of prey that were before described. It is crime enough with them for a man not to do as they do; and they treat him as an enemy that will not partake with them in their wickedness. 'He that departeth from evil is accounted mad,' so the margin reads it. Sober singularity is branded as folly; and he is thought next door to a madman that swims against the stream that runs so strong. 6. They own that all this could not but be very displeasing to the God of heaven. The evil was done in his sight; they knew very well, though they were not willing to acknowledge it, that "the Lord saw it;" though it was done secretly, and gilded over with specious pretences, yet it could not be concealed from his all-seeing eye. All the wickedinhabitants carried on a great trade in their own and in Indian and Phœnician articles.

lx. 7. Kedar and Nebaioth were Arab tribes descended from Ishmael, and their wealth seems to have chiefly consisted in sheep.

lx. 9. What islands are specially meant here is unknown. As previously noticed, ships of Tarshish may be any merchant ships.

lx. 13. "The glory of Lebanon" is the cedar; the fir-tree may be correct, or may be the cypress; the pine-tree is uncertain, and Dr. Tristram thinks a sort of elm is meant. The box is found in Syria, and seems to have been used for ornamental work.

lx. 17. The word for "officers" is an abstract noun in the plural, like our word "ministry" for ministers. It is intended for officials, or, as some render it, "inspectors." The word for "exactors" means those who occupy a higher position, as leaders and rulers, or princes. The sense of the whole is that the subordinate officials would promote peace and prosperity, and the higher rulers would be righteous.

ness that is in the world is naked and open before the eyes of God; and as he is of quicker eyes than not to see iniquity, so he is of purer eyes than to behold it with the least approbation or allowance. He "saw it, and it displeased him;" though it was among his own professing people that he saw it, "it was evil in his eyes;" he saw the sinfulness of all this sin, and that which was most offensive to him was, that "there was no judgment," no reformation. Had he seen any signs of that, though the sin displeased him, he would soon have been reconciled to the sinners, upon their returning from their evil way. Then the sin of a nation becomes national, and brings public judgments, when it is not restrained by public justice.

16 And he saw that there was no man,
And wondered that there was no intercessor:
Therefore his arm brought salvation unto him;
And his righteousness, it sustained him.
17 For he put on righteousness as a breastplate,
And an helmet of salvation upon his head;
And he put on the garments of vengeance for clothing,
And was clad with zeal as a cloke.
18 According to their deeds, accordingly he will repay,
Fury to his adversaries, recompence to his enemies;
To the islands he will repay recompence.
19 So shall they fear the name of the LORD from the west,
And his glory from the rising of the sun.
When the enemy shall come in like a flood,
The Spirit of the LORD shall lift up a standard against him.
20 And the Redeemer shall come to Zion,
And unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob,
saith the LORD.
21 As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the LORD;
My spirit that is upon thee,
And my words which I have put in thy mouth,
Shall not depart out of thy mouth,
Nor out of the mouth of thy seed,
Nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the LORD,
From henceforth and for ever.

How sin abounded, we have read, to our great amazement, in the former part of the chapter; how grace doth much more abound, we read in these verses. And, as sin took occasion from the commandment to become more exceeding sinful, so grace took occasion from the transgression of the commandment to appear more exceeding gracious. Observe,

First. Why God wrought salvation for this provoking people, notwithstanding their provocations. It was purely for his own name's sake; because there was nothing in them either to bring it about or to induce him to bring it about for them; no merit to deserve it, no might to effect it; he would do it himself, would be exalted in his own strength, for his own glory. 1. He took notice of their weakness and wickedness; "he saw that there was no man" that would do any thing for the support of the bleeding cause of religion and virtue among them; not a man that would execute judgment, Jer. v. 1; that would bestir himself in a work of reformation. Those that complained of the badness of the times yet had not zeal and courage enough to appear and act against it; there was a universal corruption of manners, and nothing done to stem the tide. Most were wicked, and those that were not so, yet were weak, and durst not attempt any thing in opposition to the wickedness of the wicked. "There was no intercessor;" either none to intercede with God, to stand in the gap, by prayer to turn away his wrath, (it would have pleased him to be thus met, and he wondered that he was not,) or rather, none to interpose for the support of justice and truth, that were trampled upon, and run down, ver. 14; no advocate to speak a good word for those that were made a prey of, because they kept their integrity, ver. 15. They complained God did not appear for them, ch. lviii. 3; but God, with much more reason, complains that they did nothing for themselves, intimating how ready he would have been to do them good, if he had found among them the least motions towards a reformation. 2. He engaged his own strength and righteousness for them. They shall be saved for all this. And,

1st. Because they have no strength of their own, nor any active men that will set to it in good earnest, to redress the grievances either of their iniquities or of their calamities, therefore his own arm shall bring salvation to him; that is, to his people, or to him whom he would raise up to be the deliverer, Christ the power of God and arm of the Lord, that man of his right hand whom he made strong for himself. The work of reformation,—that is the first and principal article of the salvation,—shall be wrought by the immediate influence of the Divine grace on men's consciences. Since magistrates and societies for reformation fail of doing their part,—one will not do justice, nor the other call for it,—God will let them know he can do it without them, when his time is come thus to prepare his people for mercy. And then the work of deliverance shall be wrought by the immediate operations of the Divine providence on men's affections and affairs. When God stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, and brought his people out of Babylon, not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, then his own arm, which is never shortened, brought salvation.

2nd. Because they have no righteousness of their own to merit these favours, and to which God might have an eye in working for them, therefore his own "righteousness it sustained him," and bore him out in it. Divine justice, which by their sins they had armed against them, through grace appears for them. Though they can expect no favour as due to them, yet he will be just to himself, to his own purpose, and promise, and covenant with his people; he will in righteousness punish the enemies of his people: see Deu. ix. 5, "Not for thy righteousness, but for the wickedness of these nations," they are driven out. In our redemption by Christ, since we had no righteousness of our own to produce, on which God might proceed in favour to us, he brought in a righteousness by the merit and mediation of his own Son; it is called "the righteousness which is of God by faith," Phil. iii. 9; and this righteousness sustained him, and bore him out in all his favours to us, notwithstanding our provocations. "He put on righteousness as a breastplate," securing his own honour as a breastplate doth the vitals, in all his proceedings, by the justice and equity of them; and then he put a "helmet of salvation upon his head." So sure is he to effect the salvation he intends, that he takes salvation itself for his helmet, which therefore must needs be impenetrable, and in which he appears very illustrious; formidable in the eyes of his enemies, and amiable in the eyes of his friends. When righteousness is his coat of arms, salvation is his crest. In allusion to this, among the pieces of a Christian's armour, we find "the breastplate of righteousness, and for a helmet the hope of salvation," Eph. vi. 14, 17; 1 Thes. v. 8; and it is called the armour of God, because he wore it first, and so fitted it for us.

3rd. Because they have no spirit or zeal to do any thing for themselves, God will "put on the garments of vengeance for clothing, and clad himself with zeal as a cloak;" that is, he will make his justice upon the enemies of his church and people, and his jealousy for his own glory and the honour of religion and virtue among men, to appear evident and conspicuous in the eye of the world; and in these he will shew himself great, as a man shews himself in his rich attire, or in the distinguishing habit of his office. If men be not zealous against sin, God will, and will take vengeance on it for all the injury it has done to his honour, and his people's welfare. And this was the business of Christ in the world, to take away sin, and be revenged on it.

Secondly. What the salvation is that shall be wrought out by the righteousness and strength of God himself.

1. There shall be a present temporal salvation wrought out for the Jews in Babylon, or elsewhere, in distress and captivity. This is promised, ver. 18, 19, as a type of something farther. When God's time is come, he will do his own work, though those fail that should forward it. It is here promised,

1st. That God will reckon with his enemies, and will render to them "according to their deeds;" to the enemies of his people abroad, that have oppressed them; to the enemies of justice and truth at home, that have oppressed them, for they also are God's enemies; and when the day of vengeance comes, he will deal with both as they have deserved; 'according to retributions,' so the word is; the law of retribution, Rev. xiii. 10; or, according to former retributions, as he has rendered to his enemies formerly, "accordingly he will" now "repay fury to his adversaries, recompence to his enemies." His fury shall not exceed the rules of justice, as men's fury commonly doth. Even "to the islands," that lie most remote, if they have appeared against him, "he will repay recompence;" for "his hand shall find out all his enemies," Ps. xxi. 8, and his arrows reach them. Though God's people have carried themselves so ill that they do not deserve to be delivered, yet his enemies carry themselves so much worse that they do deserve to be destroyed.

2nd. That whatever attempts the enemies of God's people may afterwards make upon them to disturb their peace, they shall be baffled, and brought to nought. "When the enemy shall come in like a flood," like a high spring-tide, or a land-flood, which threaten to bear down all before them without control, then "the Spirit of the Lord," by some secret, undiscerned power, "shall lift up a standard against him;" and so, as the margin reads it, 'put him to flight.' He that hath delivered will still deliver. When God's people are weak and helpless, and have no standard to lift up against the invading power, God will "give a banner to them that fear him," Ps. lx. 4; will, by his Spirit, lift up a standard, which will draw multitudes together to appear on the church's behalf. Some read it, 'He shall come,' (that is, the name of the Lord, and his glory before foreseen of the Messiah promised,) 'like a straight river, the Spirit of the Lord lifting him up for an ensign.' Christ, by the preaching of his Gospel, shall cover the earth with the knowledge of God, as with the waters of a flood; the Spirit of the Lord setting up Christ as a standard to the Gentiles, ch. xi. 10.

3rd. That all this should redound to the glory of God, and the advancement of religion in the world; ver. 19, "So shall they fear the name of the Lord and his glory," in all nations that lie eastward or westward. The deliverance of the Jews out of captivity, and the destruction brought on their oppressors, would awaken multitudes to inquire concerning the God of Israel, and induce them to serve and worship him, and enlist themselves under the standard which the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up. God's appearances for his church shall occasion the accession of many to it. This had its full accomplishment in gospel times, when many came from the east and west to fill up the places of the children of the kingdom that shall be cast out, when there were set up eastern and western churches, Mat. viii. 11.

2. There shall be a more glorious salvation wrought out by the Messiah in the fulness of time; which salvation all the prophets upon all occasions had in view. We have here the two great promises relating to that salvation:

1st. That the Son of God shall come to us to be our Redeemer; ver. 20, "The Redeemer shall come." It is applied to Christ, Rom. xi. 26, "There shall come the Deliverer." The coming of Christ as the Redeemer is the summary of all the promises both of the Old and New Testament; and this was the redemption in Jerusalem which the believing Jews looked for, Lu. ii. 38. Christ is our goel, our next kinsman, that redeems both the person and the estate of the poor debtor. Observe, First. The place where this Redeemer shall appear. He shall come to Zion, for there, on that holy hill, the Lord would set him up as his King, Ps. ii. 6. In Zion the chief corner-stone was to be laid, 1 Pet. ii. 6. He came to his temple there, Mal. iii. 1. There salvation was to be placed, ch. xlvi. 13; for thence the law was to go forth, ch. ii. 3. Zion was a type of the gospel church, for which the Redeemer acts in all his appearances. The Redeemer shall come for the sake of Zion, so the Seventy read it. Secondly. The persons that shall have the comfort of the Redeemer's coming, that shall then lift up their heads, knowing that their redemption draws nigh. He shall come to those that turn from ungodliness in Jacob, to those that are in Jacob, to the praying seed of Jacob, in answer to their prayers; yet not to all that are in Jacob, that are within the pale of the visible church, but to those only that turn from transgression, that repent and reform, and forsake those sins which Christ came to redeem them from. The sinners in Zion will fare never the better for the Redeemer's coming to Zion if they go on still in their trespasses.

2nd. That the Spirit of God shall come to us to be our Sanctifier, ver. 21. In the Redeemer there was a new covenant made with us, a covenant of promises; and this is the great and comprehensive promise of that covenant that God will give and continue his word and Spirit to his church and people throughout all generations. God's giving the Spirit to them that ask him includes the giving them all good things, Lu. xi. 13; Mat. vii. 11. This covenant is here said to be made with them; that is, with them that turn from transgression; for they that cease to do evil shall be taught to do well. But the promise is made to a single person, "My Spirit that is upon thee;" being directed either, First. To Christ, as the head of the church, who received that he might give. The Spirit promised to the church was first upon him, and from his head that precious ointment descended to the skirts of his garments; and the word of the Gospel was first put into his mouth, for it began to be spoken by the Lord. And all believers are his seed, in whom he prolongs his days, ch. liii. 10. Or, Secondly. To the church; and so it is a promise of the

lx. 18. The walls would be called "Salvation" because efficient for protection, and the gates would be called "Praise" because of their affording free ingress and egress. Freed alike from foes without and from factions within, the happiness of Israel would be complete.

lx. 19, 20. This language is highly figurative, and is similar to that employed in the Revelation to describe the new Jerusalem. Very little of this glory was realised under the law but more is to be seen under the Gospel, and the full realisation is reserved for heaven.

lx. 21, 22. Some commentators, while they very properly urge that various expressions in these and preceding verses compel us to admit the application of the prophecy to Israel, are yet not justified in excluding all reference to the Gospel and the Church of Christ. The last words of verse 22 might be more accurately rendered, "I the Lord will hasten it in its time, or "in due time" continuance and perpetuity of the church in the world to the end of time, parallel to those promises that the throne and seed of Christ shall endure for ever, Ps. lxxxix. 29, 36; xxii. 30. Observe, 1st. How the church shall be kept up. In a succession, as the world of mankind is kept up, by the seed, and the seed's seed; as one generation passeth away another generation shall come; "instead of the fathers shall be the children." 2nd. How long it shall be kept up. "From henceforth and for ever," always, "even unto the end of the world;" for, the world being left to stand for the sake of the church, we may be sure that as long as it doth stand, Christ will have a church in it, though not always visible. 3rd. By what means it shall be kept up. By the constant residence of the word and Spirit in it. (1.) The Spirit that was upon Christ shall always continue in the hearts of the faithful. There shall be some in every age on whom he shall work, and in whom he shall dwe l; and thus the Comforter shall abide with the church for ever, Jno. xiv. 16. (2.) The word of Christ shall always continue in the mouths of the faithful; that is, there shall be some in every age who, believing with the heart unto righteousness, shall with the tongue make confession unto salvation. The word shall never depart out of the mouth of the church, for there shall still be a seed to speak Christ's holy language, and profess his holy religion. Observe, The Spirit and the word go together, and by them the church is kept up; for the word in the mouths of our ministers, nay, the word in our own mouths, will not profit us unless the Spirit work with the word, and give us an understanding. But the Spirit doth his work by the word, and in concurrence with it; and whatever is pretended to be a dictate of the Spirit must be tried by the Scriptures. On these foundations the church is built, stands firm, and shall stand for ever, Christ himself being the chief corner-stone.

CHAPTER LX.

This whole chapter is all to the same purpose, all in the same strain. It is a part of God's covenant with his church, which is spoken of in the last verse of the foregoing chapter; and the blessings here promised are the fruits of the word and Spirit there promised. The long continuance of the church, even unto the utmost ages of time, was there promised; and here the large extent of the church, even unto the utmost regions of the earth; and both these tend to the honour of the Redeemer. It is here promised, I. That the church should be enlightened and shined upon, ver. 1, 2. II. That it should be enlarged, and great additions made to it, to join with it in the service of God, ver. 3—8. III. That the new converts should be greatly serviceable to the church, and to the interests of it, ver. 9—13. IV. That the church shall be in great honour and reputation among men, ver. 14—16. V. That it shall enjoy a profound peace and tranquillity, ver. 17, 18. VI. That the members of it being all righteous, the glory and joy of it shall be everlasting, ver. 19—22. Now this has some reference to the peaceable and prosperous condition which the Jews were sometimes in, after their return out of captivity into their own land; but it certainly looks farther, and was to have its full accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah, the enlargement of that kingdom by the bringing in of the Gentiles into it, and the spiritual blessings in heavenly things by Christ Jesus, with which it should be enriched; and all these earnests of eternal joy and glory.

ARISE, shine; for thy light is come,
And the glory of the LORD is risen upon thee.
2 For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth,
And gross darkness the people:
But the LORD shall arise upon thee,
And his glory shall be seen upon thee.
3 And the Gentiles shall come to thy light,
And kings to the brightness of thy rising
4 Lift up thine eyes round about, and see:
All they gather themselves together, they come to thee:
Thy sons shall come from far,
And thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side.
5 Then thou shalt see, and flow together,
And thine heart shall fear, and be enlarged; [thee,
Because the abundance of the sea shall be converted unto
The forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee.
6 The multitude of camels shall cover thee,
The dromedaries of Midian and Ephah;
All they from Sheba shall come:
They shall bring gold and incense;
And they shall shew forth the praises of the LORD
7 All the flocks of Kedar shall be gathered together unto
The rams of Nebaioth shall minister unto thee: [thee,
They shall come up with acceptance on mine altar,
And I will glorify the house of my glory.
8 Who are these that fly as a cloud,
And as the doves to their windows?

It is here promised that the Gospel temple shall be very lightsome, and very large.

First. It shall be very lightsome; "Thy light is come." When the Jews returned out of captivity they had light and gladness, and joy and honour; they were then made to know the Lord, and to rejoice in his great gladness; and upon both accounts their light came. When the Redeemer came to Zion he brought light with him, he himself c[illegible]e to be a light. Now observe, 1. What this light is, and whence it ap[illegible]s. "The Lord shall arise upon thee," ver. 2; that is, the glory of the Lord, ver. 1, that shall be seen upon thee. God is the father and fountain of lights, and it is in his light that we shall see light. As far as we have the knowledge of God in us, and the favour of God towards us, our light is come. When God appears to us, and we have the comfort of his favour, then the glory of the Lord riseth upon us as the morning light. When he appears for us, and we have the credit of his favour, when he shews us some token for good, and proclaims his favour to us, then his glory is seen upon us, as it was upon Israel in the pillar of cloud and fire. When Christ arose as the Sun of righteousness, and in him the dayspring from on high visited us, then the glory of the Lord was seen upon us, the glory as of the firstbegotten of the Father. 2. What a foil there shall be to this light; "Darkness shall cover the earth." But though it be gross darkness, darkness that might be felt, like that of Egypt, that shall overspread the people, yet the church, like Goshen, shall have light at the same time. When the case of the nations that have not the Gospel shall be very melancholy, those dark corners of the earth being full of the habitations of cruelty to poor souls, the state of the church shall be very pleasant. 3. What is the duty which the rising of this light calls for; "Arise, shine." Not only receive this light, and, as the margin reads it, be enlightened by it, but reflect this light; arise and shine with rays borrowed from it. The children of light ought to shine as lights in the world. If God's glory be seen upon us to our honour we ought not only with our lips, but in our lives, to return the praise of it to his honour, Mat. v. 16; Phil. ii. 15.

Secondly. It shall be very large. When the Jews were settled again in their own land after their captivity, many of the people of the land joined themselves to them; but it doth not appear that there ever was any such numerous accession to them as would answer the fulness of this prophecy; and therefore we must conclude that this looks farther, to the bringing of the Gentiles into the gospel church: not their flocking to one particular place, though under that type it is here described, (there is no place now that is the centre of the church's unity,) but their flocking to Christ, and coming by faith, and hope, and holy love into that society, which is incorporated by the charter of his Gospel, and of the unity of which he only is the centre; that family which is named from him, Eph. iii. 15. And the gospel church is expressly called Zion and Jerusalem; and under that notion all believers are said to come to it, Heb. xii. 22; "Ye are come unto mount Zion, to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem;" which serves for a key to this prophecy, Eph. ii. 19. Observe,

1. What shall invite such multitudes to the church. "They shall come to thy light, and to the brightness of thy rising," ver. 3. They shall be allured to join themselves to thee, 1st. By the light that shines upon thee; the light of the glorious Gospel, which the churches hold forth, and therefore are called golden candlesticks. This light, which discovers so much of God, and his good will to man, by which life and immortality are brought to light, this shall invite all the serious, well-affected part of mankind to come and join themselves to the church, that they may have the benefit of this light, to inform them concerning truth and duty. 2nd. By the light with which thou shinest. The purity and love of the primitive Christians, their heavenly-mindedness, contempt of the world, and patient sufferings, were the brightness of the church's rising, which drew many into it. The beauty of holiness was the powerful attractive by which Christ had a willing people brought to him in the day of his power, Ps. cx. 3.

2. What multitudes shall come to the church. Great numbers shall come; Gentiles, or "nations of them which are saved," as it is expressed with allusion to this, Rev. xxi. 24. Nations shall be discipled, Mat. xxviii. 19, and even kings, men of figure, power, and influence, shall be added to the church. They come from all parts; ver. 4, "Lift up thine eyes round about and see" them coming; "devout men out of every nation under heaven," Acts ii. 5. See how white the fields are already to the harvest, Jno. iv. 35. See them coming in a body, as one man, and with one consent; "They gather themselves together," that they may strengthen one another's hands, and encourage one another. Come, and let us go, ch. ii. 3. They come from the remotest parts; they come to thee from far, having heard the report of thee, as the Queen of Sheba; or seen thy star in the east, as the wise men, and they will not be discouraged by the length of the journey from coming to thee. There shall come some of both sexes; sons and daughters shall come in the most dutiful manner, as thy sons and thy daughters, resolved to be of thy family, to submit to the laws of thy family, and put themselves under the tuition of it. They shall come to be nursed at thy side; that is, to have their education with thee from their cradle. The church's children must be nursed at her side, not sent out to be nursed among strangers. There, where alone the sincere milk of the word is to be had, must the church's new-born babes be nursed, that they may grow thereby, 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2. They that would enjoy the dignities and privileges of Christ's family must submit to the discipline of it.

3. What they shall bring with them, and what advantage shall accrue to the church by their accession to it. They that are brought into the church by the grace of God will be sure to bring all they are worth in with them, which, with themselves, they will devote to the honour and service of God, and do good with in their places. 1st. The merchants shall write "holiness to the Lord" upon their merchandise and their hire, as ch. xxiii. 18; "The abundance of the sea," either the wealth that is fetched out of the sea, the fish, the pearls, or that which is imported by sea, it shall all be converted to thee, and to thy use. The wealth of the rich merchants shall be laid out in works of piety and charity. 2nd. The mighty men of the nations shall employ their might in the service of the church. "The forces," or troops, "of the Gentiles shall come unto thee," to guard thy coasts, strengthen thine interests, and, if occasion be, to fight thy battles. The forces of the Gentiles had often been against the church, but now they shall be for it; for as God, when he pleaseth, can, and when we please him will, make even our enemies to be at peace with us, Pr. xvi. 7, so, when Christ overcomes the strong man armed he divides his spoils, and makes that to serve his interests which had been used against them, Lu. xi. 22. 3rd. The wealth imported by land carriage, as well as that by sea, shall be made use of in the service of God and the church; ver. 6, the camels and dromedaries that bring gold and incense; gold, to make the golden altar of, and incense and sweet perfumes to burn upon it. They of Midian and Sheba shall bring the richest commodities of their country; not to trade with, but to honour God with; and not in small quantities, but camel loads of them. This was in part fulfilled when the wise men of the east, (perhaps some of the countries here mentioned,) drawn by the brightness of the star, came to Christ, and presented to him treasures of gold, frankincense, and myrrh, Mat. ii. 11. 4th. Great number of sacrifices shall be brought to God's altar, acceptable sacrifices; and though brought by Gentiles they shall find acceptance, ver. 7 Kedar was famous for flocks, and it is likely the fattest rams were those of Nebaioth; they shall come up with acceptance on God's altar. God must be served and honoured with what we have, according as he hath blessed us, and with the best we have. This was fulfilled when, by the decree of Darius, the governors beyond the rivers (perhaps of some of these countries) were ordered to furnish the temple at Jerusalem with "bullocks, rams, and lambs, for the burnt offerings of the God of heaven," Ezr. vi. 9. And it had a farther accomplishment, and we trust will have, in the bringing in of the fulness of the Gentiles to the church, which is called the sacrificing, or offering up of the Gentiles unto God, Rom. xv. 16. The flocks and rams are precious souls; for they are said to minister to the church, and to come up as living sacrifices, presenting themselves to God by a reasonable service on his altar, Rom. xii. 1.

4. How God shall be honoured by the increase of the church, and the accession of such numbers to it. 1st. They shall intend the honour of God's name lxi. 1. Hereupon Barnes has the following sensible remarks:—"That this refers to the Messiah is, to the Christian, abundantly proved by the fact that the Lord Jesus expressly applied it to himself (see Luke iv. 21). Rosenmüller, Gesenius, and some others suppose that it refers to Isaiah himself, and that the idea is that the prophet proclaims his commission as authorised to administer consolation to the suffering exiles in Babylon. And it cannot be denied that the language is such as may be applied in a subordinate sense to the office of the prophet, and that the work of the Redeemer is here described in terms derived from the consolation and deliverance afforded to the long suffering exiles. But in a much higher sense it refers to the Messiah, and received an entire completion only as applied to him and to his work. Even Grotius, who has been said to find Christ nowhere in the Old Testament, remarks, 'Isaiah here speaks of himself, as the Chaldee observes, but in him we see a not obscure image of Christ.'"

In it. When they bring their gold and incense it shall not be to shew the riches of their country, or to gain applause to themselves for piety and devotion, but to "shew forth the praises of the Lord," ver. 6. Our greatest services and gifts to the church are not acceptable farther than we have an eye to the glory of God in them. And this must be our business in our attendance on public ordinances, to give unto the Lord the glory due to his name; and therefore, as these here, we are called out of darkness into light that we should shew forth the praises of him that called us, 1 Pet. ii. 9. 2nd. God will advance the honour of his own name by it. So he hath said, ver. 7, "I will glorify the house of my glory." The church is the house of God's glory, where he manifests his glory to his people, and receives that homage by which they do honour to him; and it is for the glory of this house, and of him that keeps house there, both that the Gentiles shall bring their offerings to it, and that they shall be accepted therein.

5. How the church shall herself be affected with this increase of her numbers, ver. 5. 1st. She shall be in a transport of joy upon this account; Thou shalt see, and flow together, or flow to and fro, as in a pleasing toss about it, surprised at it, but extremely glad of it. 2nd. There shall be a mixture of fear with this joy; "Thine heart shall fear;" doubting whether it be lawful to go in to the uncircumcised, and eat with them. Peter was so possessed with this fear that he needed a vision and voice from heaven to help him over it, Acts x. 28. But, 3rd. When this fear is conquered, thy heart shall be enlarged in holy love; so enlarged that thou shalt have room in it for all the Gentile converts. Thou shalt not have such a narrow soul as thou hast had, nor affections so confined within the Jewish pale. When God intends the beauty and prosperity of his church he gives this largeness of heart, and an extensive charity. 4th. These converts flocking to the church shall be mightily admired; ver. 8, Who are these that fly as a cloud? Observe, First. How the conversion of souls is here described. It is flying to Christ, and to his church; for thither we are directed. It is flying like a cloud, though in great multitudes, so as to overspread the heavens, yet with great unanimity, all as one cloud. They shall come with speed, as a cloud flying on the wings of the wind; and come openly and in the view of all, their very enemies beholding them, Rev. xi. 12, and yet not able to hinder them. They shall fly as "doves to their windows," in great flights, many together; they fly on the wings of the harmless dove, that flies low, noting their innocency and humility. They fly to Christ, to the church, to the word and ordinances, as doves, by instinct, to their own windows, to their own home; thither they fly for refuge and shelter, when they are pursued by the birds of prey; and thither they fly for rest when they have been wandering, and are weary, as Noah's dove to the ark. Secondly. How the conversion of souls is here admired; it is spoken of both with wonder and pleasure. "Who are these?" We have reason to admire with wonder that so many flock to Christ; when we see them all together we shall admire whence they all came; and we have reason to admire with pleasure and affection those that flock to him. Who are these? How excellent, how amiable are they! What a pleasant sight is it to see poor souls hastening to Christ, with a full resolution to abide with him!

9 Surely the isles shall wait for me,
And the ships of Tarshish first,
To bring thy sons from far,
Their silver and their gold with them,
Unto the name of the LORD thy God, [thee
And to the Holy One of Israel, because he hath glorified
10 And the sons of strangers shall build up thy walls,
And their kings shall minister unto thee:
For in my wrath I smote thee,
But in my favour have I had mercy on thee.
11 Therefore thy gates shall be open continually,
They shall not be shut day nor night;
That men may bring unto thee the forces of the Gentiles,
And that their kings may be brought 12 For the nation and kingdom
That will not serve thee shall perish;
Yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted
13 The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee,
The fir tree, the pine tree, and the box together,
To beautify the place of my sanctuary;
And I will make the place of my feet glorious.
14 The sons also of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee;
And all they that despised thee shall bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet;
And they shall call thee, The city of the LORD,
The Zion of the Holy One of Israel.

The promises made to the church in the foregoing verses are here repeated, ratified, and enlarged upon; designed still for the comfort and encouragement of the Jews after their return out of captivity; but certainly looking farther to the enlargement and advancement of the gospel church, and the abundance of spiritual blessings with which it shall be enriched.

First. God will be very gracious and propitious to them. We must begin with that promise, because thence all the rest take rise. The sanctuary that was desolate then begins to be repaired, when God causeth his face to shine upon it, Dan. ix. 17. All the favour that the people of God find with men is owing to the light of God's countenance, and his favour to them, ver. 10. All shall now make court to thee, for "in my wrath I smote thee," while thou wast in captivity. And the sufferings of the church, especially by its corruptions, decays, and divisions, against which these promises here will be its relief, are sad tokens of God's displeasure; but now "in my favour have I had mercy on thee," and therefore have all this mercy in store for thee.

Secondly. Many shall be brought in to the church, even from far countries; ver. 9, "Surely the isles shall wait for me," shall welcome the Gospel, and shall attend God with their praises for it and their ready subjection to it. The ships of Tarshish, transport-ships, shall lie ready to carry members from far distant regions to the church, or, which is equivalent, to carry the ministers of the church to remote parts to preach the Gospel, and to bring in souls to join themselves to the Lord. Observe, 1. Who are brought; Thy sons, that is, such as are designed to be so, those "children of God that are scattered abroad," Jno. xi. 52. 2. What they shall bring with them. They live at such a distance that they cannot bring their flocks and their rams; but like those who lived remote from Jerusalem, when they came up to worship at the feast, because they could not bring their tithes in specie, turned it into money, they shall bring "their silver and their gold with them." Note, When we give up ourselves to God we must, with ourselves, give up all we have to him. If we honour him with our spirits we will honour him with our substance. 3. To whom they shall devote and dedicate themselves and all they are worth. To "the name of the Lord thy God," to God as the Lord of all, and the church's God and King, even to the Holy One of Israel, whom Israel worships as a Holy One, in the beauty of holiness, "because he hath glorified thee." Note, The honour God puts upon his church and people should not only engage us to honour them, but invite us to join ourselves to them; "We will go with you, for God is with you," Zec. viii. 23.

Thirdly. Those that come into the church shall be welcome; for so spacious is the holy city, that though, Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, yet still there is room. "Therefore thy gates shall be open continually," ver. 11, not only because thou hast no reason to fear thine enemies, but because thou hast reason to expect thy friends. And it is usual with us to leave our doors open, or leave some to be ready to open them all night, if we look for a child or a guest to come in late. Note, Christ is always ready to entertain those that come to him, is never out of the way, nor can they ever come unseasonably. The gate of mercy is always open, night and day, or shall soon be opened to them that knock. Ministers, the door-keepers, must be always ready to admit those that offer themselves to the Lord. God not only keeps a good house in his church, but he keeps open house; that at any time, by the preaching of the word, in season and out of season, the forces of the Gentiles, and the kings or commanders of those forces, may be brought into the church. "Lift up your heads, O ye gates," and let such welcome guests as these come in.

Fourthly. All that are about the church shall be made, some way or other, serviceable to it. Though dominion is far from being founded in men's grace, it is founded in God's; and he that made the inferior creatures useful to man will make the nations of men useful to the church: the earth helped the woman; all things are for your sakes. So here, ver. 10, even the sons of strangers, that have neither knowledge of thee nor kindness for thee, that have always been aliens to the commonwealth of Israel, even they shall build up thy wall, and their kings shall in that and other things minister unto thee, and not think it any disparagement to them. This was fulfilled when the king of Persia and the governors of the provinces, by his order, were aiding and assisting Nehemiah in building the wall about Jerusalem. Rather than Jerusalem's walls shall lie still in ruins, the sons of the stranger shall be raised up to build them. Even those that do not belong to the church yet may be a protection to it. And the greatest of men should not think it below them to minister to the church, but rejoice that they are in a capacity and have a heart to do it any service; nay, it is the duty of all to do what they can in their places to advance the interest of God's kingdom among men. It is at their peril if they do not: for, ver. 12, "The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish." Not that they must perish by thy sword or thine anathemas, or as if this gave any countenance to the using of external force for the propagating of the Gospel, or as if men might be compelled by penalties and punishments to come into the church; by no means. But those who will not by faith submit to Jesus Christ, the king of the church, and serve him, they shall perish eternally, Ps. ii. 12. They that will not be subject to Christ's golden sceptre, to the government of his word and Spirit, that will not be brought under or kept in by the discipline of his family, shall be broken in pieces by his iron rod; "Bring them forth, and slay them before me," Lu. xix. 27. Nations of such shall be utterly and eternally wasted when Christ comes to take vengeance on those that obey not his Gospel, 2 Thes. i. 8.

Fifthly. There shall be abundance of beauty added to the ordinances of Divine worship, ver. 13. The glory of Lebanon, the strong and stately cedars that grow there, shall come unto thee, as of old to Solomon, when he built the temple, 2 Chron. ii. 16, and with them other timber, proper for the carved work thereof, which the enemy had broken down, Ps. lxxiv. 5, 6. The temple, the place of God's sanctuary, shall not only be rebuilt, but beautified; it is the place of his feet, where he rests and resides, Eze. xliii. 7. The ark is called his footstool, because it was under the mercy-seat, Ps. cxxxii. 7. This he will make glorious in the eyes of his people and of all their neighbours. The glory of the latter house, to which this refers, though in many instances inferior, yet was really greater than the glory of the former, because Christ came to that temple, Mal. iii. 1. It was likewise "adorned with goodly stones and gifts," Lu. xxi, 5, to which this promise may have some reference; yet so slightly did Christ speak of them there that we must suppose it to have its full accomplishment in the beauties of holiness, and the graces and comforts of the Spirit, with which gospel ordinances are adorned and enriched.

Sixthly. The church shall appear truly great and honourable, ver. 14. The people of the Jews, after their return out of captivity, by degrees became more considerable, and made a better figure than one would have expected, after they had been so much reduced, and than any of the other nations recovered that had been in like manner humbled by the Chaldeans. It is probable many of those who had oppressed them in Babylon, when they were themselves driven out by the Persians, made their court to the Jews for shelter and supply, and were willing to scrape acquaintance with them. It is farther fulfilled, when those that have been enemies to the church are wrought upon by the grace of God to see their error, and come and join themselves to it. "The sons of them that afflicted thee," if not they themselves, yet their children, shall truckle to thee, shall beg pardon for their folly, and beg an interest in thy favour, and admission into thy family, 1 Sam. ii. 36. A promise like this is made to the church of Philadelphia, Rev. iii. 9; and it is intended to be, 1. A mortification to the proud oppressors of the church, that have afflicted her and despised her, and took a pleasure in doing it. They shall be brought down, their spirits shall be broken, and their condition shall be so mean and miserable, that they shall be glad to be obliged to those whom they have most studied to disoblige. Note, Sooner or later God will pour contempt upon those that put contempt upon his people. 2. An exaltation to the poor oppressed ones of the church. And this is the honour that shall be done them,—they shall have an opportunity of doing good to those who have done evil to them, and saving those alive that have afflicted and despised them. It is a pleasure to a good man, and he accounts it an honour, to shew mercy to those with whom he has found no mercy. Yet this is not all; they shall not only become supplicants to thee for their own interest, but they shall give honour to thee, "They shall call thee the city of the Lord;" they shall at length be convinced that thou art a favourite

lxi. 3. The sense is, "To appoint for them that mourn in Zion, that there should be given them a wreath, or crown, to put on their heads instead of ashes, the oil of rejoicing instead of mourning, a garment of praise instead of a spirit of grief and sorrow," &c.

lxi. 5, 6. Here, as on many other occasions, the literal promise to Israel involves the servitude of others, who are to be the shepherds, ploughmen, vine-dressers, tributaries, and dependents of Israel. We think the whole is metaphorical, and that it refers to services of another kind rendered to the Church. Anyhow, Christians have to do their share in the work of the world.

lxi. 8. Popular as is the rendering, "I hate robbery for burnt-offering," and true as is the sentiment, the translation is seriously controverted. It is not easy to explain here the critical argument, but there is no doubt that the Hebrew words may be translated, "I hate plunder in wickedness," i.e., wicked plunder. This explanation is now generally accepted by scholars. The next words, "and I will of heaven, and the particular care of the Divine providence. That city is truly great and honourable, it is strong, it is rich, it is safe, it is beautiful, it is the most desirable place that can be to live in, which is the city of the Lord, which he owns, in which he dwells, in which religion is uppermost. Such a one is Zion; it is the place which God hath chosen to put his name there; it is "the Zion of the Holy One of Israel," therefore we may be sure a holy city, else the Holy One of Israel would never be called the patron of it.

15 Whereas thou hast been forsaken and hated,
So that no man went through thee,
I will make thee an eternal excellency,
A joy of many generations.
16 Thou shalt also suck the milk of the Gentiles,
And shalt suck the breast of kings:
And thou shalt know that I the LORD am thy Saviour
And thy Redeemer, the mighty One of Jacob.
17 For brass I will bring gold,
And for iron I will bring silver,
And for wood brass,
And for stones iron:
I will also make thy officers peace,
And thine exactors righteousness.
18 Violence shall no more be heard in thy land,
Wasting nor destruction within thy borders;
But thou shalt call thy walls Salvation,
And thy gates Praise.
19 The sun shall be no more thy light by day;
Neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee:
But the LORD shall be unto thee an everlasting light,
And thy God thy glory.
20 Thy sun shall no more go down;
Neither shall thy moon withdraw itself:
For the LORD shall be thine everlasting light,
And the days of thy mourning shall be ended.
21 Thy people also shall be all righteous:
They shall inherit the land for ever,
The branch of my planting,
The work of my hands, that I may be glorified.
22 A little one shall become a thousand,
And a small one a strong nation:
I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

The happy and glorious state of the church is here farther foretold, referring principally and ultimately to the Christian church, and the spiritual peace of that; but under the type of that little gleam of outward peace which the Jews sometimes enjoyed after their return out of captivity. This is here spoken of,

First. As compared with what it had been. This made her peace and honour the more pleasant, that her condition had been much otherwise.

1. She had been despised, but now she should be honoured, ver. 15, 16. Jerusalem had been forsaken and hated, abandoned by her friends, abhorred by her enemies; no man went through that desolate city, but declined it as a rueful spectacle; it was an astonishment and a hissing. But now it shall be made an eternal excellency, being reformed from idolatry, and having recovered the tokens of God's favour, and it shall be the joy of good people for many generations. Yet, considering how short Jerusalem's excellency was, and how short it came of the vast compass of this promise, we must look for the full accomplishment of it in the perpetual excellences of the gospel church, far exceeding those of the Old Testament church, and the glorious privileges and advantages of the Christian religion, which are indeed the joy of many generations. Two things are here spoken of as her excellency and joy, in opposition to her having been forsaken and hated: 1st. She shall find herself countenanced by her neighbours. The nations and their kings that are brought to embrace Christianity shall lay themselves out for the good of the church, and maintain its interests, with the tenderness and affection that the nurse shews to the child at her breast, ver. 16, "Thou shalt suck the milk of the Gentiles," not suck their blood, that is, not the spirit of the Gospel; thou shalt "suck the breast of kings," which shall be to thee as nursing fathers. 2nd. She shall find herself countenanced by her God; "Thou shalt know that I the Lord am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer," shall know it by experience; for such a salvation, such a redemption shall be wrought out for thee, as plainly discovers itself to be the work of the Lord, the work of a mighty One, for it is a great salvation; of the Mighty One of Jacob, for it secures the welfare of all those that are Israelites indeed. They before knew the Lord to be their God; now they know him to be their Saviour, their Redeemer. Their Holy One now appears their Mighty One.

2. She had been impoverished, but now she shall be enriched, and every thing shall be changed for the better with her, ver. 17. When those who were raised out of the dust are set among princes, instead of brass money in their purses they have gold, and silver vessels in their houses instead of iron ones, and other improvements agreeable. So much shall the spiritual glory of the New Testament church exceed the external pomp and splendour of the Jewish economy, which had no glory in comparison with that which quite excels it, 2 Cor. iii. 10. When we had baptism in the room of circumcision, the Lord's supper in the room of the passover, and the gospel ministry in the room of a Levitical priesthood, we had gold instead of brass. Sin turned gold into brass, when Rehoboam made brazen shields, instead of the golden ones he had pawned; but God's favour, when that returns, will turn brass again into gold.

3. She had been oppressed by her own princes, which was sadly complained of, not only as her sin, but as her misery, ch. lix. 14; but now all the grievances of that kind shall be redressed, ver. 17. "I will make thine officers peace;" men of peace shall be made officers, and shall be indeed justices, not patrons of injustice, and justices of peace, not instruments of trouble and vexation. They shall be peace, that is, they shall sincerely seek thy welfare, and by their means thou shalt enjoy good. They shall be peace, for they shall be righteousness; and then the peace is as a river, when the righteousness is as the waves of the sea. Even exactors, whose business it is to demand the public tribute, though they be exact, must not be exacting, but must be just to the subject as well as to the prince; and, according to the instructions John Baptist gave to the publicans, must exact no more than is appointed them, Lu. iii. 13.

4. She had been insulted by her neighbours, invaded, spoiled, and plundered; but now it shall be so no more, ver. 18, "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land," neither the threats and triumphs of those that do violence, nor the outcries and complaints of those that suffer violence, shall again be heard, but every man shall peacefully enjoy his own. There shall be no wasting or destruction, either of persons or possessions, any where within thy borders; but thy walls shall be called salvation, they shall be safe and means of safety to thee, and thy gates shall be praise, praise to thee, every one shall commend thee for the good condition they are kept in, and praise to thy God, who strengthens the bars of thy gates, Ps. cxlvii. 13. When God's salvation is upon the walls, it is fit his praises should be in the gates, the places of concourse.

Secondly. As completed in what it shall be. It should seem that in the close of this chapter we are directed to look farther yet, as far forward as to the glory and happiness of heaven, under the type and figure of the flourishing state of the church on earth, which yet was never such as to come any thing near to what is here foretold; and divers of the images and expressions here made use of we find in the description of the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 23, and xxii. 5. As the prophets sometimes insensibly pass from the blessings of the Jewish church to the spiritual blessings of the Christian church, which are eternal, so sometimes they rise from the church militant to the church triumphant, where, and where only, all the promised peace, and joy, and honour, will be in perfection.

1. God shall be all in all in the happiness here promised; so he is always to true believers, ver. 19. The sun and moon shall be no more thy light, that is, God's people, when they enjoy his favour and walk in the light of his countenance, make little account of sun and moon and other the lights of this world, but could walk comfortably in the light of the Lord, though they should withdraw their shining. In heaven there shall be no occasion for sun or moon, for it is "the inheritance of the saints in light," such light as will swallow up the light of the sun as easily as the sun doth that of a candle. Idolaters worshipped the sun and moon, which some have thought the most ancient and plausible idolatry; but those "shall be no more thy light," shall no more be idolised. But the Lord shall be to thee a constant light, both day and night; in the night of adversity as well as in the day of prosperity. Those that make God their only light shall have him their all-sufficient light, their sun and shield; "Thy God, thy glory." Note, God is the glory of those whose God he is, and will be so to eternity. It is their glory that they have him for their God, and they glory in it; it is to them instead of beauty. God's people are, upon this account, an honourable people, that they have an interest in God as theirs in covenant.

2. The happiness here promised shall know no change, period, or allay; ver. 20, "Thy sun shall no more go down," but it shall be eternal day, eternal sunshine with thee. That shall not be thy sun which is sometimes eclipsed, often clouded; and, let it shine never so bright, never so warm, will certainly set, and leave thee in the dark, in the cold, in a few hours; but he shall be a sun, a fountain of light to thee, who is himself the Father of all lights, with whom there is no variableness nor shadow of turning, Jam. i. 17. We read of the sun's standing still once, and not hasting to go down for the space of a day, and it was a glorious day, never was the like. But what was that to the day that shall never have a night? Or, if it had, it should be a light night, for "neither shall thy moon withdraw itself;" it shall never wane, shall never change, but be always at the full. The comforts and joy that are in heaven, the glories provided for the soul, as the light of the sun, and those prepared for the glorified body too, as the light of the moon, shall never know the least cessation or interruption; how should they, when the Lord shall himself be thine everlasting light—a light which never wastes, nor can ever be extinguished? "And the days of thy mourning shall be ended," so as never to return; for all tears shall be wiped away, and the fountains of them, sin and affliction, dried up, so that "sorrow and sighing shall flee away" for ever.

3. Those that are entitled to this happiness, being duly prepared and qualified for it, shall never be put out of the possession of it, ver. 21. "Thy people" that shall inhabit this new Jerusalem "shall be all righteous," all justified by the righteousness of the Messiah, all sanctified by his Spirit; all that people, that Jerusalem, must be righteous, must have that "holiness without which no man shall see the Lord." They are all righteous; for we know that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God. There are no people on earth that are all righteous; there is a mixture of some bad in the best societies on this side heaven, but there are no mixtures there. They shall be all righteous, that is, they shall be entirely righteous; as there shall be none corrupt among them, so there shall be no corruption in them; the spirits of just men shall there be made perfect. And there shall be all the righteous together, that shall replenish the new Jerusalem; it is called "the congregation of the righteous," Ps. i. 5. And because they are "all righteous," therefore "they shall inherit the land for ever," for nothing but sin can turn them out of it. The perfection of the saints' holiness secures the perpetuity of their happiness.

4. The glory of the church shall redound to the honour of the church's God; They shall appear to be "the branch of my planting, the work of my hands," and I will own them as such. It was by the grace of God that they were designed to this happiness; they are the branch of his planting, or of his plantations. He broke them off from the wild olive, and grafted them into the good olive; transplanted them out of the field, when they were as tender branches, into his nursery; that, being now planted in his garden on earth, they might shortly be removed to his paradise in heaven. It was by his grace likewise, that they were prepared and fitted for this happiness; they are the work of his hands, Eph. ii. 10; are wrought to the self-same thing, 2 Cor. v. 5. It is a work of time, and, when it shall be finished, will appear a work of wonder; and God will be glorified, who begun it, and carried it on; for the Lord Jesus will then be admired in all them that believe. God will glorify himself in glorifying his chosen.

5. They will appear the more glorious, and God will be the more glorified in them, if we compare what they are with what they were; the happiness they are arrived to with the smallness of their beginnings; ver. 22, "A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation." The captives that returned out of Babylon strangely multiplied, and became a strong nation. The Christian church was a little one, a very small one at first; the number of the names was once but one hundred and twenty; yet it became a thousand.

direct their work in truth," also need emendation, the sense being, "I will give them their reward faithfully," or "I will give them their true reward;" i.e., the true reward of their works. It is rather a promise to the righteous than a menace to the wicked.

lxi. 10. The words "decketh himself with ornaments" in the original refer to the head-dress worn by a priest. Hence Barnes freely renders them, "as a bridegroom attires himself like a priest." A more exact rendering would perhaps be, "as a bridegroom puts on the turban of a priest." The word translated "jewels" really includes bridal ornaments generally, or the special attire worn by a bride, jewels and dress included.

lxii. 3. The "crown of glory," or rather "crown of beauty"—i.e., beautiful crown—might be worn on bridal and festive occasions, or by rulers and priests. (Esther viii. 15; Song of Solomon iii. 11; Isa. xxviii. 1; Zech. vi. 14.) The "royal diadem" seems to have been a kind of turban or tiara wound about the head.

The stone cut out of the mountain without hands swelled so as to fill the earth. The triumphant church, and every glorified saint, will be a thousand out of a little one, a strong nation out of a small one. The grace and peace of the saints was at first like a grain of mustard seed; but it increaseth and multiplieth, and makes a little one to become a thousand, the weak to be as David. When they come to heaven, and look back upon the smallness of their beginning, they will wonder how they got thither; and so wonderful is all this promise that it needed the ratification with which it is closed, "I the Lord will hasten it in his time." All that is here said relating to the Jewish and Christian church, to the militant and triumphant church, and to every particular believer. 1st. It may seem too difficult to be brought about, and therefore may be despaired of; but the God of almighty power hath undertaken it. I the Lord will do it, who can do it, and who have determined to do it. It will be done by him whose power is irresistible and his purposes unalterable. 2nd. It may seem to be delayed and put off so long that we are out of hopes of it; but, as the Lord will do it, so he will hasten it; will do it with all convenient speed. Though much time may be passed before it is done, no time shall be lost; he will hasten it in its time, in the proper time, in the season wherein it will be beautiful. He will do it in the time appointed by his wisdom, though not in the time prescribed by our folly. And this is really hastening it; for, though it seem to tarry, it doth not tarry, if it come in God's time; for we are sure that that is the best time, which he that believes will patiently wait for.

CHAPTER LXI.

In this chapter, I. We are sure to find the grace of Christ, published by himself to a lost world, in the everlasting Gospel, under the type and figure of Isaiah's prophecy, which was to foretell the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon, ver. 1—3. II. We think we find the glories of the church of Christ, its spiritual glories, described under the type and figure of the Jews' prosperity after their return out of their captivity. 1. It is promised that the decays of the church shall be repaired, ver. 4; 2. That those from without shall be made serviceable to the church, ver. 5; 3. That the church shall be a royal priesthood, maintained by the riches of the Gentiles, ver. 6; 4. That she shall have honour and joy, in lieu of all her shame and sorrow, ver. 7; 5. That her affairs shall prosper, ver. 8; 6. That posterity shall enjoy these blessings, ver. 9; 7. That righteousness and salvation shall be the eternal matter of the church's rejoicing and thanksgiving, ver. 10, 11. If the Jewish church was ever thus blessed, much more shall the Christian church be so, and all that belong to it.

THE Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me;
Because the LORD hath anointed me
To preach good tidings unto the meek;
He hath sent me to bind up the brokenhearted,
To proclaim liberty to the captives,
And the opening of the prison to them that are bound;
2 To proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD,
And the day of vengeance of our God;
To comfort all that mourn;
3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion,
To give unto them beauty for ashes,
The oil of joy for mourning,
The garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness;
That they might be called trees of righteousness,
The planting of the LORD, that he might be glorified.

He that is the best expositor of Scripture has, no doubt, given us the best exposition of these verses, even our Lord Jesus himself, who read this in the synagogue at Nazareth, (perhaps it was the lesson for the day,) and applied it entirely to himself, saying, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears," Lu. iv. 17, 18, 21. And the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth in opening of this text were admired by all that heard them. As Isaiah was authorized and directed to proclaim liberty to the Jews in Babylon, so was Christ God's messenger, to publish a more joyful jubilee to a lost world. And here we are told,

First. How he was fitted and qualified for this work. "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me," ver. 1. The prophets had the Spirit of God moving them at times, both instructing them what to say and exciting them to say it; but Christ had the Spirit always resting on him without measure; but to the same intent that the prophets had, as a spirit of counsel and a spirit of courage, ch. xi. 1—3. When he entered upon the execution of his prophetical office, the Spirit, as a dove, descended upon him, Mat. iii. 16. This Spirit which was upon him he communicated to those whom he sent to proclaim the same glad tidings, saying to them, when he gave them their commission, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," thereby ratifying it.

Secondly. How he was appointed and ordained to it. The Spirit of God is upon me, because the Lord God has anointed me. What service God called him to he furnished him for; therefore gave him his Spirit, because he had, by a solemn and sacred unction, set him apart to this great office, as kings and priests were of old destined to their offices by anointing. Hence the Redeemer was called the Messiah, the Christ, because he was anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows. "He hath sent me." Our Lord Jesus did not go unsent, he had a commission from him that is the fountain of power; the Father sent him, and gave him commandment. This is a great satisfaction to us, that whatever Christ said he had a warrant from heaven for. His doctrine was not his, but his that sent him.

Thirdly. What the work was to which he was appointed and ordained.

1. He was to be a preacher, was to execute the office of a prophet. So well pleased was he with the good will God shewed towards men through him, that he would himself be the preacher of it; that an honour might thereby be put upon the ministry of the Gospel, and the faith of the saints might be confirmed and encouraged. He must "preach good tidings" (so Gospel signifies) "to the meek," to the penitent, and humble, and poor in spirit; to them the tidings of a Redeemer will be indeed good tidings, pure Gospel, faithful sayings, and worthy of all acceptation. The poor are commonly best disposed to receive the Gospel, Jas. ii. 5; and then it is likely to profit us when it is received with meekness, as it ought to be. To such Christ preached good tidings, when he said, "Blessed are the meek."

2. He was to be a healer; was sent "to bind up the broken-hearted;" as pained limbs are rolled to give them ease as broken bones and bleeding wounds are bound up, that they may knit and close again. Those whose hearts are broken for sin, that are truly humbled under the sense of guilt, and dread of wrath, are furnished in the Gospel of Christ with that which will make them easy, and silence their fears. Those only who have experienced the pains of a penitential contrition may expect the pleasure of Divine cordials and consolations.

3. He was to be a deliverer. He was sent as a prophet to preach, as a priest to heal, and as a king to issue out proclamations; and those of two kinds: 1st. Proclamations of peace to his friends. He shall "proclaim liberty to the captives," (as Cyrus did to the Jews in captivity,) "and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." Whereas by the guilt of sin we are bound over to the justice of God, are his lawful captives, sold for sin till payment be made of that great debt, Christ lets us know that he has made satisfaction to Divine justice for that debt, that his satisfaction is accepted; and if we will plead that, and depend upon it, and make over ourselves and all we have to him, in a grateful sense of the kindness he hath done us, we may by faith sue out our pardon, and take the comfort of it; there is, and shall be no condemnation to us. And whereas by the dominion of sin in us we are bound under the power of Satan, sold under sin, Christ lets us know that he hath conquered Satan; hath destroyed him that had the power of death, and his works, and provided for us grace sufficient, to enable us to shake off the yoke of sin, and to loose ourselves from those bands of our neck. The Son is ready by his Spirit to make us free, and then shall we be free indeed; not only discharged from the miseries of captivity, but advanced to all the immunities and dignities of citizens. This is the Gospel proclamation, and it is like the blowing of the jubilee trumpet, which proclaimed the great year of release, Lev. xxv. 9, 40; in allusion to which it is here called "the acceptable year of the Lord," the time of our acceptance with God, which is the original of our liberties. Or, it is called the year of the Lord, because it publisheth his free grace to his own glory; and an acceptable year, because it brings glad tidings to us, and what cannot but be very acceptable to those who know the capacities and necessities of their own souls. 2nd. Proclamations of war against his enemies. Christ proclaims "the day of vengeance of our God;" the vengeance he takes, First. On sin and Satan, death and hell, and all the powers of darkness, that were to be destroyed, in order to our deliverance. These Christ triumphed over in his cross, having spoiled and weakened them, shamed them, and made a show of them openly, and therein took vengeance on them for all the injury they had done, both to God and man, Col. ii. 15. Secondly. On those of the children of men that stand it out against those fair offers. They shall not only be left as they deserve in their captivity, but be dealt with as enemies. We have the Gospel summed up, Mar. xvi. 16, where that part of it, "He that believeth shall be saved," proclaims "the acceptable year of the Lord," to those that will accept of it; but the other part, "He that believes not shall be damned," proclaims "the day of vengeance of our God," that vengeance which he will take of those that "obey not the Gospel of Jesus Christ," 2 Thes. i. 8.

4. He was to be a comforter; and so he is a preacher, healer, and deliverer. He is sent "to comfort all that mourn," and, mourning, seek to him, and not to the world for comfort. Christ not only provides comfort for them, and proclaims it, but he applies it to them; he doth by his Spirit comfort them. There is enough in him to comfort all that mourn, whatever their sore or sorrow is; but this comfort is sure to them that mourn in Zion, that is, that sorrow after a godly sort, according to God, for his residence is in Zion; that mourn because of Zion's calamities and desolations, and mingle their tears by a holy sympathy with those of all God's suffering people, though they themselves are not in trouble; such tears God has a bottle for, Ps. lvi. 8, such mourners he has comfort in store for. As blessings out of Zion are spiritual blessings, so mourners in Zion are holy mourners; such as carry their sorrows to the throne of grace, (for in Zion was the mercy-seat,) and pour them out, as Hannah did, before the Lord. To such as these Christ hath appointed by his Gospel, and will give by his Spirit, ver. 3, those consolations which will not only support them under their sorrows, but turn them into songs of praise. He will give them, 1st. "Beauty for ashes;" whereas they lay in ashes, as was usual in times of great mourning, they shall not only be raised out of their dust, but made to look pleasant. Note, The holy cheerfulness of Christians is their beauty, and a great ornament to their profession. Here is an elegant paronomasia in the original, he will give them pheer,—'beauty,' for epher,—'ashes;' he will turn their sorrow into joy as quickly and as easily as you can transpose a letter, for he speaks and it is done. 2nd. The "oil of joy," which makes the face to shine, instead of mourning, which disfigures the countenance, and makes it unlovely. This oil of joy the saints have from that oil of gladness with which Christ himself was anointed above his fellows, Heb. i. 9. 3rd. "The garments of praise," such beautiful garments as were worn on thanksgiving days, instead of the spirit of heaviness, dimness, or contraction; open joys for secret mournings; the spirit of heaviness they keep to themselves. Zion's mourners weep in secret; but the joy they are recompensed with, they are clothed with, as with a garment, in the eye of others. Observe, Where God gives the oil of joy, he gives the garment of praise. Those comforts which come from God dispose the heart to, and enlarge the heart in, thanksgivings to God. Whatever we have the joy of, God must have the praise and glory of.

5. He was to be a planter; for the church is God's husbandry. Therefore he will do all this for his people, will cure their wounds, release them out of bondage, and comfort them in their sorrows, "that they may be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord;" that they might be so, and be acknowledged to be so; that they may be ornaments to God's vineyard, and may be fruitful in the fruits of righteousness, as the branches of God's planting, ch. lx. 21. All that Christ doth for us is to make us God's people, and some way serviceable to him, as living trees, planted in the house of the Lord, and flourishing in the courts of our God. And all this "that he may be glorified;" that is, that we may be brought to glorify him by a sincere devotion, and an exemplary conversation; for "herein is our Father glorified, that we bring forth much fruit;" and that others also may take occasion from God's favour shining on his people, and his grace shining in them, to praise him; and that he might be for ever glorified in his saints.

4 And they shall build the old wastes,
They shall raise up the former desolations,
And they shall repair the waste cities,
The desolations of many generations.
5 And strangers shall stand and feed your flocks,
And the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.
6 But ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD.
Men shall call you the Ministers of our God:

lxii. 4. As the margin explains, the word Hephzibah means "my delight is in her," and Beulah signifies "married." The words for "Forsaken" and "Desolate" are Azubah and Shemamah, and they also might have been left untranslated, if properly explained in the margin.

lxii. 5. The rendering "so shall thy sons marry thee" has been objected to, and Lowth translates "so shall thy restorer wed thee," in which he has found followers. No such change is, however, needed, as will be seen if we render "so shall thy children be wedded to thee." The marriage idea here is that of taking one under protection and direction. From the etymology of the Hebrew words for husband and marriage we may gather, as we may from the well-known customs and opinions of the East, that a Jewish husband stood in the relation of lord and master to his wife, children, domestics, and property, but with corresponding duties of support, &c.

lxii. 6. Several variations of the English version of the words

Ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles,
And in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.
7 For your shame ye shall have double;
And for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion:
Therefore in their land they shall possess the double:
Everlasting joy shall be unto them.
8 For I the LORD love judgment,
I hate robbery for burnt offering;
And I will direct their work in truth,
And I will make an everlasting covenant with them.
9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles,
And their offspring among the people;
All that see them shall acknowledge them,
That they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.

Promises are here made to the Jews now returned out of captivity, and settled again in their own land, which are to be extended to the gospel church, and all believers, who through grace are delivered out of spiritual thraldom; for they are capable of being spiritually applied.

First. It is promised that their houses shall be rebuilt, ver. 4; that their cities should be raised out of the ruins in which they had long lain, and should be fitted up for their use again. "They shall build the old wastes;" that is, the old wastes shall be built, the waste cities shall be repaired, the former desolations, even "the desolations of many generations," which it was feared would never be repaired, shall be raised up. The setting up of Christianity in the world repaired the decays of natural religion, and raised up those desolations both of piety and honesty which had been for many generations the reproach of mankind. An unsanctified soul is like a city that is broken down, and has no walls, like a house in ruins; but by the power of Christ's Gospel and grace it is repaired, it is put in order again, and fitted to be a habitation of God through the Spirit. And they shall do this, they that are released out of captivity; for we are brought out of the house of bondage, that we may serve God both in building up ourselves to his glory and helping to build up his church on earth.

Secondly. They that were so lately servants themselves, working for their oppressors, and lying at their mercy, shall now have servants to do their work for them, and be at their command; not of their brethren, they are all the Lord's freemen, but of the strangers, and the sons of the alien, who shall keep their sheep, till their ground, and dress their gardens, the ancient employments of Abel, Cain, and Adam. "Strangers shall feed your flocks," ver. 5. When by the grace of God we attain to a holy indifferency as to all the affairs of this world, buying as though we possessed not, when, though our hands are employed about them, our hearts are not entangled with them, but reserved entire for God and his service, then the sons of the alien are our ploughmen and vinedressers.

Thirdly. They shall not only be released out of their captivity, but highly preferred, and honourably employed, ver. 6. While the strangers are keeping your flocks, you shall be keeping the charge of the sanctuary; instead of being slaves to your taskmasters, "you shall be named the priests of the Lord," a high and holy calling. Priests were princes' peers, and in Hebrew were called by the same name. You shall be the ministers of our God, as the Levites were. Note, Those whom God sets at liberty he sets to work. He delivers them out of the hands of their enemies that they may serve him, Lu. i. 74, 75; Ps. cxvi. 16. But his service is perfect freedom; nay, it is the greatest honour. When God brought Israel out of Egypt, he took them to be to him a kingdom of priests, Ex. xix. 5. And the gospel church is a royal priesthood, 1 Pet. ii. 9. All believers are made to our God kings and priests; and they ought to carry themselves so in their devotions, and in their whole conversation, with Holiness to the Lord written upon their foreheads, that men may call them the priests of the Lord.

Fourthly. The wealth and honour of the Gentile converts shall redound to the benefit and credit of the church, ver. 6. The Gentiles shall be brought into the church, those that were strangers shall become fellow-citizens with the saints; and with themselves they shall bring all they have, to be devoted to the glory of God, and used in his service; and the priests, the Lord's ministers, shall have the advantage of it. It will be a great strengthening and quickening, as well as a comfort and encouragement, to all good Christians, to see the Gentiles serving the interests of God's kingdom. 1. They "shall eat the riches of the Gentiles;" not which they have themselves seized by violence, but which is fairly and honourably presented to them, as gifts brought to the altar, which the priests and their families lived comfortably upon. It is not said, Ye shall hoard the riches of the Gentiles, and treasure it, but eat it; for there is nothing better in riches than to use them, and to do good with them. 2. They shall boast themselves in their glory. Whatever was the honour of the Gentile converts before their conversion, their nobility, estates, learning, virtue, or places of trust and power, it shall all turn to the reputation of the church to which they have joined themselves; and whatever is their glory after their conversion, their holy zeal, and strictness of conversation, their usefulness, their patient suffering, and all the instances of that blessed change which Divine grace hath made in them, shall be very much for the glory of God, and therefore all good men shall glory in it.

Fifthly. They shall have abundance of comfort and satisfaction in their own bosoms, ver. 7. The Jews no doubt had so, after their return. They were in a new world, and now knew how to value liberty and property, the pleasures of which were continually fresh and blooming. And much more do all those rejoice whom Christ hath brought into the glorious liberty of God's children, especially when the privileges of their adoption shall be completed in the resurrection of the body. 1. "They shall rejoice in their portion." They shall not only have their own again, but (which is a farther gift of God) they shall have the comfort of it, and a heart to rejoice in it, Eccl. iii. 13. Though the houses of the returned Jews, as well as their temple, be much inferior to what they were before the captivity, yet they shall be well pleased with them, and thankful for them. It is a portion in their land; their own land, the holy land, Immanuel's land; and therefore they shall rejoice in it, having so lately known what it was to be strangers in a strange land. They that have God and heaven for their portion have reason to say they have a worthy portion, and to rejoice in it. 2. "Everlasting joy shall be unto them;" that is, a joyful state of their people, which shall last long, much longer than the captivity had lasted. Yet that joy of the Jewish nation was so much alloyed, so often interrupted, and so soon brought to an end, that we must look for the accomplishment of this promise in the spiritual joy which believers have in God, and the eternal joy they hope for in heaven. 3. This shall be a double recompence to them, and more than double, for all the reproach and vexation they have lain under in the land of their captivity; For your shame you shall have double honour, and in your land you shall possess double wealth to what you lost; the blessing of God upon it, and the comfort you shall have in it, shall make it an abundant reparation for all the damages you have received. You shall not only be owned as God's sons, but as his firstborn, Ex. iv. 22, and therefore entitled to a double portion. As the miseries of their captivity were so great, that in them they are said to have received double for all their sins, ch. xl. 2, so the joys of their return shall be so great, that in them they shall receive double for all their shame. The former is applicable to the fulness of Christ's satisfaction, in which God received double for all our sins; the latter to the fulness of heaven's joys, in which we shall receive more than double for all our services and sufferings. Job's case illustrates this; when God turned again his captivity, he gave him twice as much as he had before.

Sixthly. God will be their faithful guide, and a God in covenant with them; ver. 8, "I will direct their work in truth." God, by his providence, will order their affairs for the best, according to the word of his truth. He will guide them in the ways of true prosperity, by the rules of true policy; he will by his grace direct the works of good people in the right way, the true way, that leads to happiness; he will direct them to be done in sincerity, and then they are pleasing to him. God desires truth in the inward part; and if we do our works in truth he will make an everlasting covenant with us; for to those that walk before him, and are upright, he will certainly be a God all-sufficient. Now, as a reason both for this and of the foregoing promise, that God will recompense to them double for their shame, those words come in in the former part of the verse, "I the Lord love judgment." He loves that judgment should be done among men, both between magistrates and subjects, and between neighbour and neighbour, and therefore he hates all injustice. And when wrongs are done to his people, by their oppressors and persecutors, he is displeased with them, not only because they are done to his people, but because they are wrongs, and against the eternal rules of equity. But if men do not do justice, he loves to do judgment himself, in righting them that suffer wrong, and punishing them that do it. God pleads his people's injured cause, not only because he is jealous for them, but because he is jealous for justice. To illustrate this it is added, that he hates robbery for burnt offerings. He hates injustice even in his own people, that honour him with what they have in their burnt offerings; much more doth he hate it when it is against his own people. If he hates robbery when it is for burnt offerings to himself, much more when it is for burnt offerings to idols, and when not only his people are robbed of their estates, but he is robbed of his offerings. It is a truth much to the honour of God, that ritual services will never atone for the violation of moral precepts, nor will it justify any man's robbery to say, it was for burnt offerings, or Corban, it is a gift. "Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice;" to do justly and love mercy better than thousands of rams; nay, that robbery is most hateful to God of all other which is covered with this pretence, for it makes the righteous God to be the patron of unrighteousness. Some make this a reason of the rejection of the Jews upon the bringing in of the Gentiles, ver. 6; because they were so corrupt in their morals, and while they tithed mint and cummin made nothing of judgment and mercy, Mat. xxiii. 23, whereas God loves judgment, and insists upon that; and he hates both robbery for burnt offerings and burnt offerings for robbery too, as that of the Pharisees, who made long prayers, that they might the more plausibly devour widows' houses. Others read these words thus, 'I hate rapine by iniquity,' that is, the spoil which the enemies of God's people had unjustly made of them; this God hated, and therefore would reckon with them for it.

Seventhly. God will entail a blessing upon their posterity after them, ver. 9. Their seed, that is, the children of these persons themselves, that are now the blessed of the Lord, or their successors in profession, the church's seed, shall be "accounted to the Lord for a generation," Ps. xxii. 30. 1. They shall signalize themselves, and make their neighbours to take notice of them. They "shall be known among the Gentiles;" shall distinguish themselves by the gravity, seriousness, humility, and cheerfulness of their conversation, especially by that brotherly love by which all men shall know them to be Christ's disciples; and, they thus distinguishing themselves, God shall dignify them by making them the blessings of their age, and instruments of his glory; and by giving them remarkable tokens of his favour, which shall make them eminent, and gain them respect from all about them. Let the children of godly parents love in such a manner as that they may be known to be so, that all who observe them may see in them the fruits of a good education, and an answer to the prayers that were put up for them; and then they may expect that God will make them known, by the fulfilling of that promise to them, that the generation of the upright shall be blessed. 2. God shall have the glory of this, for every one shall attribute it to the blessing of God. All that see them shall see so much of the grace of God in them, and his favour towards them, that they shall acknowledge them to be the seed which the Lord hath blessed, and doth bless, for it includes both. See what it is to be blessed of God. Whatever good appears in any, it must be taken notice of as the fruit of God's blessing and he must be glorified in it.

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD,
My soul shall be joyful in my God;
For he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation,
He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness,
As a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments,
And as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels
11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud,
And as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth;
So the Lord GOD will cause righteousness and praise
To spring forth before all the nations.

Some make this the song of joy and praise to be sung by the prophet in the name of Jerusalem, congratulating the happy change of her circumstances in the accomplishment of the foregoing promises. Others make it to be spoken by Christ, in the name of the New Testament church, triumphing in gospel grace. We may take in both, the former a type of the latter. We are here taught to rejoice with holy joy, to God's honour,

First. In the beginning of this good work, the clothing of the church with righteousness and salvation, ver. 10. Upon this account, "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord." Those that rejoice in God have cause to rejoice greatly; and we need not fear running into an extreme in the greatness of our joy, when we rendered "ye that make mention of the Lord" have been proposed. Hence the margin, "ye that are the Lord's remembrancers;" Barnes, "ye who preserve the memory of Jehovah;" others, "ye that praise the Lord." The last comes, perhaps, nearest the true idea; but we should prefer "ye that commemorate the Lord," as still more exact. At the same time, the following verse seems to imply that this commemoration took the form of praise and also of supplication.

lxii. 10. The exhortation to prepare a highway is followed by another to remove from it the loose stones which might impede progress.

lxii. 11. The word "salvation" here means a saviour, and so some translate it, but no alteration is required, as the sense is evident.

lxii. 12. The Hebrew term derushah, rendered "sought out," is explained by Gesenius to mean here frequented, or celebrated.

lxiii. 1. Edom is Idumæa, and Bozrah a city, at one time chief city make God the gladness of our joy. The first gospel song begins like this, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour," Lu. i. 46, 47. There is just matter for this joy, and all the reason in the world it should terminate in God; for salvation and righteousness are wrought out and brought in, and the church is clothed with it. The salvation God wrought for the Jews, and that righteousness of his in which he appeared for them, and that reformation which appeared among them, made them look as glorious in the eyes of all wise men as if they had been clothed in robes of state, or nuptial garments. Christ hath clothed his church with an eternal salvation, and that is truly great, by clothing it with the righteousness both of justification and sanctification. The clean linen is the righteousness of saints, Rev. xix. 8. Observe how these two are put together. Those, and those only, shall be clothed with the garments of salvation hereafter that are covered with the robe of righteousness now. And those garments are rich and splendid clothing, like the priestly garments, (for so the word signifies,) with which the bridegroom decks himself; the brightness of the sun itself is compared to them, Ps. xix. 5. He is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber completely dressed. Such is the beauty of God's grace in those that are clothed with the robe of righteousness, that by the righteousness of Christ are recommended to God's favour, and by the sanctification of the Spirit have God's image renewed upon them. They are decked as a bride to be espoused to God, and taken into covenant with him; they are decked as a priest to be employed for God, and taken into communion with him.

Secondly. In the progress and continuance of this good work, ver. 11. It is not like a day of triumph, which is glorious for the present, but is soon over; no, the righteousness and salvation with which the church is clothed are durable clothing; so they are said to be, ch. xxiii. 18. The church, when she is pleasing herself with the righteousness and salvation that Jesus Christ has clothed her with, rejoiceth to think that these inestimable blessings shall both spring for future ages and spread to distant regions. 1. They shall spring forth for ages to come, as the fruits of the earth, which are produced every year from generation to generation; as the earth, even that which lies common, brings forth her bud, the tender grass at the return of the year, and as the garden enclosed causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth in their season, so duly, so constantly, so powerfully, and with such advantage to mankind, "will the Lord God cause righteousness and praise to spring forth," by virtue of the covenant of grace, as that by virtue of the covenant of providence. See what the promised blessings are, righteousness and praise; for they that are clothed with righteousness shew forth the praises of him that clothed them. These shall spring forth under the influence of the dew of Divine grace. Though it may sometimes be winter with the church, when those blessings seem to wither, and do not appear, yet the root of them is fixed. A spring-time will come when, through the reviving beams of the approaching Sun of righteousness, they shall flourish again. 2. They shall spread far, and spring forth before all the nations; the great salvation shall be published and proclaimed to all the world, and the ends of the earth shall see it.

CHAPTER LXII.

The business of prophets was both to preach and pray. In this chapter, I. The prophet determines to apply himself closely and constantly to this business, ver. 1. II. God appoints him, and others of his prophets, to continue to do so, for the encouragement of his people during the delays of their deliverance, ver. 6, 7. III. The promises are here repeated and ratified of the great things God would do for his church; for the Jews after their return out of captivity, and for the Christian church when it shall be set up in the world. 1. The church shall be made honourable in the eyes of the world, ver. 2; 2. It shall appear to be very dear to God, precious and honourable in his sight, ver. 3—5; 3. It shall enjoy great plenty, ver. 8, 9; 4. It shall be released out of captivity, and grow up again into a considerable nation, particularly owned and favoured by heaven, ver. 10—12.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace,
And for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest,
Until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness,
And the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.
2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness,
And all kings thy glory:
And thou shalt be called by a new name,
Which the mouth of the LORD shall name. [LORD,
3 Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the
And a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.
4 Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken;
Neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate:
But thou shalt be called Hephzi-bah,
And thy land Beulah: [married.
For the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be 5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin,
So shall thy sons marry thee:
And as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride,
So shall thy God rejoice over thee.

The prophet here tells us,

First. What he will do for the church. A prophet, as he is a seer so he is a spokesman. This prophet here resolves to perform that office faithfully, ver. 1. He will not hold his peace, he will not rest; he will mind his business, will take pains, and never desire to take his ease; and herein he was a type of Christ, who was indefatigable in executing the office of a prophet, and made it his meat and drink till he had finished his work. Observe here, 1. What the prophet's resolution is: He will not hold his peace, he will continue instant in preaching; will not only faithfully deliver, but frequently repeat, the messages he hath received from the Lord. If people receive not the precepts and promises at first, he will inculcate them, and give them line upon line; and he will continue instant in prayer; he will never hold his peace at the throne of grace till he has prevailed with God for the mercies promised. He will give himself to prayer, and to the ministry of the word, as Christ's ministers must, Acts vi. 4, must labour frequently in both, and never be weary of this well-doing. The business of ministers is to speak from God to his people, and to God for his people; and in neither of these must they be silent. 2. What is the principle of this resolution: For Zion's sake, and for Jerusalem's; not for the sake of any private interest of his own, but for the church's sake, because he has an affection and concern for Zion, and it lies near his heart. Whatever becomes of his own house and family, he desires to see the good of Jerusalem, and resolves to seek it all the days of his life, Ps. cxxii. 8, 9; cxxviii. 5. It is God's Zion, and his Jerusalem, and it is therefore dear to him, because it is so to God, and because God's glory is interested in its prosperity. 3. How long he resolves to continue this importunity: Till the promise of the church's righteousness and salvation, which was in the foregoing chapter, be accomplished. Isaiah will not himself live to see the release of the captives out of Babylon, much less the bringing in of the Gospel, in which grace reigns through righteousness unto life and salvation; yet he will not hold his peace till these be accomplished, even the utmost of them, because his prophecies will continue speaking of these things; and there shall, in every age, be a remnant that shall continue to pray for them, as successors to him, till the promises be performed, and so the prayers answered that were grounded upon them. Then the church's righteousness and salvation will go forth as brightness, and as a lamp that burneth, so plainly that it will carry its own evidence along with it. It will bring honour and comfort to the church, which will hereupon both look pleasant and appear illustrious; and it will bring instruction and direction to the world, a light not only to the eyes, but to the feet, and to the paths of those who before sat in darkness, and in the shadow of death.

Secondly. What God will do for the church. The prophet can but pray and preach, but God will confirm the word, and answer the prayers.

1. The church shall be greatly admired. When that righteousness which is her salvation, her praise, and her glory, shall be brought forth, the Gentiles shall see it. The tidings of it shall be carried to the Gentiles, and a tender of it made them. They may so see this righteousness as to share in it, if it be not their own fault. Even kings shall see, and be in love with the glory of thy righteousness, ver. 2; shall overlook the glory of their own courts and kingdoms, and look at, and look after, the spiritual glory of the church, as that which excelleth.

2. She shall be truly admirable. Great names make men considerable in the world, and great respects are paid them thereupon. Now it is agreed, that honor est in honorante,—'the honour is to be valued or not, according as the person is that doth the honour.' God is the fountain of honour, and from him the church's honour comes. "Thou shalt be called by a new name," a pleasant name, such as thou wast never called by before; no, not in the day of thy greatest prosperity, and the reverse of that which thou wast called by in the day of thine affliction; thou shalt have a new character, be advanced to a new dignity, and those about thee shall have new thoughts of thee. This seems to be alluded to in that promise, Rev. ii. 17, of the "white stone, and in the stone a new name," and that, Rev. iii. 12, of "the name of the city of my God, and my new name." It is a name "which the mouth of the Lord shall name," who we are sure miscalls nothing, and who will oblige others to call her by the name he hath given her; for his judgment is according to truth, and all shall concur with it sooner or later. Two names God shall give her:

1st. He shall call her his crown; ver. 3, "Thou shalt be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord;" not on his head, as adding any real honour or power to him, as crowns do to those that are crowned with them, but in his hand. He is pleased to account them, and shew them forth, as a glory and beauty to him. When he took them to be his people, it was that they might be unto him "for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory," Jer. xiii. 11. "Thou shalt be a crown of glory, and a royal diadem," through the hand, the good hand, of thy God upon thee; he shall make thee so, for he shall be to thee a crown of glory, ch. xxviii. 5. Thou shalt be so in his hand, that is, under his protection. He that shall put glory upon thee shall create a defence upon all that glory, so that the flowers of thy crown shall never be withered, nor its jewels lost.

2nd. He shall call her his spouse, ver. 4, 5. This is a yet greater honour, especially considering what a forlorn condition she had been in. First. Her case had been very melancholy. She was called forsaken, and her land desolate during the captivity, like a woman reproachfully divorced, or left a disconsolate widow. Such was the state of religion in the world before the preaching of the Gospel; it was in a manner forsaken, and desolate; a thing that no man looked after, or had any real concern for. Secondly. It should now be very pleasant; for God would return in mercy to her. Instead of those two names of reproach, she shall be called by two honourable names. 1*st.* She shall be called Hephzibah, which signifies, 'my delight is in her;' it was the name of Hezekiah's queen, that was Manasseh's mother, 2 Kin. xxi. 1; a proper name for a wife, who ought to be her husband's delight, Pr. v. 19. And here it is the church's Maker that is her husband; "the Lord delighteth in thee." God, by his grace, hath wrought that in his church which makes her his delight, she being refined and reformed, and brought home to him; and then by his providence he doth that for her which makes it appear that she is his delight, and that he delights to do her good. 2*nd.* She shall be called Beulah, which signifies, 'married;' whereas she had been desolate, a condition opposed to that of the married wife, ch. liv. 1. "Thy land shall be married," that is, it shall become fruitful again, and be replenished. Though she has long been barren, she shall again be peopled; shall again be made to keep house, and to be "a joyful mother of children," Ps. cxiii. 9. She shall be married; for, (1.) Her sons shall heartily espouse the land of their nativity, and the interests of it, which they had for a long time neglected, as despairing ever to have any comfortable enjoyment of it. Thy sons shall marry thee, that is, they shall live with thee, and take delight in thee. When they were in Babylon, they seemed to have espoused that land, for they were appointed to settle, and to seek the peace of it, Jer. xxix. 5—7; but now they shall again marry their own land, "as a young man marrieth a virgin" that he takes great delight in, is extremely fond of, and is likely to have many children by. It bodes well to a land when its own natives and inhabitants are pleased with it, prefer it before other lands; when its princes marry their country, and resolve to take their lot with it. (2.) Which is much better: her God shall betroth her to himself in righteousness, Hos. ii. 19, 20. He will take pleasure in his church; "As the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride," is pleased with his relation to her, and her affection to him, "so shall thy God rejoice over thee," shall rest in his love to thee, Zeph. iii. 17; shall take pleasure in thee, Ps. cxlvii. 10; and shall delight to do thee good with his whole heart, and his whole soul, Jer. xxxii. 41. This is very applicable to the love Christ has for his church, and the complacency he takes in it, which appears so bright in Solomon's Song, and which will be complete in heaven.

6 I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem,
Which shall never hold their peace day nor night:
Ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,
7 And give him no rest, [the earth.
Till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in

of Edom.—It was called Bostra by the Greeks, and is now a village with ruins. The word for "travelling" is variously explained. Fürst understands it to mean "prostrating" others; Gesenius applies it to throwing back the head in pride. Others suppose it means to remove; but whether to remove men or to remove one's self is not agreed. Perhaps the word "bowing" conveys the idea, but leaves it uncertain whether he that comes from Edom bows others or bows himself. This ambiguity seems to be inherent in the word.

lxiii. 2, 3. The custom of treading grapes in a vat or other receptacle is one which is still followed in some parts of Syria and elsewhere. In verse 3 for "people" read "nations," and instead of "for I will," &c., render literally, "and I trod in my anger, and trampled them in my wrath, and their blood (literally, juice) sprinkled my garments, and I stained all my raiment." The language is historical in form, and should be so translated, although spoken by anticipation as a portion of a prophecy or prophetic vision.

8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength,
Surely I will no more give thy corn
To be meat for thine enemies;
And the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine,
For the which thou hast laboured:
9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it,
And praise the LORD;
And they that have brought it together shall drink it
In the courts of my holiness.

Two things are here promised to Jerusalem:

First. Plenty of the means of grace; abundance of good preaching and good praying, ver. 6, 7. And this shews the method God takes when he designs mercy for a people; he first brings them to their duty, and pours out a spirit of prayer upon them, and then brings salvation to them. Provision is here made,

1. That ministers may do their duty as watchmen. It is here spoken of as a token for good, as a step towards farther mercy, and an earnest of it, that, in order to what he designed for them, he would set watchmen on their walls, that should never hold their peace. Note, 1st. Ministers are watchmen on the church's walls; for it is as a city besieged, whose concern it is to have sentinels on the walls, to take notice, and give notice, of the motions of the enemy. It is necessary that, as watchmen, they be wakeful and faithful, and willing to endure hardness. 2nd. They are concerned to stand upon their guard day and night. They must never be off their watch as long as those for whose souls they watch are not out of danger. 3rd. They must never hold their peace; they must take all opportunities to give warning to sinners, in season, out of season; and must never betray the cause of Christ by a treacherous or cowardly silence. They must never hold their peace at the throne of grace; must pray and not faint; as Moses lifted up his hands, and kept them steady, till Israel had got the victory over Amalek, Ex. xvii. 10, 11.

2. That people may do their duty, as those that make mention of the Lord. Let not them keep silence neither, let not them think it enough that their watchmen pray for them, but let them pray for themselves; and all little enough to meet the approaching mercy with due solemnity. Note, 1st. It is the character of God's professing people that they make mention of the Lord, and continue to do so even in bad times, when the land is termed forsaken and desolate. They 'are the Lord's remembrancers,' so the margin reads it; they remember the Lord themselves, and put one another in mind of him. 2nd. God's professing people must be a praying people, must be public-spirited in prayer, and must wrestle with God in prayer, and continue to do so. "Keep not silence," never grow remiss in the duty, or weary of it: "Give him no rest;" alluding to an importunate beggar, to the widow that with her continual coming wearied the judge into a compliance. God said to Moses, "Let me alone," Ex. xxxii. 10; and Jacob to Christ, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me," Gen. xxxii. 26. 3rd. God is so far from being displeased with our pressing importunity, as men commonly are, that he invites and encourageth it. He bids us to cry after him, not as the disciples that were uneasy at it, Mat. xv. 23. He bids us make pressing instances at the throne of grace, and give him no rest, Lu. xi. 5, 6. He suffers himself not only to be reasoned with, but to be wrestled with. 4th. The public welfare and prosperity of God's Jerusalem is that which we should be most importunate for at the throne of grace. Pray for the good of the church, First. That it may be safe, that he would establish it; that the interests of the church may be firm, may be settled for the present, and secured to posterity. Secondly. That it may be great, may be a praise in the earth; that it may be praised, and God may be praised for it. When gospel truths are cleared and vindicated, when gospel ordinances are duly administered in their purity and power, when the church becomes eminent for holiness and love, then Jerusalem is a praise in the earth, then it is in reputation. 5th. We must persevere in our prayers for mercy to the church till the mercy comes; must do as the prophet's servant did, go yet seven times, till the promising cloud appears, 1 Kin. xviii. 47. 6th. It is a good sign that God is coming towards a people in ways of mercy when he pours out a spirit of prayer upon them, and stirs them up to be fervent and constant in their intercessions.

Secondly. Plenty of all other good things, ver. 8. This follows upon the former; when the people praise God, when all the people praise him, "then shall the earth yield her increase," Ps. lxvii. 5, 6, and outward prosperity crowning its piety shall help to make Jerusalem a praise in the earth. Observe here,

1. The great distress they had been in, and the losses they had sustained. Their corn had been meat for their enemies, which they hoped should have been meat for themselves and their families. Here was a double grievance, that they themselves wanted that which was necessary to the support of life, and were in danger of perishing for want of it; and that their enemies were strengthened by it, had their camp victualled with it, and so were the better able to do them a mischief. God is said to give their corn to their enemies, because he not only permitted it, but ordered it to be the just punishment both of their abuse of plenty and their symbolizing with strangers, ch. i. 7. The wine which they had laboured for, and which in their affliction they needed, for the relief of those among them that were of heavy heart, strangers drunk it to gratify their lusts with. This sore judgment was threatened for their sins, Lev. xxvi. 16; Deu. xxviii. 33. See how uncertain our creature comforts are, and how much it is our wisdom to labour for that meat which we can never be robbed of.

2. The great fulness and satisfaction they should now be restored to; ver. 9, "They that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the Lord." See here, 1st. God's mercy in giving plenty, and peace to enjoy it. That the earth yields her increase, that there are hands to be employed in gathering it in, and that they are not taken off by plague and sickness, or otherwise employed in war; that strangers and enemies do not come and gather it for themselves, or take it from us when we have gathered it; that we eat the labour of our hands, and the bread is not eaten out of our mouth; and especially that we have opportunity and a heart to honour God with it, and that his courts are open to us, and we are not restrained from attending on him in them. 2nd. Our duty in the enjoyment of this mercy. We must gather what God gives with care and industry; we must eat it freely and cheerfully, not bury the gifts of God's bounty, but make use of them. We must, when we have eaten and are full, bless the Lord, and give him thanks for his bounty to us; and we must serve him with our abundance; use it in works of piety and charity; eat it and drink it in the courts of his holiness, where the altar, the priest, and the poor, must all have their share. The greatest comfort that a good man hath in his meat and drink is, that it furnisheth him with a meat offering and a drink offering for the Lord his God, Joel ii. 14; that he hath in an estate is, that it gives him an opportunity of honouring God, and doing good. This wine is to be drunk in the courts of God's holiness, and therefore moderately and with sobriety, as before the Lord.

3. The solemn ratification of this promise. "The Lord hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength," that he will do this for his people. God confirms it by an oath, that his people that trust in him and his word may have strong consolation, Heb. vi. 17, 18. And, since he can swear by no greater, he swears by himself, sometimes by his being, "As I live," Eze xxxiii. 11; sometimes by his holiness, Ps. lxxxix. 35; here by his power, his right hand, (which was lifted up in swearing, Deu. xxxii. 40,) and his arm of power; for it is a great satisfaction to those who build their hopes on God's promise to be sure that what he hath promised he is able also to perform, Rom. iv. 21. To assure us of this he has sworn by his strength, pawning the reputation of his omnipotence upon it. If he do not do it, let it be said it was because he could not, which the Egyptians shall never say, Num. xiv. 16, nor any other. It is the comfort of God's people that his power is engaged for them; his right hand, where the Mediator sits.

10 Go through, go through the gates;
Prepare ye the way of the people;
Cast up, cast up the highway;
Gather out the stones;
Lift up a standard for the people.
11 Behold, the LORD hath proclaimed unto the end of the world,
Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy salvation cometh;
Behold, his reward is with him, and his work before him.
12 And they shall call them, The holy people,
The redeemed of the LORD:
And thou shalt be called, Sought out,
A city not forsaken.

This, as many like passages before, refers to the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon, and, under the type and figure of that, to the great redemption wrought out by Jesus Christ, and the proclaiming of gospel grace and liberty through him.

First. Way shall be made for this salvation. All difficulties shall be removed, and whatever might obstruct it shall be taken out of the way, ver. 10. The gates of Babylon shall be thrown open, that they may with freedom go through them. The way from Babylon to the land of Israel shall be prepared; causeways shall be made and cast up through wet and miry places, and the stones gathered out from places rough and rocky. In the convenient places appointed for their rendezvous, standards shall be set up for their direction and encouragement, that they may embody for their greater safety. Thus John Baptist was sent to prepare the way of the Lord, Mat. iii. 3. And before Christ by his graces and comforts comes to any for salvation, preparation is made for him by repentance; that is called the "preparation of the Gospel of peace." Eph. vi. 15. Here the way is levelled by it; there the feet are shod with it; which comes all to one, for both are in order to a journey.

Secondly. Notice shall be given of this salvation, ver. 11, 12. It shall be proclaimed to the captives that they are set at liberty, and may go if they please. It shall be proclaimed to their neighbours, to all about them, to the end of the world, that God hath pleaded Zion's just, and injured, and despised cause. Let it be said to Zion, for her comfort, "Behold, thy salvation cometh;" that is, thy Saviour, who brings salvation. He will bring such a work, such a reward, in this salvation as shall be admired by all; a reward of comfort and peace with him, but a work of humiliation and reformation before him, to prepare his people for that recompence of their sufferings. And then, with reference to each, it follows, they shall be called, "The holy people," and "the redeemed of the Lord." The work before him, which shall be wrought in them, and upon them, shall denominate them a holy people, cured of their inclination to idolatry, and consecrated to God only; and the reward with him, the deliverance wrought for them, shall denominate them the redeemed of the Lord, so redeemed, as none but God could redeem them; and redeemed to be his, their bonds loosed, that they might be his servants. Jerusalem shall then be called, "Sought out, a city not forsaken." She had been forsaken for many years; there were neither traders nor worshippers that inquired the way to Jerusalem, as formerly, when it was frequented by both; but now God will again make it considerable, it shall be sought out, visited, resorted to, and court made to it as much as ever. When it is called a holy city, then it is called, Sought out; for holiness puts an honour and beauty upon any place or person, which draws respect, and makes them to be admired and beloved, and inquired after. But this being proclaimed to the end of the world, must have a reference to the Gospel of Christ, which was to be preached to every creature; and it speaks, 1. The glory of Christ. It is published immediately to the church, but is thence echoed to every nation; "Behold, thy salvation cometh." Christ is not only the Saviour, but the salvation itself; for the happiness of believers is not only from him, but in him, ch. xii. 21. His salvation consists both in the work and in the reward which he brings with him; for those that are his shall neither be idle nor lose their labour. 2. The beauty of the church. Christians shall be called saints, 1 Cor. i. 2, the holy people, for they are chosen and called to salvation through sanctification. They shall be called "the redeemed of the Lord;" to him they owe their liberty, and therefore to him they owe their service, and they shall not be ashamed to own both. None are to be called "the redeemed of the Lord" but those that are the holy people; the people of God's purchase is a holy nation. And they shall be called, Sought out; God shall seek them out, and find them, wherever they are dispersed, eclipsed, or lost in a crowd; men shall seek them out, that they may join themselves to them, and not forsake them. It is good to associate with the holy people, that we may learn their ways; and with the redeemed of the Lord, that we may share in the blessings of the redemption.

CHAPTER LXIII.

In this chapter we have, 1. God coming towards his people in ways of mercy and deliverance; and this is to be joined to the close of the foregoing chapter, where it was said to Zion, "Behold, thy salvation cometh;" for here it is shewed how it comes, ver. 1—6. 11. God's people meeting him with their devotions, and addressing themselves to him with suitable affections; and this part of the chapter is carried on to the close of the next In this we have, 1. A thankful acknowledgment of the great favours God lxiii. 6. The verbs here should also be rendered in the past tense: "I trod down nations in my anger, and intoxicated them in my wrath, and caused their blood to run down to the earth." The whole passage describes the suppression of enemies by force, and with great slaughter.

lxiii. 9. The ancient versions differ from one another and from the ordinary Hebrew text here. There is also a various reading, and instead of "he was afflicted" (literally, there was affliction to him), many copies have "there was no affliction." On the whole we prefer the common explanation.

lxiii. 11. There is a various reading here, some copies having "shepherd" and others "shepherds." In the one case Moses, and in the other Moses and Aaron may be meant. The last clause is ambiguous; and for "him" we may translate "it," i.e., the flock, or the people spoken of collectively, as often happens.

lxiii. 13. "In the wilderness," i.e., in an open and uncultivated bestowed upon them, ver. 7; 2. The magnifying of these favours, from the consideration of God's relation to them, ver. 8, his compassionate concern for them, ver. 9, their unworthiness, ver. 10, and the occasion which it gave both him and them to call to mind former mercies, ver. 11—14. 3. A very humble and earnest prayer to God to appear for them in their present distress, pleading God's mercy, ver. 15, their relation to him, ver. 16, their desire towards him, ver. 17, and the insolence of their enemies, ver. 18, 19. So that upon the whole we learn to embrace God's promises with an active faith, and then to improve them, and make use of them both in prayers and praises.

WHO is this that cometh from Edom,
With dyed garments from Bozrah?
This that is glorious in his apparel,
Travelling in the greatness of his strength?
I that speak in righteousness,
Mighty to save.

2 Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel,
And thy garments like him that treadeth in the winefat?

3 I have trodden the winepress alone;
And of the people there was none with me:
For I will tread them in mine anger,
And trample them in my fury;
And their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments,
And I will stain all my raiment.

4 For the day of vengeance is in mine heart,
And the year of my redeemed is come.

5 And I looked, and there was none to help;
And I wondered that there was none to uphold:
Therefore mine own arm brought salvation unto me;
And my fury, it upheld me.

6 And I will tread down the people in mine anger,
And make them drunk in my fury,
And I will bring down their strength to the earth.

It is a glorious victory that is here inquired into first, and then accounted for: 1. It is a victory obtained by the providence of God over the enemies of Israel. Over the Babylonians, say some, whom Cyrus conquered, and God by him; and they will have the prophet to make the first discovery of him in his triumphant return, when he is in the country of Edom. But this can by no means be admitted, because the country of Babylon is always spoken of as the land of the north; whereas Edom lay south from Jerusalem, so that the conqueror would not return through that country; the victory therefore is obtained over the Edomites themselves, who had triumphed in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, Ps. cxxxvii. 7, and cut off those who, making their way as far as they could from the enemy, escaped to the Edomites, Oba. 12, 13, and were therefore reckoned with when Babylon was; for no doubt that prophecy was accomplished, though we do not meet in history with the accomplishment of it, Jer. xlix. 13, "Bozrah shall become a desolation." Yet this victory over Edom is put as an instance, or specimen, of the like victories obtained over other nations that had been enemies to Israel. This over the Edomites is named for the sake of the old enmity of Esau against Jacob, Gen. xxvii. 41; and perhaps with an allusion to David's glorious triumph over the Edomites, by which it should seem, more than by any other of his victories, he got him a name, Ps. lx. title; 2 Sam. viii. 13, 14. But this is not all: 2. It is a victory obtained by the grace of God in Christ, over our spiritual enemies. We find the garments dipped in blood, adorning him whose name is called the Word of God, Rev. xix. 13, and who that is, we know very well; by the same token it is through him that we are more than conquerors over those principalities and powers which on the cross he spoiled and triumphed over. In this representation of the victory we have,

First. An admiring question put to the conqueror, ver. 1, 2. It is put by the church, or by the prophet in the name of the church. He sees a mighty hero returning in triumph from a bloody engagement, and makes bold to ask him two questions: 1. Who he is. He observes him to come from the country of Edom, to come in such apparel as was glorious to a soldier; not embroidered or laced, but besmeared with blood and dirt. He observes he doth not come as one either frighted or fatigued, but travels in the greatness of his strength, altogether unbroken.

'Triumphant and victorious he appears,
And honour in his looks and habit wears:
How strong he treads, how stately doth he go!
Pompous and solemn in his pace,
And full of majesty, as is his face;
Who is this mighty hero, who?'—Mr. Norris.

The question, "Who is this?" perhaps means the same with that which Joshua put to the same person when he appeared to him with his sword drawn, Jos. v. 13, "Art thou for us, or for our adversaries?" Or rather, the same with that which Israel put in a way of adoration, Ex. xv. 11, "Who is a God like unto thee?" 2. The other question is, "Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel?" What hard service hast thou been engaged in, that thou carriest with thee these marks of toil and danger? Is it possible that one who has such majesty and terror in his countenance should be employed in the mean and servile work of treading the winepress? Sure it is not. That which is really the glory of the Redeemer, yet prima facie,—'at first,' seems a disparagement to him, as it would be to a mighty prince to do the work of the vinedressers and husbandmen; for he took upon him the form of a servant, and carried with him the marks of servitude.

Secondly. An admirable answer returned by him.

1. He tells who he is; "I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save." He is the Saviour. God was Israel's Saviour out of the hand of their oppressors; the Lord Jesus is ours. His name, Jesus, signifies a saviour, for he saves his people from their sins. In the salvation wrought he will have us to take notice, 1st. Of the truth of his promise, which is therein performed. He speaks in righteousness, and will therefore make good every word that he hath spoken, with which he will have us to compare what he doth; that, setting the word and the work the one over against the other, what he doth may ratify what he hath said; and what he hath said may justify what he doth. 2nd. Of the efficacy of his power, which is therein exerted. He is mighty to save, able to bring about the promised redemption, whatever difficulties and oppositions may lie in the way of it.

'Tis I, who to my promise faithful stand;
I, who the powers of death, hell, and the grave,
Have foil'd with this all-conquering hand;
I, who most ready am, and mighty too to save.'—Mr. Norris.

2. He tells how he came to appear in this hue; ver. 3, "I have trodden the winepress alone." Being compared to one that treads in the winefat, such is his condescension in the midst of his triumphs, that he doth not scorn the comparison, but admits it, and carries it on. He doth indeed tread the winepress, but it is "the great winepress of the wrath of God," Rev. xiv. 19, in which we sinners deserved to have been cast; but Christ was pleased to cast our enemies into it, and destroy him that had the power of death, that he might deliver us. And of this the bloody work which God sometimes made among the enemies of the Jews, and which is here foretold, was a type and figure. Observe the account the conqueror gives of his victory.

1st. He gains the victory purely by his own strength; "I have trodden the winepress alone," ver. 3. When God delivered his people, and destroyed their enemies, if he made use of instruments, he did not need them; but among his people, for whom the salvation was to be wrought, there was no assistance offered itself, they were weak and helpless, and had no ability to do any thing for their own relief; they were desponding and listless, and had no heart to do any thing; they were not disposed to give the least stroke or struggle for liberty; neither the captives themselves, nor any of their friends for them; ver. 5, "I looked, and there was none to help," as one would have expected, nothing of a bold, active spirit appeared among them; nay, there were not only none to lead, but, which was more strange, there was none to uphold, none that would come in as seconds, that had the courage to join with Cyrus against their oppressors: therefore mine own arm brought about the salvation; not by created might or power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, that is, his own arm. Note, God can help when all other helpers fail; nay, this is his time to help, and therefore for that very reason he will put forth his own power so much the more gloriously. But this is most fully applicable to Christ's victories over our spiritual enemies, which he obtained by single combat. He trod the winepress of his Father's wrath alone, and triumphed over principalities and powers in himself, Col. ii. 15. Of the people there was none with him; for when he entered the lists with the powers of darkness all his disciples forsook him and fled. There was none to help, none that could, none that durst; and he might well wonder that among the children of men, whose concern it was, there was not only none to uphold, but so many to oppose and hinder it, if they could.

2nd. He undertakes the war purely out of his own zeal. It is in his anger, it is in his fury, that he treads down his enemies, ver. 3, and that fury upholds him, and carries him on in his enterprise, ver. 5. God wrought salvation for the oppressed Jews, purely because he was very angry with the oppressing Babylonians, angry at their idolatries and sorceries, their pride and cruelty, and the injuries they did to his people; in which, as they increased and grew more insolent and outrageous, his anger increased to fury. Our Lord Jesus wrought out our redemption in a holy zeal for the honour of his Father and the happiness of mankind, and a holy indignation at the daring attempts Satan had made upon both; this zeal and indignation upheld him throughout his whole undertaking. Two branches there were of this zeal that animated him: First. He had a zeal against his and his people's enemies; "The day of vengeance is in my heart," ver. 4. The day fixed in the eternal counsels for taking vengeance on them, this was written in his heart, so that he could not forget it, could not let it slip; his heart was full of it, and it lay as a charge, as a weight upon him, which made him push on this holy war with so much vigour. Note, There is a day fixed for Divine vengeance, which may be long deferred, but will come at last; and we may be content to wait for it, for the Redeemer himself doth, though his heart is upon it. Secondly. He had a zeal for his people, and all that he designed should share in the intended salvation; "The year of my redeemed is come;" that is, the year appointed for their redemption. The year was fixed for the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, and God kept time to a day, Ex. xii. 41. So there was for their release out of Babylon, Dan. ix. 2. So there was for Christ's coming to destroy the works of the devil. So there is for all the deliverances of the church; and the Deliverer has an eye to it. Observe, 1*st.* With what a pleasure he speaks of his people; They are my redeemed. They are his own, dear to him. Though their redemption is not yet wrought out, yet he calls them his redeemed, because it shall as surely be done as if it were done already. 2*nd.* With what a pleasure he speaks of his people's redemption; how glad he is that the time is come, though he is like to meet with a sharp encounter. Now the year of my redeemed is come, "Lo, I come;" delay shall be no longer. Now will I arise, saith the Lord; now thou shalt see what I will do to Pharaoh. Note, The promised salvation must be patiently waited for till the time appointed comes; yet we must attend the promises with our prayers. Doth Christ say, Surely I come quickly; let our hearts reply, Even so, come; let the year of the redeemed come.

3rd. He will obtain a complete victory over them all. First. Much is done already; for he now appears red in his apparel; such abundance of blood is shed, that the conqueror's garments are all stained with it. This was long before, by dying Jacob, foretold concerning Shiloh, that is, Christ, that he should wash "his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes," which perhaps this here alludes to, Gen. xlix. 11.

'With ornamental drops bedeck'd I stood,
And writ my victory with my enemy's blood.'—Mr. Norris.

In the destruction of the antichristian powers, we meet with abundance of bloodshed, Rev. xiv. 20; xix. 13, which yet, according to the dialect of prophecy, may be understood spiritually, and doubtless so may this here. Secondly. More shall yet be done; ver. 6, "I will tread down the people," that yet stand it out against me "in mine anger;" for the victorious Redeemer, when the year of the redeemed is come, will go on conquering and to conquer, Rev. vi. 2. When he begins he will also make an end. Observe how he will complete his victories over the enemies of his church. 1*st.* He will infatuate them. He will make them drunk, so that there shall be neither sense nor steadiness in their counsels; they shall drink of the cup of his fury, and that shall intoxicate them. Or, he will make them drunk with their own blood, Rev. xvii. 6. Let those that make themselves drunk with the cup of riot, (and then are in their fury,) repent and reform, lest God make them drunk with the cup of trembling, the cup of his fury. 2*nd.* He will enfeeble them. He will "bring down their strength," and so bring them down to the earth; for what strength can hold against Omnipotence?

7 I will mention the lovingkindnesses of the LORD,
And the praises of the LORD,

country, where nothing interferes with the onward progress of the courser.

lxiii. 14. "As a beast goeth down into the valley" is a feeble rendering. The original means, "As cattle descend into the plain, where they find pasture, water, and quiet resting-places, so the Lord brought his people and gave them rest and plenty in Canaan.

lxiii. 15. "The sounding of thy bowels," as our unadorned version has it, is an allusion to the rumbling motion of the bowels, which is regarded as an indication sometimes of strong emotion and sympathy. Even now we sometimes speak of the bowels yearning over or after some one. The word bowels is occasionally found in the same sense of pity, sympathy, and the like.

lxiii. 16. Two explanations of the last words are advocated, both depending upon the punctuation adopted. Our text gives one and the margin indicates the other: "our redeemer from everlasting is thy name." We prefer the common view.

According to all that the LORD hath bestowed on us,
And the great goodness toward the house of Israel,
Which he hath bestowed on them according to his mercies,
And according to the multitude of his lovingkindnesses.
8 For he said, Surely they are my people,
Children that will not lie:
So he was their Saviour.
9 In all their affliction he was afflicted,
And the angel of his presence saved them:
In his love and in his pity he redeemed them;
And he bare them, and carried them all the days of old.
10 But they rebelled, and vexed his holy Spirit;
Therefore he was turned to be their enemy,
And he fought against them.
11 Then he remembered the days of old, Moses, and his people, saying,
Where is he that brought them up out of the sea
With the shepherd of his flock?
Where is he that put his holy Spirit within him?
12 That led them by the right hand of Moses with his glorious arm,
Dividing the water before them,
To make himself an everlasting name?
13 That led them through the deep,
As an horse in the wilderness, that they should not stumble?
14 As a beast goeth down into the valley,
The Spirit of the LORD caused him to rest:
So didst thou lead thy people,
To make thyself a glorious name.

The prophet is here, in the name of the church, taking a review, and making a thankful recognition, of God's dealings with his church all along, ever since he founded it, before he comes, in the latter end of this chapter, and in the next, as a watchman upon the walls, earnestly to pray to God for his compassion towards her in her present deplorable state; and it was usual for God's people in their prayers thus to look back.

First. Here is a general acknowledgment of God's goodness to them all along, ver. 7. It was said in general of God's prophets and people, ch. lxii. 6, that they "make mention of the Lord;" now here we are told what it is in God that they do especially delight to make mention of, and that is his goodness, which the prophet here so makes mention of, as if he thought he could never say enough of it. He mentions the kindness of God, (which never appeared so evident, so eminent, as in his love to mankind in sending his Son to save us, Tit. iii. 4,) his lovingkindness; kindness that shews itself in every thing that is endearing; nay, so plenteous are the springs, and so various the streams, of Divine mercy, that he speaks of it in the plural number, his lovingkindnesses; for if we would count the fruits of his lovingkindnesses, they are more in number than the sand. With his lovingkindnesses he mentions his praises, that is, the thankful acknowledgments which the saints make of his lovingkindness, and the angels too. It must be mentioned to God's honour, what a tribute of praise is paid by all his creatures, in consideration of his lovingkindness. See how copiously he speaks,

1. Of the goodness that is from God, the gifts of his lovingkindness; "All that the Lord has bestowed on us" in particular, relating to life and godliness, in our personal and family capacity. Let every man speak for himself, speak as he has found, and he must own that he has had a great deal bestowed upon him by the Divine bounty. But we must also mention the favours bestowed upon his church; his "great goodness towards the house of Israel, which he has bestowed on them." Note, We must bless God for others' mercies as for our own; and reckon that bestowed on ourselves which is bestowed on the house of Israel.

2. Of the goodness that is in God. God doth good, because he is good; what he bestows upon us must be run up to the original, it is "according to his mercies," not according to our merits; and "according to the multitude of his lovingkindnesses," which can never be spent. Thus we should magnify God's goodness, and speak honourably of it, not only when we plead it, as David, Ps. li. 1, but when we praise it.

Secondly. Here is particular notice taken of the steps of God's mercy to Israel, ever since it was first formed into a nation.

1. The expectations God had concerning them, that they would carry themselves well, ver. 8. When he brought them out of Egypt, and took them into covenant with himself, he said, "Surely they are my people," I take them as such, and am willing to hope they will approve themselves so; "children that will not lie," that is, that will not dissemble with God in their covenantings with him, nor treacherously depart from him, by breaking their covenant, and starting aside like a broken bow. They said more than once, All that the Lord shall say unto us we will do, and will be obedient; and thereupon he took them to be his peculiar people, saying, Surely they will not lie. God deals fairly and faithfully with them, and therefore expects they should deal so with him. They are children of the covenant, Acts iii. 25; children of those that clave unto the Lord, and therefore it may be hoped they will tread in the steps of their fathers' constancy. Note, God's people are children that will not lie, for those that will are not his children, but the devil's.

2. The favour he shewed them, with an eye to these expectations; "So he was their Saviour" out of the bondage of Egypt, and all the calamities of their wilderness state, and many a time since he had been their Saviour. See particularly, ver. 9, what he did for them as their Saviour. 1st. The principle that moved him to work salvation for them. It was "in his love and in his pity," out of mere compassion to them, and a tender affection for them, not because he either needed them, or could be benefited by them. This is strangely expressed here, "In all their affliction he was afflicted." Not that the Eternal Mind is capable of grieving, or God's infinite blessedness of suffering the least damage or diminution,—God cannot be afflicted; but thus he is pleased to shew forth the love and concern he has for his people in their affliction; thus far he sympathises with them, that he takes what injury is done to them as done to himself, and will reckon for it accordingly. Their cries move him, Ex. iii. 7, and he appears for them so vigorously, as if he were pained in their pain; "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" This is matter of great comfort to God's people in their affliction, that God is so far from afflicting willingly, Lam. iii. 33, that if they humble themselves under his hand, he is afflicted in their affliction, as the tender parents are in the severe operations which the case of a sick child calls for. There is another reading of these words in the original, 'In all their affliction there was no affliction.' Though they were in great affliction, yet the property of it was so altered by the grace of God sanctifying it to them for their good; the rigour of it was so mitigated, and it was so allayed and balanced with mercies; they were so wonderfully supported and comforted under it, and it proved so short, and ended so well, that it was in effect no affliction. The troubles of the saints are not that to them that they are to others; they are not afflictions, but medicines; they are enabled to call them light, and but for a moment, and, with an eye to heaven as all in all, to make nothing of them. 2nd. The person employed in their salvation; the angel of his face, or presence. Some understand it of a created angel. The highest angel in heaven, even the angel of his presence, that attends next the throne of his glory is not thought too great, too good, to be sent on this errand. Thus the little ones' angels are said to be those that always behold the face of our Father, Mat. xviii. 10. But this is rather to be understood of Jesus Christ, the eternal Word, that angel of whom God spake to Moses, Ex. xxiii. 10, whose voice Israel was to obey. He is called Jehovah, Ex. xiii. 21; xiv. 19, 24. He is the angel of the covenant, God's messenger to the world, Mal. iii. 1. He is the angel of God's face, for he is the express image of his person; and the glory of God shines in the face of Christ. He that was to work out the eternal salvation, as an earnest of that, wrought out the temporal salvations that were typical of it. 3rd. The progress and perseverance of this favour. He not only redeemed them out of their bondage, but he bare them, and carried them all the days of old. They were weak, but he supported them by his power, sustained them by his bounty; when they were burthened and ready to sink, he bore them up; in the wars they made upon the nations, he stood by them, and bore them out; though they were peevish, he bore with them, and suffered their manners, Acts xiii. 18. He carried them, as the nursing father doth the child, though they would have tired any arms but his; carried them as the eagle her young upon her wings, Deu. xxxii. 11. And it was a long time that he was troubled with them, (if we may so speak,) it was all the days of old; his care of them was not at an end even when they were grown up and settled in Canaan. All this was in his love and pity, ex mero motu,—'of his mere good-will,' he loved them because he would love them, as he saith, Deu. vii. 7, 8.

3. Their disingenuous carriage towards him, and the trouble they thereby brought upon themselves; ver. 10, "But they rebelled." Things looked very hopeful and promising, one would have thought they should have continued dutiful children to God, and then no doubt but he would have continued a gracious Father to them; but here is a sad change on both sides, and on them be the breach. 1st. They revolted from their allegiance to God, and took up arms against him. They "rebelled and vexed his holy Spirit," with their unbelief and murmuring, besides the iniquity of the golden calf; and this has been their way and manner ever since. Though he had so good an opinion of them, that they would not lie, though he had done so much for them, borne them and carried them, yet they thus ill requited him, like "foolish people and unwise," Deu. xxxii. 6. This grieved him, Ps. xcv. 10. The ungrateful rebellions of God's children against him are a vexation to his holy Spirit. 2nd. Thereupon he justly withdrew his protection, and not only so, but made war upon them, as a prince justly doth upon the rebels. He who had been so much their friend was "turned to be their enemy, and fought against them," by one judgment after another, both in the wilderness and after their settlement in Canaan. See the malignity and mischievousness of sin: it makes God an enemy, even to those for whom he has done the part of a good friend; and makes him angry that was all love and pity. See the folly of sinners: they wilfully lose him for a friend that is the most desirable friend; and make him their enemy that is the most formidable enemy. This refers especially to those calamities that were of late brought upon them, by their captivity in Babylon, for their idolatries and other sins. That which was both the original and the great aggravation of their troubles was, that God was turned to be their enemy.

4. A particular reflection made on this occasion upon what God did for them when he first formed them into a people; "Then he remembered the days of old," ver. 11. This may be understood either,

1st. Of the people. Israel then, spoken of as a single person, "remembered the days of old," looked into their Bibles, read the story of God's bringing their fathers out of Egypt, and considered it more closely than ever they did before, and reasoned upon it, as Gideon did, Jud. vi. 13, "Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of?" Where is he that brought them up out of Egypt? Is he not as able to bring us up out of Babylon? Where is the Lord God of Elijah? Where is the Lord God of our fathers? This they consider as an inducement and an encouragement to them to repent and return to him: their fathers were a provoking people, and yet found him a pardoning God; and why may not they find him so, if they return to him? They also use it as a plea with God in prayer, for the turning again of their captivity, like that, ch. li. 9, 10. Note, When the present days are dark and cloudy it is good to remember the days of old, to recollect our own and others' experiences of the Divine power and goodness, and make use of them; to look back upon "the years of the right hand of the Most High," Ps. lxxvii. 5, 10, and remember that he is God, and changeth not. Or,

2nd. We may understand it of God. He put himself in mind of the days of old, of his covenant with Abraham, Lev. xxvi. 42. He said, "Where is he that brought Israel up out of the sea?" stirring up himself to come and save them with this consideration, Why should not I appear for them now as I did for their fathers, who were as undeserving, as ill deserving, as they are? See how far off Divine mercy will go, how far back it will look, to find out a reason for doing good to his people, when no present considerations appear but what make against them! Nay, it makes that a reason for relieving them which might have been used as a reason for abandoning them. He might have said, I have delivered them formerly, but they have again brought trouble upon themselves, Pr. xix. 19, therefore I will deliver them no more, Jud. x. 13. No; mercy rejoiceth against judgment, and turns the argument the other way; I have formerly delivered them, and therefore will now.

Which way soever we take it, whether the people plead it with God or God with himself, let us view the particulars; and they agree very much with that confession and prayer which the children of the captivity made upon a solemn fast-day, Neh. ix. 5, &c., which may serve as a comment on these verses here, which call to mind Moses and his people; that is, what God did by Moses for his people, especially in bringing them through the Red sea. For that is it which is here most insisted on; for it was a work which he much gloried in, and which his people therefore may, in a particular manner, encourage themlxiii. 17. The first clause as it stands seems to throw the blame of the sin and misery of Israel upon the Lord himself. That this is not, however, the intention is evident from the constant recognition of personal guilt and duty. It remains yet to be proved that the Hebrew mind ever thought of God as leading men astray from the very course he had commanded them to walk in, and as hardening their hearts so that they should not be able to exercise towards him the reverence which he had enjoined. The short and true answer to all objections based on this principle is, that God allows men to sin and go wrong. The atheist and the deist must both admit that men do go wrong, whatever other explanation of the fact they can invent. With regard to this verse, the second clause shows that no complete apostacy is intended, for one of the grace-forsaken people piously prays, "Return for thy servants' sake." Here is no sign of hard-hearted irreverence and rebellion.

lxiii. 18. The wording of this verse may be improved: "Thy holy selves with the remembrance of. First. "God led them by the right hand of Moses," ver. 13, and the wonder-working rod in his hand; Ps. lxxvii. 20, "Thou leddest thy people like a flock by the hand of Moses." It was not Moses that led them, no more than it was Moses that fed them, Jno. vi. 32, but God by Moses; for it was he that qualified Moses for, called him to, assisted and prospered him in, that great undertaking. Moses is here called "the shepherd of his flock." God was the owner of the flock, and the chief Shepherd of Israel, Ps. lxxx. 1; but Moses was a shepherd under him, and he was inured to labour and patience, and so fitted for this pastoral care, by his being trained up to keep the flock of his father Jethro. Herein he was a type of Christ, the good Shepherd, that "lays down his life for the sheep;" which was more than Moses did for Israel, though he did a great deal for them. Secondly. He "put his holy Spirit within him." The Spirit of God was among them, and not only his providence, but his grace did work for them; Neh. ix. 20, "Thou gavest thy good Spirit to instruct them." The spirit of wisdom and courage, as well as the spirit of prophecy, was put into Moses, to qualify him for that service among them to which he was called; and some of his spirit was put upon the seventy elders, Num. xi. 17. This was a great blessing to Israel, that they had not only inspired writings, but inspired men among them. Thirdly. He carried them safely through the Red sea, and thereby saved them out of the hands of Pharaoh. 1*st.* He "divided the water before them," ver. 12, so that it gave them not only passage but protection; not only opened them a lane, but erected them a wall on either side. 2*nd.* He "led them through the deep, as a horse in the wilderness," or in the plain, ver. 13. They and their wives and children, with all their bag and baggage, went as easily and readily through the bottom of the sea, though we may suppose it muddy, or stony, or both, as a horse goes along upon even ground; so that they did not stumble, though it was an untrodden path, which neither they nor any one else ever went before. If God make us a way, he will make it plain and level. The road he opens to his people he will lead them in. 3*rd.* To complete the mercy, he "brought them up out of the sea," ver. 11. Though the ascent, it is likely, was very steep, dirty, and slippery, and unconquerable, (at least by the women and children, and the men, considering how they were loaded, Ex. xii. 34, and how fatigued,) yet God, by his power, brought them up from the depths of the earth; and it was a kind of resurrection to them; it was as life from the dead. Fourthly. He brought them safe to a place of rest. "As a beast goeth down into the valley," fair and softly, and by leisure steps, so "the Spirit of the Lord caused him to rest." Many a time, in their march through the wilderness, they had resting-places provided for them by the direction of the Spirit of the Lord in Moses, ver. 11. And at length they were made to rest for good and all in Canaan, and the Spirit of the Lord gave them that rest, according to the promise. It is by the Spirit of the Lord that God's Israel are caused to return to God, and repose in him as their rest. Fifthly. All this he did for them by his own power, for his own praise. 1*st.* It was by his own power, as the God of nature, that has all the powers of nature at his command; he did it with his glorious arm, the arm of his gallantry or bravery, so the word signifies. It was not Moses' rod, but God's glorious arm that did it. 2*nd.* It was for his own praise; to "make himself an everlasting name," ver. 12; "a glorious name," ver. 14, that he might be glorified, everlastingly glorified upon this account. This is that which God is doing in the world with his glorious arm; he is making to himself a glorious name, and it shall last to endless ages, when the most celebrated names of the great ones of the earth shall be written in the dust.

15 Look down from heaven, [thy glory:
And behold from the habitation of thy holiness and of
Where is thy zeal and thy strength,
The sounding of thy bowels and of thy mercies toward me?
Are they restrained?
16 Doubtless thou art our father,
Though Abraham be ignorant of us,
And Israel acknowledge us not:
Thou, O LORD, art our father, our redeemer;
Thy name is from everlasting.
17 O LORD, why hast thou made us to err from thy ways,
And hardened our heart from thy fear?
Return for thy servants' sake,
The tribes of thine inheritance. [while:
18 The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little
Our adversaries have trodden down thy sanctuary.
19 We are thine: thou never barest rule over them;
They were not called by thy name.

The foregoing praises were intended as an introduction to this prayer, which is continued to the end of the next chapter; and it is an affectionate, importunate, pleading prayer; it is calculated for the time of the captivity. As they had promises, so they had prayers prepared for them against that time of need, that they might take with them words in turning to the Lord, and say unto him what he himself taught them to say, in which they might the better hope to prevail, the words being of God's own inditing. Some good interpreters think this prayer looks farther, and that it speaks the complaints of the Jews under their last and final rejection from God, and destruction by the Romans; for there is one passage in it, ch. lxiv. 4, which is applied to the grace of the Gospel by the apostle, 1 Cor. ii. 9, that grace, for the rejecting of which they were rejected. In these verses we may observe,

First. The petitions they put up to God.

1. That he would take cognizance of their case, and of the desires of their souls towards him; "Look down from heaven, and behold." They knew very well that God sees all, but they pray he would regard them, would condescend to favour them, would look upon them with an eye of compassion and concern, as he looked upon the affliction of his people in Egypt, when he was about to appear for their deliverance. In begging that he would only look down upon them, and behold them, they do in effect appeal to his justice against their enemies, and pray judgment against them, as Jehosnaphat, 2 Chr. xx. 11, 12, 'Behold, how they reward us! Wilt thou not judge them?" And they refer themselves to his mercy and wisdom, in what way he will relieve them; Ps. xxv. 18, "Look upon mine affliction and my pain." Look down "from the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory." God's holiness is his glory; heaven is his habitation, the throne of his glory, where he doth most manifest his glory, and from whence he is said to look down upon this earth, Ps. xxxiii. 14. His holiness is in a special manner celebrated there by the blessed angels, ch. vi. 3; Rev. iv. 8. There his holy ones attend him, and are continually about him, so that it is the habitation of his holiness, which is an encouragement to all his praying people, who desire to be holy as he is holy, that he dwells in a holy place.

2. That he would take a course for their relief; ver. 17, "Return," that is, Change thy way towards us, and proceed not in thy controversy with us. Return in mercy, and let us have not only a gracious look towards us, but thy gracious presence with us. God's people dread nothing more than his departures from them, and desire nothing more than his returns to them.

Secondly. The complaints they make to God. Two things they complain of:

1. That they were given up to themselves, and God's grace did not recover them, ver. 17. It is a strange expostulation, "Why hast thou made us to err from thy ways?" that is, many among us, the generality of us; and this complaint we have all of us some cause to make, that thou hast hardened our heart from thy fear. Some make it to be the language of those among them that were impious and profane. When the prophets reproved them for the error of their ways, their hardness of heart, and contempt of God's word and commandments, they, with a daring impudence, charge their sin upon God, and make him the author of it; and why doth he then find fault? Note, Those are wicked indeed that lay the blame of their wickedness upon God. But I rather take it to be the language of those among them that lamented the unbelief and impenitency of their people, not accusing God of being the author of it, but complaining of it to him. They own that they had erred from God's ways, that their hearts had been hardened from his fear, that they had not received the impressions which the fear of God ought to make upon them, and this was the cause of all their errors from his ways, or, from his fear, that is, from the true worship of God; and that is a hard heart indeed that is alienated from the service of a God so incontestably great and good. Now this they complain of as their great misery and burthen, that God had for their sins left them to this, had permitted them to err from his ways, and had justly withheld his grace, so that their hearts were hardened from his fear. When they ask, Why hast thou done this? it is not as charging him with wrong, but lamenting it as a sore judgment. God had made them to err, and hardened their hearts, not only by withdrawing his Spirit from them, because they had grieved, and vexed, and quenched him, ver. 10, but by a judicial sentence upon them, ch. vi. 9. 10, "Go, make the heart of this people fat," and by his providences concerning them, which had proved sad occasions of their departure from him. David complains of his banishment, that in it he was, in effect, bidden to go serve other gods, 1 Sam. xxvi. 19. Their troubles had alienated many of them from God, and prejudiced them against his service; and because the rod of the wicked had lain long on their lot, they were ready to put forth their hand unto iniquity, Ps. cxxv. 3. And this was the thing they complained most of, that their afflictions were their temptations, and to many of them invincible ones. Note, Convinced consciences complain most of spiritual judgments, and dread that most in an affliction which draws them from God and duty.

2. That they were given up to their enemies, and God's providence did not rescue and relieve them; ver. 18, "Our adversaries have trodden down thy sanctuary." As it was a grief to them, that in their captivity the generality of them had lost their affection to God's worship, and had their hearts hardened from it by their afflictions, so it was a farther grief that they were deprived of their opportunities of worshipping God in solemn assemblies. They complain not so much of the adversaries treading down their houses and cities, as of their treading down God's sanctuary, because thereby God was immediately affronted, and they were robbed of the comforts they valued most, and took most pleasure in.

Thirdly. The pleas they urge with God for mercy and deliverance.

1. They plead the tender compassion God used to shew to his people, and his ability and readiness to appear for them, ver. 15. The most prevailing arguments in prayer are those that are taken from God himself; so these are; "Where is thy zeal and thy strength?" God has a zeal for his own glory, and for the comfort of his people; his name is Jealous, and he is a jealous God; and he has a strength proportionable, to secure his own glory, and the interests of his people, in despite of all opposition. Now where are these? Have they not formerly appeared? Why do they not appear now? It cannot be that Divine zeal, which is infinitely wise and just, should be cooled, that Divine strength, which is infinite, should be weakened. Nay, his people had experienced not only his zeal and his strength, but the sounding of his bowels, or rather, the yearning of them, such a degree of compassion to them, as in men causeth a commotion and toss within them; as Hos. xi. 8, "Mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together;" and Jer. xxxi. 20, "My bowels are troubled," or sound, "for him." Thus God useth to be affected towards his people, and to express a multitude of mercies towards them. But where are they now? "Are they restrained?" Hath God, who so often remembered to be gracious, now forgotten it? "Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?" Ps. lxxvii. 9. It can never be. Note, We may ground good expectations of farther mercy upon our experiences of former mercy.

2. They plead God's relation to them as their Father, ver. 16. Thy tender mercies are not restrained, for they are the tender mercies of a Father, who, though he may be for a time displeased with his child, yet natural affection will soon prevail with him to be reconciled. "Doubtless thou art our Father," and therefore thy bowels will yearn towards us. Such good thoughts of God as these we should always keep up in our hearts. However it be, yet God is good, for he is our Father. They own themselves fatherless if he be not their Father, and so cast themselves upon him with whom "the fatherless find mercy," Hos. xiv. 3. It was the honour of their nation that they had Abraham to their father, Mat. iii. 9, who was the friend of God, and Israel, who was a prince with God; but what the better were they for that, unless they had God himself for their Father? for Abraham and Israel cannot help them: they have not the power that God hath, they are dead long since, and are ignorant of us, and acknowledge us not, they know not what our case is, nor what our wants are, and therefore know not which way to do us a kindness. If Abraham and Israel were alive with us, they would intercede for us, and advise us; but they are gone to the other world, and we know not that they have any communication at all with this world, and therefore are not capable of doing us any kindness, any farther than that we have the honour of being called their children. When the father is dead, "his sons come to honour, and he knoweth it not," Job xiv. 21. But thou, O Lord, art our Father still. The fathers of our flesh may call themselves ever loving, but they are not ever living; it is God only that is the immortal Father, that always knows us, and is never at a distance from us; and therefore, 'our Redeemer from everlasting is thy name,' the name by which we will know and own thee; it is the name by which from of old thou hast been known. Thy people have always looked upon thee as the God to whom they might appeal, to right them, and plead their cause. Nay, (according to the sense some give of this place,) though Abraham and Israel not only cannot, but would not help us, thou wilt; they have not the pity thou people inherited but for a little time, our enemies have trodden down thy holy place."

lxiii. 19. The true sense seems to be, "We were thy subjects of old, thou hast not ruled over them, they are not called by thy name" (or after thy name). In the Hebrew the first verse of chap. lxiv. forms the second half of the last verse of chap. lxiii. The beginning of a chapter near here at all is an unfortunate circumstance, as it interrupts the whole thread of the prophetic discourse.

lxiv. 2. The first clause simply means "as fire kindles brushwood, and as fire causes water to boil." So most modern critics explain it.

lxiv. 5. This verse is difficult to translate, and has much perplexed interpreters. The obscurity is not so much in the separate phrases as in the proper connection of them. Perhaps the sense is, "Thou meetest (to aid) him that rejoices and does righteousness; in thy ways they will remember thee; behold, thou art angry, and we have sinned in them (i.e., thy ways) continually; and shall we be saved?"

hast. We are so degenerate and corrupt, that Abraham and Israel would not own us for their children, yet we fly to thee as our Father. Abraham cast out his son Ishmael; Jacob disinherited his son Reuben, and cursed Simeon and Levi; but our heavenly Father, in pardoning sin, is God and not man, Hos. xi. 9.

3. They plead God's interest in them, that he was their Lord, their owner and proprietor; We are thy servants; what service we can do, thou art entitled to, and therefore we ought not to serve strange kings and strange gods. "Return, for thy servants' sake." As a father finds himself obliged by natural affection to relieve and protect his child, so a master thinks himself obliged in honour to rescue and protect his servant. We are thine by the strongest engagements, as well as the highest endearments. Thou hast borne rule over us, therefore, Lord, assert thine own interest, maintain thine own rights; for we are called by thy name, and therefore whither shall we go but to thee to be righted and protected? We are thine, save us, Ps. cxix. 44; thine own, own us. We are "the tribes of thine inheritance," not only thy servants, but thy tenants. We are thine, not only to do work for thee, but to pay rent to thee. The tribes of Israel are God's inheritance, from whence issues that little praise and worship that he receives from this lower world; and wilt thou suffer thine own servants and tenants to be thus abused?

4. They plead that they had had but a short enjoyment of the land of promise, and the privileges of the sanctuary; ver. 18, "The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little while." From Abraham to David was but fourteen generations, and from David to the captivity but fourteen more, Mat. i. 17; and that was but a little while, in comparison with what might have been expected from the promise of the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, Gen. xvii. 8, and from the power that was put forth to bring them into that land, and settle them in it. Though we are "the people of thy holiness," distinguished from other people, and consecrated to thee, yet we are soon dislodged. But this they might thank themselves for; they were in profession the people of God's holiness, but it was their wickedness that turned them out of the possession of that land.

5. They plead, that those who had, and kept possession of their land, were such as were strangers to God, such as he had no service or honour from: "Thou never barest rule over them," nor did they ever yield thee any obedience. "They were not called by thy name," but profess relation to other gods, and were the worshippers of them. Will God suffer those that stand in no relation to him, to trample upon those that do? Some give another reading of this: We are become as those whom thou didst never bear rule over, nor were ever called by thy name. We are rejected and abandoned, despised and trampled upon, as if we never had been in thy service, nor had thy name called upon us. Thus the shield of Saul was vilely cast away, as though he had not been anointed with oil. But the covenant, that seems to be forgotten, shall be remembered again.

CHAPTER LXIV.

This chapter goes on with that pathetical, pleading prayer, which the church offered up to God in the latter part of the foregoing chapter. They had argued from their covenant relation to God, and his interest and concern in them; now here, I. They pray that God would appear in some remarkable surprising manner for them, against his and their enemies, ver. 1, 2. II. They plead what God had formerly done, and was always ready to do for his people, ver. 3—5. III. They confess themselves to be sinful, and unworthy of God's favour, and that they had deserved the judgments they were now under, ver. 6, 7. IV. They refer themselves to the mercy of God as a Father, and submit themselves to his sovereignty, ver. 8. V. They represent the very deplorable condition they were in, and earnestly pray for the pardon of sin, and the turning away of God's anger, ver. 9—12. And this was not only intended for the use of the captive Jews, but may serve for direction to the church in other times of distress, what to ask of God, and how to plead with him. Are God's people at any time in affliction, in great affliction? Let them pray, let them thus pray.

OH that thou wouldest rend the heavens, that thou wouldest come down,
That the mountains might flow down at thy presence,
2 As when the melting fire burneth,
The fire causeth the waters to boil,

GREAT GEYSERS OF ICELAND.

To make thy name known to thine adversaries,
That the nations may tremble at thy presence!
3 When thou didst terrible things which we looked not for,
Thou camest down, the mountains flowed down at thy presence.
4 For since the beginning of the world men have not heard,
Nor perceived by the ear,
Neither hath the eye seen, O God, beside thee,
What he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him.
5 Thou meetest him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness,
Those that remember thee in thy ways:
Behold, thou art wroth; for we have sinned:
In those is continuance, and we shall be saved.

Here, First. The petition is, that God would appear wonderfully for them now, ver. 1, 2. Their case was represented in the close of the foregoing chapter as very sad, and very hard; and in this case it was time to cry, Help, Lord; O that God would manifest his zeal and his strength. They had prayed, ch. lxiii. 15, that God would "look down from heaven;" here they pray that he would "come down" to deliver them, as he had said, Ex. iii. 8.

1. They desire that God would in his providence manifest himself both to them and for them. When God works some extraordinary deliverance for his people, he is said to shine forth, to shew himself strong; so here they pray that he would "rend the heavens," "and come down;" as when he delivered David he is said to bow the heavens and come down, Ps. xviii. 9; to display his power, and justice, and goodness, in an extraordinary manner, so as that all may take notice of them, and acknowledge them. This God's people desire and pray for, that they themselves having the satisfaction of seeing him, though his way be in the sea, others may be made to see him when his way is in the clouds. This is applicable to the second coming of Christ, when the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout. "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

2. They desire that he would vanquish all opposition, and that it might be made to give way before him; that "the mountains might flow down at thy presence;" that the fire of thy wrath may burn so hot against thine enemies as even to dissolve the rockiest mountains, and melt them down before it, as metal in the furnace, which is made liquid, and cast into what shape the operator pleaseth; so the melting fire burns, ver. 1. Let things be put into a ferment, in order to a glorious revolution in favour of the church, as "the fire causeth the waters to boil." There is an allusion here, some think, to the volcanoes, or burning mountains, which sometimes send forth such sulphurous streams as make the adjacent rivers and seas to boil; which, perhaps, are left as sensible intimations of the power of God's wrath, and warning pieces of the final conflagration.

3. They desire that this may tend very much to the glory and honour of God; may make his name known, not only to his friends, they knew it before, and trusted in his power; but to his adversaries likewise, that they may know it, and tremble at his presence, and may say with the men of Bethshemesh, "Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? Who knows the power of his anger?" Note, Sooner or later God will make his name known to his adversaries, and force those to tremble at his presence that would not come and worship in his presence. God's name, if it be not a stronghold for us, into which we may run and be safe, will be a stronghold against us, out of the reach of which we cannot run and be safe. The day is come when nations shall be made to tremble at the presence of God, though they were never so numerous and strong.

Secondly. The plea is, that God had appeared wonderfully for his people formerly; and, Thou hast, therefore thou wilt, is good arguing at the throne of grace, Ps. x. 17.

1. They plead what he had done for his people Israel in particular, when he brought them out of Egypt, ver. 3. He then did terrible things in the plagues of Egypt, which they looked not for; they despaired of deliverance, so far were they from any thought of being delivered with such a high hand and outstretched arm. Then he came down upon mount Sinai, in such terror as made that and the adjacent mountains to flow down at his presence, to skip like rams, Ps. cxiv. 4; to tremble so that they were scattered, and the perpetual hills were made to bow, Hab. iii. 6. In the many great salvations God wrought for that people, he did terrible things which they looked not for; made great men, that seemed as stately and strong as mountains, to fall before him, and great opposition to give way: see Jud. v. 4, 5; Ps. lxviii. 7, 8. Some refer this to the defeat of Sennacherib's powerful army, which was as surprising an instance of the Divine power as the melting down of rocks and mountains would be.

2. They plead what God had been used to do, and had declared his gracious purpose to do for his people in general. The provision that he has made for the safety and happiness of his people, even of all those that seek him, and serve him, and trust in him, is very rich, and very ready; so that they need not fear being either disappointed of it, for it is sure, or disappointed in it, for it is sufficient.

1st. It is very rich, ver. 4. Men have not heard nor seen what God hath prepared for those that wait for him. Observe the character of God's people: they are such as wait for him in the way of duty; wait for the salvation he hath promised and designed them; and where the happiness of his people is bound up, it is what God has prepared for them; what he hath designed for them in his counsel, and is in his providence and grace preparing for them, and preparing them for; what he hath done, or will do, so it may be read. Some of the Jewish doctors have understood this of the blessings reserved for the days of the Messiah, and to them the apostle applies these words; and others extend them to the glories of the world to come. It is all that goodness which God hath laid up for them that fear him, and wrought for them that trust in him, Ps. xxxi. 19. Of this it is here said, that "since the beginning of the world," in the most prying and inquisitive ages of it, men have not either by hearing or seeing, the two learning senses, come to the full knowledge of it. None have seen or heard, or can understand, but God himself, what the provision is that is made for the present and future felicity of holy souls. For, First. Much of it was concealed in former ages. They knew it not, because the unsearchable riches of Christ were hid in God; were hid from the wise and prudent; but in latter ages they were revealed by the Gospel; so the apostle applies this, 1 Cor. ii. 9; for it follows, ver. 10, "But God has revealed them unto us by his Spirit;" compare Rom. xvi. 25, 26, with Eph. iii. 9. That which men had not heard since the beginning of the world they should hear before the end of it; and at the end of it should see, when the veil shall be rent to introduce the glory that is yet to be revealed. God himself knew what he had in store for believers, but none knew besides him. Secondly. It cannot be fully comprehended by human understanding; no, not when it is revealed. It is spiritual, and refined from those ideas which our minds are most apt to receive in this world of sense; it is very great, and will far outdo the utmost of our expectations. Even the present peace of all believers, much more their future bliss, is such as passeth all conception and expression, Phil. iv. 7. None can comprehend it but God himself, whose understanding is infinite. Some give another reading of these words, referring the transcendency, not so much to lxiv. 10. This language refers, in its most obvious application, to the condition of Israel during the Babylonian captivity, or before effectual efforts had been made to remove its misfortunes. It has been justly observed that Jerusalem alone could not possibly be called "cities" in the plural, although Zion may be distinguished from Jerusalem, as a part from the whole. Hence we prefer the view of those who think the holy cities intended are those of the land in general, so far as they had been laid waste.

lxv. 1, 2. These verses are quoted by St. Paul, in Rom. x. 20, 21, as evidence for the predicted calling of the Gentiles, and alienation of Israel. The apostle's quotation there agrees with the Septuagint version here, copies of which differ in regard to the order of the two first clauses. They who are disposed to urge the literal sense of chap. lxiii. 17 and like texts would do well to remember passages like verse 2 here.

lxv. 3—5. In these verses there are allusions to several heathenish the work itself, as to the author of it; 'Neither hath the eye seen a God besides thee, which doth so (or hath done, or can do so) for him that waiteth for him.' We must infer from God's works of wondrous grace, as well as from his works of wondrous power, from the kind things as well as from the great things he doth, that there is no God like unto him, nor any among the sons of the mighty to be compared with him.

2nd. It is very ready; ver. 5, "Thou meetest him that rejoiceth, and worketh righteousness;" meetest him with that good which thou hast prepared for him, ver. 4, and dost not forget those that remember thee in thy ways. See here what communion there is between a gracious God and a gracious soul. First. What God expects from us, in order to our having communion with him. 1*st.* We must make conscience of doing our duty in every thing. We must work righteousness; must do that which is good, and which the Lord our God requires of us, and must do it well. 2*nd.* We must be cheerful in doing our duty. We must rejoice and work righteousness, must delight ourselves in God, and in his law; must be pleasant in his service, and sing at our work. God loves a cheerful giver, a cheerful worshipper; we must "serve the Lord with gladness." 3*rd.* We must conform ourselves to all the methods of his providence concerning us, and be suitably affected with them; must remember him in his ways, in all the ways wherein he walks, whether he walks towards us, or walks contrary to us. We must mind him, and make mention of him with thanksgiving, when his ways are ways of mercy, (in a day of prosperity be joyful,) with patience and submission when he contends with us,—In the way of thy judgments we have waited for thee; and in a day of adversity we must consider. Secondly. We are here told what we may expect from God, if we thus attend him in the way of duty; Thou meetest him that doth so. This speaks the friendship, and fellowship, and familiarity to which God admits them; he meets them to converse with them, to manifest himself to them, and to receive their addresses, Ex. xx. 24; xxix. 43. It notes likewise his freeness and forwardness in doing them good; he will prevent them with the blessings of his goodness, will rejoice to do good to them that rejoice in working righteousness, and wait to be gracious to those that wait for him. He meets his penitent people with a pardon, as the father of the prodigal met his returning son, Lu. xv. 20. He meets his praying people with an answer of peace, while they are yet speaking, ch. lxv. 24.

3. They plead the unchangeableness of God's favour, and the stability of his promise, notwithstanding the sins of his people, and his displeasure against them for their sins; Behold, thou hast many a time been wroth with us, because we have sinned, and we have been under the tokens of thy wrath; but in those, those ways of thine, thy ways of mercy in which we have remembered thee, "in those is continuance;" or, in those thou art ever, (his mercy endureth for ever,) and therefore we shall at last be saved, though thou art wroth, and we have sinned. This agrees with the tenor of God's covenant, that if we forsake the law he will chasten our transgression with a rod, but his lovingkindness he will not utterly take away; his covenant he will not break, Ps. lxxxix. 30, &c.; and by this his people have been many a time saved from ruin when they were just upon the brink of it: see Ps. lxxviii. 38. And by this continuance of the covenant we hope to be saved; for its being an everlasting covenant is all our salvation. Though God has been angry with us for our sins, and justly, yet his anger has endured but for a moment, and has been soon over; but in his favour is life, because in it is continuance; in the ways of his favour he proceeds and perseveres, and on that we depend for salvation: see ch. liv. 7, 8. It is well for us that our hopes of salvation are built not upon any merit or sufficiency of our own, for in that there is no certainty, (even Adam in innocency did not abide,) but upon God's mercies and promises; for in those we are sure is continuance.

6 But we are all as an unclean thing,
And all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags;
And we all do fade as a leaf;
And our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away.
7 And there is none that calleth upon thy name,
That stirreth up himself to take hold of thee:
For thou hast hid thy face from us,
And hast consumed us, because of our iniquities.
8 But now, O LORD, thou art our father;
We are the clay, and thou our potter;
And we all are the work of thy hand.
9 Be not wroth very sore, O LORD,
Neither remember iniquity for ever:
Behold, see, we beseech thee, we are all thy people
10 Thy holy cities are a wilderness,
Zion is a wilderness, Jerusalem a desolation.
11 Our holy and our beautiful house,
Where our fathers praised thee,
Is burned up with fire:
And all our pleasant things are laid waste.
12 Wilt thou refrain thyself for these things, O LORD?
Wilt thou hold thy peace, and afflict us very sore?

As we have the lamentations of Jeremiah, so here we have the lamentations of Isaiah; the subject of both is the same, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and the sin of Israel that brought that destruction, only with this difference—Isaiah sees it at a distance, and laments it by the spirit of prophecy; Jeremiah saw it accomplished. In these verses,

First. The people of God in their affliction confess and bewail their sins, thereby justifying God in their afflictions, owning themselves unworthy of his mercy, and thereby both improving their troubles and preparing for deliverance. Now they were under Divine rebukes for sin, they had nothing to trust to but the mere mercy of God, and the continuance of that; for among themselves there is none to help, none to uphold, none to stand in the gap, and make intercession; for they are all polluted with sin, and therefore unworthy to intercede; all careless and remiss in duty, and therefore unable and unfit to do it.

1. There was a general corruption of manners among them; ver. 6, "We are all as an unclean thing;" or, as an unclean person, as one overspread with a leprosy, that was to be shut out of the camp. The body of the people were like one under a ceremonial pollution, that was not admitted into the courts of the tabernacle, or like one labouring under some loathsome disease, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, nothing but wounds and bruises, ch. i. 6. We are all by sin become not only obnoxious to God's justice, but odious to his holiness; for sin is that abominable thing which the Lord hates, and cannot endure to look upon. Even "all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags;" that is, 1st. The best of our persons are so. We are all so corrupt and polluted, that even those among us who pass for righteous men, in comparison with what our fathers were, that rejoiced and wrought righteousness, ver. 5, are but as filthy rags, fit to be cast to the dunghill. The best of them is as a briar. 2nd. The best of our performances are so. There is not only a general corruption of manners, but in devotion too; those which pass for the sacrifices of righteousness, when they come to be inquired into, are the torn, and the lame, and the sick; and therefore are provoking to God, as nauseous as filthy rags. Our performances, though they be never so plausible, if we depend upon them as our righteousness, and think to merit by them at God's hand, they are as filthy rags; rags, and will not cover us; filthy rags, and will but defile us. True penitents cast away their idols as filthy rags, ch. xxx. 22, odious in their sight; here they acknowledge even their righteousness to be so in God's sight, if he should deal with them in strict justice. Our best duties are so defective, and so far short of the rule, that they are as rags, and so full of sin and corruption cleaving to them, that they are as filthy rags. When we would do good, evil is present with us; and the iniquity of our holy things would be our ruin if we were under the law.

2. There was a general coldness of devotion among them, ver. 7. The measure was filled by the abounding iniquity of the people, and nothing was done to empty it. 1st. Prayer was in a manner neglected. "There is none that calleth upon thy name," none that seeks to thee for grace to reform us, and take away sin; or for mercy to relieve us, and take away the judgments which our sins have brought upon us. Therefore people are so bad, because they do not pray: compare Ps. xiv. 3, 4, they are "altogether become filthy," for "they call not upon the Lord." It bodes ill to a people when prayer is restrained among them. 2nd. It was very negligently performed. If there was here and there one that called on God's name, it was with a great deal of indifferency. There is none that stirreth up himself to take hold of God. Note, First. To pray is to take hold of God, by faith to take hold of the promises, and the declarations God has made of his good-will to us, and to plead them with him; to take hold of him as of one who is about to depart from us, earnestly begging of him not to leave us; or of one that is departed, soliciting his return; to take hold of him as he that wrestles takes hold of him he wrestles with; for the seed of Jacob wrestle with him and so prevail. But when we take hold on God, it is as the boatman with his hook takes hold on the shore, as if he would pull the shore to him, but really it is to pull himself to the shore; so we pray, not to bring God to our mind, but to bring ourselves to his. Secondly. Those that would take hold of God in prayer, so as to prevail with him, must stir up themselves to do it. All that is within us must be employed in the duty, and all little enough; our thoughts fixed, and our affections flaming. And in order hereunto, all that is within us must be engaged, and summoned into the service; we must stir up the gift that is in us, by an actual consideration of the importance of the work that is before us, and a close application of mind towards it. But how can we expect God should come to us in ways of mercy, when there are none that do this; when those that profess to be intercessors are mere triflers?

Secondly. They acknowledge their afflictions to be the fruit and product of their own sins and God's wrath.

1. They brought their troubles upon themselves by their own folly. "We are all as an unclean thing," and therefore we do all fade away as a leaf, ver. 6; we not only wither and lose our beauty, but we fall and drop off, so the word signifies, as leaves in autumn. Our profession of religion withers, and we grow dry and sapless; our prosperity withers, and comes to nothing. We fall to the ground, as despicable and contemptible; and then "our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away," and hurried us into captivity, as the winds in autumn blow off, and then blow away, the faded, withered leaves, Ps. i. 3, 4. Sinners are blasted, and then carried away by the malignant and violent wind of their own iniquity; it withers them, and then ruins them.

2. God brought their troubles upon them by his wrath; ver. 7, "Thou hast hid thy face from us," that is, been displeased with us, and refused to afford us any succour. When they made themselves as an unclean thing, no wonder that God turned his face away from them as loathing them. Yet this was not all; Thou "hast consumed us, because of our iniquities." This is the same complaint with that, Ps. xc. 7, 8, "We are consumed by thine anger." Thou hast melted us, so the word is. God had them in the furnace, not to consume them as dross, but to melt them as gold, that they might be refined and new cast.

Thirdly. They claim relation to God as their God, and humbly plead it with him, and, in consideration of it, cheerfully refer themselves to him; ver. 8, "But now, O Lord, thou art our Father." Though we have carried it very undutifully and ungratefully towards thee, yet still we have owned thee as our Father: and, though thou hast corrected us, yet thou hast not cast us off. Foolish and careless as we are, poor and despised, and trampled upon as we are by our enemies, yet still thou art our Father. To thee, therefore, we return in our repentance, as the prodigal arose and came to his father; to thee we apply ourselves by prayer. From whom should we expect relief and succour but from our Father? It is the wrath of a Father that we are under, who will be reconciled, and not keep his anger for ever. God is their Father, 1. By creation. He gave them their being, formed them into a people, shaped them as he pleased; "We are the clay, and thou our potter;" therefore we will not quarrel with thee, however thou art pleased to deal with us, Jer. xviii. 6. Nay, therefore, we will hope that thou wilt deal well with us, that thou who madest us wilt new make us, new form us, though we have unmade and formed ourselves. "We are all as an unclean thing," but "we are all the work of thy hands;" therefore do away our uncleanness, that we may be fit for thy use, the use we were made for. We are the work of thy hands, therefore forsake us not, Ps. cxxxviii. 8. 2. By covenant. This is pleaded ver. 9, "Behold, see, we beseech thee, we are all thy people," all the people thou hast in the world, that make open profession of thy name. We are all called thy people; so our neighbours look upon us, and therefore what we suffer reflects upon thee, and the relief that our case requires is expected from thee. We are thy people; and "should not a people seek unto their God?" ch. viii. 19. We are thine, save us, Ps. cxix. 94. Note, When we are under providential rebukes from God, it is good to keep fast hold of our covenant relation to him.

Fourthly. They are importunate with God for the turning away of his anger, and the pardoning of their sins; ver. 9, "Be not wrath very sore, O Lord," though we have deserved thou shouldest, "neither remember iniquity for ever" against us. They do not expressly pray for the removal of the judgment they were under; as to that they refer themselves to God; but, 1. They pray that God would be reconciled to them, and then they can be easy, whether the affliction be continued or removed; Be not wroth to extremity, but let thine anger be mitigated by the clemency and compassion of a father. They do not practices into which the Israelites had fallen:—1. Sacrificing in gardens: this is referred to in chap. i. 29; lvii. 5; lxvi. 17. 2. Burning incense upon altars of brick: in the law, altars of earth and of unwrought stones were enjoined. 3. Sitting in sepulchres, or among sepulchres: some think this was in order to sacrifice to the dead; but it may have been to sacrifice for the dead, or to practice necromancy by alleged interviews with departed spirits. 4. Lodging in monuments: the so-called monuments are by some thought to have been secret recesses, caves, or vaults, but others suppose they were solitary watch-towers devoted to idolatrous rites where the devotees passed the night. Jerome explains it of idol temples, where they lay down upon the skins of animals offered in sacrifice, in order to learn the future from their dreams. 5. Eating swine's flesh: this was expressly forbidden by the law. 6. Broth of abominations: the word for "broth" may mean "pieces," as the margin intimates. The precise sense of the whole expression is say, Lord, rebuke us not, for that may be necessary, but, Not in thine anger, not in thy hot displeasure. It is but in a little wrath that God hides his face. 2. They pray that they may not be dealt with according to the desert of their sin; "Neither remember iniquity for ever." Such is the evil of sin, that it deserves to be remembered for ever; and this is that which they deprecate, that consequence of sin which is for ever. Those make it to appear they are truly humbled under the hand of God that are more afraid of the terror of God's wrath, and the fatal consequences of their own sin, than of any judgment whatsoever, looking upon these as the sting of death.

Fifthly. They lodge in the court of heaven a very melancholy representation or memorial of the lamentable condition they were in, and the ruins they were groaning under.

1. Their own houses were in ruins, ver. 10. The cities of Judah were destroyed by the Chaldeans, and the inhabitants of them were carried away, so that there was none to repair them or take any notice of them, which would in a few years make them look like perfect deserts, "Thy holy cities are a wilderness." The cities of Judah are called holy cities, for the people were unto God a kingdom of priests. The cities had synagogues in them, in which God was served, and therefore they lamented the ruins of them, and insisted upon this in pleading with God for them; not so much that they were stately cities, rich or ancient ones, but they are holy cities, cities in which God's name is known, professed, and called upon. These cities are a wilderness, the beauty of them is sullied, they are neither inhabited nor visited, as formerly; "They have burnt up all the synagogues of God in the land," Ps. lxxiv. 8. Nor was it only the lesser cities that were thus left as a wilderness unfrequented, but even "Zion is a wilderness," the city of David itself lies in ruins. Jerusalem, that was beautiful for situation, and the joy of the whole earth, is now deformed, and is become the scorn and scandal of the whole earth; that noble city is a desolation, a heap of rubbish. See what devastations sin brings upon a people, and an external profession of sanctity will be no fence against them. Holy cities, if they become wicked cities, will be soonest of all turned into a wilderness, Am. iii. 2.

2. God's house was in ruins, ver. 11. This they lament most of all, that the temple was burnt with fire; but as soon as it was built they were told what their sin would bring it to, 2 Chr. vii. 21, "This house, which is high, shall be an astonishment." Observe how pathetically they bewail the ruins of the temple. 1st. It was their holy and beautiful house. It was a most sumptuous building, but the holiness of it was, in their eye, the greatest beauty of it; and consequently the profanation of it was the saddest part of its desolation, and that which grieved them most, that the sacred services that used to be performed there were discontinued. 2nd. It was the place where their fathers praised God with their sacrifices and songs. What pity is it that that should lie in ashes which had been for so many ages the glory of their nation! It aggravated their present disuse of the songs of Zion that their fathers had so often praised God with them. They interest God in the cause when they plead it was the house where he had been praised, and put him in mind, too, of his covenant with their fathers, by taking notice of their fathers' praising him. 3rd. With it all their pleasant things were laid waste. All their desires, their delights, all those things which were employed by them in the service of God, which they had a great delight in. Not only the furniture of the temple, the altars, and the table, but especially the sabbaths and new moons, and all their religious feasts, which they used to keep with gladness, their ministers and solemn assemblies, these were all a desolation. Note, God's people reckon their sacred things their most delectable things; rob them of holy ordinances and the means of grace, and you lay waste all their pleasant things. What have they more? Observe here how God and his people have their interests twisted and interchanged. When they speak of the cities for their own habitation they call them, "thy holy cities," for to thee we have dedicated them. When they speak of the temple wherein God dwelt they call it, "Our beautiful house," and its furniture, "Our pleasant things," for they had heartily espoused it, and all the interests of it. If thus we interest God in all our concerns by devoting them to his service, and interest ourselves in all his concerns by laying them near our hearts, we may with satisfaction leave both with him, for he will perfect both.

Sixthly. They conclude with an affectionate expostulation, humbly arguing with God concerning their present desolations; ver. 12, "Wilt thou refrain thyself for these things?" Or, Canst thou contain thyself at these things? Canst thou see thy temple ruined, and not resent it, not revenge it? Has the jealous God forgotten to be jealous? Ps. lxxiv. 22, "Arise, O God, plead thine own cause." Lord, thou art insulted, thou art blasphemed, and "wilt thou hold thy peace," and take no notice of it? Shall the highest affronts that can be done to heaven pass unrebuked? When we are abused we hold our peace, because vengeance doth not belong to us, and because we have a God to refer our cause to. When God is injured in his honour it may justly be expected he should speak in the vindication of it. His people prescribe not to him what he shall say, but their prayer is, as here, Ps. lxxxiii. 1, "Keep not thou silence, O God;" and Ps. cix. 1, "Hold not thy peace, O God of my praise." Speak for the conviction of thine enemies, speak for the comfort and relief of thy people; for wilt thou afflict us very sore, or afflict us for ever? as it may be read. It is a sore affliction to good people to see God's sanctuary laid waste, and nothing done towards the raising of it out of its ruins. But God hath said he will not contend for ever, and therefore his people may depend upon it that their afflictions shall be neither to extremity nor to eternity, but light, and for a moment.

CHAPTER LXV.

We are now drawing towards the conclusion of this evangelical prophecy; the two last chapters of which direct us to look as far forwards as the new heavens and the new earth, the new world which the gospel dispensation should bring in; and the separation that should by it be made between the precious and the vile: For judgment, saith Christ, am I come into this world. And why should it seem absurd, that the prophet here should speak of that, to which all the prophets bare witness, 1 Pet. i. 10, 11. The rejection of the Jews, and the calling in of the Gentiles, is often mentioned in the New Testament, as that which was foreseen and foretold by the prophets, Acts x. 43; xiii. 40; Rom. xvi. 26. In this chapter we have, I. The preventing of the Gentiles with the gospel call, ver. 1. II. The rejection of the Jews for their obstinacy and unbelief, ver. 2—7. III. The saving of a remnant of them, by bringing them into the gospel church, ver. 8—10. IV. The judgments of God that should pursue the rejected Jews, ver. 11—16. V. The blessings reserved for the Christian church, which should be its joy and glory, ver. 17—25. But these things are here prophesied of under the type and figure of the difference God would make between some and others of the Jews after their return out of captivity, between those that feared God, and those that did not; with reproofs of the sins then found among them, and promises of the blessings then in reserve for them.

I AM sought of them that asked not for me;
I am found of them that sought me not:
I said, Behold me, behold me,

The apostle Paul, an expositor we may depend upon, hath given us the true sense of these verses, and told us what was the event they pointed at and were fulfilled in, namely, the calling in of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews, by the preaching of the Gospel, Rom. x. 20, 21; and he observes that herein Esaias is very bold, not only in foretelling a thing so incredible and improbable ever to be brought about, but in foretelling it to the Jews, who would take it as a mighty affront to their nation, and therein Moses' words would be made good, Deu. xxxii. 21; "I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people."

First. It is here foretold that the Gentiles that had been afar off should be made nigh, ver. 1. Paul reads it thus, "I was found of them that sought me not, I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me." Observe what a wonderful and blessed change was made with them, and how they were surprised into it. 1. Those that had long been without God in the world shall now be set on seeking him, that had not said, Where is God my Maker? shall now begin to inquire after him. Neither they nor their fathers had called upon his name, but either lived without prayer or prayed to stocks and stones, the work of men's hands. But now they shall be baptized, and call on the name of the Lord, Acts ii. 21. With what pleasure doth the great God here speak of his being sought unto. And how doth he glory in it, especially by those that in time past had not asked for him! For there is joy in heaven over great sinners that repent. 2. God shall prevent their prayers with his blessings; "I am found of them that sought me not." This happy acquaintance and correspondence between God and the Gentile world began on his side; they came to know God because they were known of him, Gal. iv. 9, to seek God and find him, because they were first sought and found of him. Though in after communion God is found of those that seek him, Pr. viii. 17, yet in the first conversion he is found of those that seek him not, for therefore we love him, because he first loved us. The design of the bounty of common providence to them was, that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him and find him, Acts xvii. 27. But they sought him not; still he was to them an unknown God, and yet God was found of them. 3. God gave them the advantages of a Divine revelation which had never made a profession of obscure, but it seems to be that they knowingly ate things which had been offered to idols. 7. False ideas of holiness: men steeped in paganism fancied themselves holier than others, probably without regard to real excellence of character, and certainly in defiance of the divine law. Thus far this terrible indictment.

lxv. 7. Idolatrous worship was very often celebrated upon hills and mountains, and such worship is here signified.

lxv. 10. Sharon here is usually understood of the rich district which lies near the Mediterranean, between Carmel and Joppa. There seems, however, to have been another Sharon on the east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 16; xxvii. 29), famous as a pasture-ground. A similar name occurs in the ancient Moabite inscription. It is, then, possible that the eastern Sharon is meant here. Achor was a valley west of the Jordan, near Jericho. It was the place where Achan was put to death, and received the name of Achor, or "trouble," at that time.

religion; "I said, Behold me, behold me;" gave them a sight of me, and invited them to take the comfort and benefit of it, who were "not called by my name," as the Jews for many ages had been. When the apostles went about from place to place preaching the Gospel, this was the substance of what they preached, Behold God, behold him! turn towards him, fix the eyes of your minds upon him, acquaint yourselves with him, admire him, adore him; look off your idols that you have made, and look upon the living God that made you. Christ in them said, Behold me, behold me with an eye of faith; look unto me, and be ye saved. And this was said to those that had long been Lo-ammi and Lo-ruhamah, Hos. i. 8, 9, not a people; and that had not obtained mercy, Rom. ix. 25, 26.

Secondly. It is here foretold that the Jews, that had long been a people near to God, should be cast off and set at a distance, ver. 2. The apostle applies this to the Jews in his time, as a seed of evil-doers, Rom. x. 21, "But to Israel he saith, All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people." Where observe, 1. How the Jews were courted to the Divine grace. God himself, by his prophets, by his Son, by his apostles, stretched forth his hand to them, as Wisdom did, Pr. i. 24. God spread out his hands to them, as one reasoning and expostulating with them; not only beckoned to them with the finger, but spread out his hands, as being ready to embrace and entertain them, reaching forth the tokens of his favour to them, and importuning them to accept of them. When Christ was crucified, his hands were spread out and stretched forth, as if he were preparing to receive returning sinners into his bosom. And this all the day, all the gospel day; he waited to be gracious, and was not weary of waiting: even those that came in at the eleventh hour of the day were not rejected. 2. How they contemned the invitation. It was given to a rebellious and gainsaying people; they were bidden to the wedding supper, and would not come, but rejected the counsel of God against themselves. Now here we have,

1. The bad character of this people. The world shall see it is not for nothing that they are rejected of God; no, it is for their whoredoms that they are put away. Their character in general is such as one would not expect them to deserve that had been so much the favourites of heaven. 1st. They were very wilful. Right or wrong, they would do as they had a mind. They generally walk on in a way that is not good, not the right way, nor a safe way, for they walk after their own thoughts, their own devices and desires. If our guide be our own thoughts, our way is not likely to be good; for every imagination of the thought of our heart is only evil. God had told them his thoughts, what his mind and will was; but they would walk after their own thoughts, would do what they thought best. 2nd. They were very provoking. This was God's complaint of them all along; they grieved him, they vexed his Holy Spirit, as if they would contrive how to make him their enemy; They provoke me "to anger continually to my face." They cared not what affront they gave to God, though it were in his sight and presence, in a downright contempt of his authority and defiance of his justice; and this continually. It had been their way and manner ever since they were a people; witness the day of temptation in the wilderness. The prophet speaks more particularly of their iniquities and the iniquities of their fathers, as the ground of God's casting them off, ver. 7. Now he gives instances of both, First. The most provoking iniquity of their fathers was idolatry. This the prophet tells them was provoking to God, to his face; and it is an iniquity which, as appears by the second commandment, God often visits upon the children. This was the sin that brought them into captivity; and though the captivity pretty well cured them of it, yet, when the final ruin of that nation came, that was again brought into the account against them, for in the day when God visits he will visit that, Ex. xxxii. 34. Perhaps there were many, long after the captivity, who, though they did not worship other gods, yet were guilty of the disorders here mentioned, for they married strange wives. 1*st.* They forsook God's temple, and sacrificed in gardens or groves, that they might have the satisfaction of doing it in their own way, for they liked not God's institutions. 2*nd.* They forsook God's altar, and burnt incense upon bricks, altars of their own contriving. They burnt incense according to their own inventions, which were of no more value in comparison with God's institution than an altar of bricks in comparison with the golden altar, which God appointed them to burn incense on; or upon tiles, (so some read it,) such as they covered their flat-roofed houses with, and on them sometimes they burnt incense to their idols, as appears, 2 Kin. xxiii. 12, where we read of altars "on the top of the upper chamber of Ahaz;" and, Jer. xix. 13, of their burning incense to the host of heaven upon the roofs of their houses. 3*rd.* They use necromancy, or consulting with the dead, and in order to that they "remain among the graves," and "lodge in the monuments," to seek for the living to the dead, ch. v. 19, as the witch of Endor. Or, they used to consult the evil spirits that haunted the sepulchres. 4*th.* They violated the laws of God about their meat, and broke through the distinction between clean and unclean, before it was taken away by the Gospel; they "eat swine's flesh." Some, indeed, chose rather to die than to do it, as Eleazar and the seven brethren, in the story of the Maccabees; but it is likely many did, especially when it came to be a test for their lives. In our Saviour's time we read of a vast herd of swine among them, which gives us cause to suspect that there were many then who made so little conscience of the law as to eat swine's flesh, for which they were justly punished in the destruction of the swine. And the broth, or pieces of other forbidden meats, called here abominable things, was in their vessels, and made use of for food. The forbidden meat is called an abomination, and they that meddle with it are said to make themselves abominable, Lev. xi. 42, 43. Those that durst not eat the meat yet made bold with the broth, because they would come as near as might be to that which was forbidden, to shew how they coveted the forbidden fruit. Perhaps this is here put figuratively for all forbidden pleasures and profits which are obtained by sin, that abominable thing which the Lord hates; they loved to be dallying with it, to be tasting of its broth. But those who thus take a pride in venturing upon the borders of sin and the brink of it are in danger of falling into the depths of it. But, Secondly. The most provoking iniquity of the Jews in our Saviour's time was, their pride and hypocrisy, that sin of the scribes and Pharisees, against which Christ denounced so many woes, ver. 5. They say, "Stand by thyself," keep off; get thee to thine, (so the original is;) keep to thy own companions; but "come not near to me," lest thou pollute me. Touch me not, I will not allow thee any familiarity with me, "for I am holier than thou," and therefore thou art not good enough to converse with me; "I am not as other men are, nor even as this publican." This they were ready to say to every one they met with; so that in saying, "I am holier than thou," they thought themselves holier than any; not only very good, as good as they should be, as good as they needed to be, but better than any of their neighbours. "These are a smoke in my nose," saith God; such a smoke as comes not from a quick fire, which soon becomes glowing and pleasant, but from a fire of wet wood, that burns all the day, and is nothing but smoke. Note, Nothing in men is more odious and offensive to God than a proud conceit of themselves and contempt of others, for commonly those are most unholy of all that think themselves holier than any.

2. The controversy God had with them for this. The proof against them is plain, "Behold, it is written before me," ver. 6. It is written to be remembered against them in time to come, for they may not perhaps be presently reckoned with. The sins of sinners, and particularly the vain-glorious boasts and scorns of hypocrites, are laid up in store with God, Deu. xxxii. 34. And what is written shall be read and proceeded upon; "I will not keep silence" always, though I may keep silence long. They shall not think him altogether such a one as themselves, as sometimes they have done, but he "will recompense, even recompense into their bosom." Those basely abuse religion, that honourable and sacred thing, who make their profession of it the matter of their pride; and the jealous God will reckon with them for it; the profession they boast of shall but serve to aggravate their condemnation. 1st. The iniquity of their fathers shall come against them. Not but that their own sin deserved whatever judgments God brought upon them, and much heavier, and they owned it, Ezr. ix. 13; but God would not have wrought so great a desolation upon them, if he had not therein had an eye to the sins of their fathers. Therefore in the last destruction of Jerusalem God is said to bring upon them the blood of the Old Testament martyrs, even that of Abel, Mat. xxiii. 35. God will reckon with them not only for their fathers' idols, but for their high places, their burning incense upon the mountains and the hills, though perhaps it was to the true God only. This was blaspheming or reproaching God: it was a reflection upon the choice he had made of the place where he would record his name, and the promise he had made, that there he would meet them and bless them. 2nd. Their own, with that, shall bring ruin upon them. "Your iniquities and the iniquities of your fathers together," the one aggravating the other, is the former work, which, though it may seem to be overlooked and forgotten, shall be measured into their bosom. God will render into the bosom not only of his open enemies, Ps. lxxix. 12, but of his false and treacherous friends, the reproach wherewith they have reproached him.

8 Thus saith the LORD,
As the new wine is found in the cluster,
And one saith, Destroy it not; for a blessing is in it:
So will I do for my servants' sakes, that I may not destroy them all.
9 And I will bring forth a seed out of Jacob,
And out of Judah an inheritor of my mountains:
And mine elect shall inherit it,
And my servants shall dwell there.
10 And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks, [in,
And the valley of Achor a place for the herds to lie down
For my people that have sought me.

This is expounded by St. Paul, Rom. xi. 1—5, where, when upon occasion of the rejection of the Jews, it is asked, "Hath God then cast away his people?" he answers, No; for "at this time there is a remnant according to the election of grace." This prophecy has reference to that distinguished remnant. When that hypocritical nation is to be destroyed, God will separate and secure to himself some from among them; some of the Jews shall be brought to embrace the Christian faith, shall be added to the church, and so be saved. And our Saviour hath told us, that for the sake of these elect the days of the destruction of the Jews should be shortened, and a stop put to the desolation, which otherwise would have proceeded to that degree that no flesh should be saved, Mat. xxiv. 22. Now,

First. This is illustrated here by a comparison, ver. 8. When a vine is so blasted and withered that there seems to be no sap or life in it, and therefore the dresser of the vineyard is in a mind to pluck it up, or cut it down; yet if never so little of the juice of the grape, fit to make new wine, be found, though but in one cluster, a stander-by interposeth, and saith, "Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it;" there is life in the root, and hopes that yet it may become good for something. Note, Good men are blessings to the places where they live; and sometimes God spares whole cities and nations for the sake of a few such in them. How ambitious should we be of this honour, not only to be distinguished from others, but serviceable to others!

Secondly. Here is a description of those that shall make up this saved, saving remnant. 1. They are such as serve God. It is for "my servants' sake," ver. 8; and they are my servants that shall dwell there, ver. 9. God's faithful servants, however they are looked upon, are the best friends their country hath; and those who serve him therein serve their generation. 2. They are such as seek God; that make it the end of their lives to glorify God, and the business of their lives to call upon him. It is "for my people that have sought me." They that seek God shall find him, and shall find him their bountiful rewarder.

Thirdly. Here is an account of the mercy God hath in store for them. The remnant that shall return out of captivity shall have a happy settlement again in their own land, and that by an hereditary right, as "a seed out of Jacob," in whom the family is kept up, and the entail preserved, and from whom, as from the seed sown, shall spring a numerous increase; and these typify the remnant of Jacob that shall be incorporated into the gospel church by faith. 1. They shall have a good portion for themselves. They shall inherit my mountains, the holy mountains on which Jerusalem and the temple were built; or, the mountains of Canaan, the land of promise, typifying the covenant of grace, which all God's servants, his elect, both inhabit and inherit; they make it their refuge, their rest, and residence; so they dwell in it, are at home in it; and they have taken it to be their heritage for ever, and it shall be to them an inheritance incorruptible. God's chosen, the spiritual seed of praying Jacob, shall be the inheritors of his mountains of bliss and joy, and shall be carried safe to them through the vale of tears. 2. They shall have a green pasture for their flocks; ver. 10, Sharon and the valley of Achor shall again be as well replenished as ever they were with cattle. Sharon lay westward near Joppa, Achor lay eastward near Jordan; which intimates that they shall recover the possession of the whole land, that they shall have wherewith to stock it all, and that they shall peaceably enjoy it, and there shall be none to disturb them or make them afraid. Gospel ordinances are the fields and valleys where the sheep of Christ shall go in and out, and find pasture, Jno. x. 9; and where they are made to lie down, Ps. xxiii. 2, as Israel's herds in the valley of Achor, Hos. ii. 15.

11 But ye are they that forsake the LORD,
That forget my holy mountain,
That prepare a table for that troop,
And that furnish the drink offering unto that number.

lxv. 11. The translation of the words Gad and Meni here by "troop" and "number" is a very unhappy one, as they are no doubt the names of idols. Gad is Fortune, but not much is known respecting it. Some think it equivalent to the god Jupiter, while others identify it with Venus. There was a place called Baal-gad, and the Moabites had a Chemosh-gad. The explanation of Meni is also disputed. Fürst regards it as the goddess of fortune, and an epithet of the moon; but others think it was Venus. Preparing a table for Gad would be by setting food upon a table before the idol by way of an offering.

lxv. 20. Our translation here is literal enough, but the sense is obscure. The place referred to is Jerusalem, and the first clause may mean that in the happy time in prospect the infant shall not be removed by death in his infancy, nor the old man until he has reached the utmost limits of human life. The second clause would then mean that the child shall live on till he is a hundred years old,

12 Therefore will I number you to the sword,
And ye shall all bow down to the slaughter:
Because when I called, ye did not answer;
When I spake, ye did not hear;
But did evil before mine eyes,
And did choose that wherein I delighted not.
13 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD,
Behold, my servants shall eat, but ye shall be hungry:
Behold, my servants shall drink, but ye shall be thirsty:
Behold, my servants shall rejoice, but ye shall be ashamed:
14 Behold, my servants shall sing for joy of heart,
But ye shall cry for sorrow of heart,
And shall howl for vexation of spirit.
15 And ye shall leave your name for a curse unto my chosen:
For the Lord GOD shall slay thee,
And call his servants by another name:
16 That he who blesseth himself in the earth
Shall bless himself in the God of truth;
And he that sweareth in the earth
Shall swear by the God of truth;
Because the former troubles are forgotten,
And because they are hid from mine eyes.

Here the different states of the wicked and godly, of the Jews that believed, and of those that still persisted in unbelief, are set the one over against the other, as life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse.

First. Here is the fearful doom of those that persisted in their idolatry after their deliverance out of Babylon, and in infidelity after the preaching of the Gospel of Christ. The doom is the same upon both; ver. 12, "I will number you to the sword," as sheep for the slaughter, and there shall be no escaping, no standing out, you shall bow down to it. God's judgments come, 1st. Regularly, and are executed according to the commission. Those fall by the sword that are numbered or counted out to it, and none but they. Though the sword seems to devour promiscuously one as well as another, yet it is made to know its number, and shall not exceed. 2nd. Irresistibly. The strongest and most stout-hearted sinners shall be forced to bow before them; for none ever hardened their hearts against God and prospered. Now observe what the sins are that number them to the sword.

1. Idolatry was the ancient sin; ver. 11, "Ye are they that," instead of seeking me, and serving me as my people, "forsake the Lord," disown him, and cast him off to embrace other gods; "that forget my holy mountain," the privileges of that, and the obligations you lie under to that, to burn incense upon the mountains of your idols, ver. 7; and have deserted the only living and true God. They prepared a table for that troop of deities which the heathen worship, and pour out drink offerings to that numberless number of them; for they that thought one God too little never thought scores and hundreds enough, but were still adding to the number of them, till they had as many gods as cities, and their altars were as thick as "heaps in the furrows of the fields," Hos. xii. 11. Some take Gad and Meni, which we translate a troop and a number, to be the proper names of two of their idols, answering to Jupiter and Mercury. Whatever they were, their worshippers spared no cost to do them honour; they prepare a table for them, and filled out mixed wine for drink offerings to them; would pinch their families rather than stint their devotions, which should shame the worshippers of the true God out of their niggardliness.

2. Infidelity was the sin of the latter Jews; ver. 12, "When I called, ye did not answer," which refers to the same that ver. 2 did, "I have stretched out my hands to a rebellious people;" and that is applied to those who rejected the Gospel. Our Lord Jesus himself called; he "stood and cried," Jno. vii. 37, but they did not hear, they would not answer; they were not convinced by his reasonings, nor moved by his expostulations. Both the fair warnings he gave them of death and ruin, and the fair offers he made them of life and happiness, were slighted, and made no impression upon them. Yet this was not all; Ye "did evil before mine eyes," not by surprise, or through inadvertency, but with deliberation; ye "did choose that wherein I delighted not;" he means, which he did utterly detest and abhor. It is not strange that those who will not be persuaded to choose that which is good do persist in their choice and pursuit of that which is evil. See the malignity of sin, it is evil in God's eyes, highly offensive to him, and yet it is committed before his eyes, in his sight and presence, and in contempt of him. It is likewise a contradiction to the will of God; it is doing that of choice which we know will displease him.

Secondly. The aggravation of this doom, from the consideration of the happy state of those that were brought to repentance and faith. The blessedness of those that serve God, and the woful condition of those that rebel against him, are here set the one over against the other, that they may serve as a foil to each other, ver. 13—16. 1st. God's servants may well think themselves happy, and for ever indebted to that free grace that made them so, when they see how miserable some of their neighbours are for want of that grace, who are hardened, and likely to perish for ever in unbelief, and what a narrow escape they had of being among them: see ch. lxvi. 24. 2nd. It will add to the grief of those that perish to see the happiness of God's servants, whom they had hated and vilified, and looked upon with the utmost disdain: and especially to think that they might have shared in their bliss, if it had not been their own fault. It made the torment of the rich man in hell the more grievous that he saw "Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom," Lu. xvi. 23: see Lu. xiii. 28. Sometimes the providence of God makes such a difference as this between good and bad in this world; and the prosperity of the righteous becomes a grievous eyesore and vexation of heart to the wicked, Ps. cxii. 10; however, it will be so in the great day. "We fools counted his life madness, and his end without honour; but now, how is he numbered with the saints, and his lot is among the chosen!"

Now the difference of their states lies in two things:

1. In point of comfort and satisfaction. 1st. God's servants shall eat and drink. They shall have the bread of life to feed, to feast upon continually; shall be abundantly replenished with the goodness of his house, and shall want nothing that is good for them. Heaven's happiness will be to them an everlasting feast, they shall be filled with that which now they hunger and thirst after; but those who set their hearts upon the world, and place their happiness in that, shall be hungry and thirsty, always empty, always craving; for it is not bread,—it surfeits, but it satisfieth not. In communion with God, and dependence upon him, there is full satisfaction, but in sinful pursuits there is nothing but disappointment. 2nd. God's servants shall rejoice, and sing for joy of heart. They have constant cause for joy, and there is nothing that may be an occasion of grief to them, but they have an allay sufficient for it; and, as far as faith is in act and exercise, they have a heart to rejoice, and their joy is their strength. They shall rejoice in their hope, because it shall not make them ashamed. Heaven will be a world of everlasting joy to all that are now sowing in tears. But, on the other hand, they that forsake the Lord shut themselves out from all true joy, for they shall be ashamed of their vain confidence in themselves, and their own righteousness, and the hopes they had built thereon. When the expectations of bliss wherewith they had flattered themselves are frustrated, O what confusion will fill their faces! Then shall they "cry for sorrow of heart," and "howl for vexation of spirit," perhaps, in this world, when their laughter shall be turned into mourning, and their joy into heaviness; however, in that world where the torment will be endless, easeless, and remediless; nothing but weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth to eternity. Let these two be compared, "Now he is comforted, and thou art tormented;" and which of the two will we choose to take our lot with?

2. In point of honour and reputation, ver. 15, 16. "The memory of the just is" and shall be "blessed, but the name of the wicked shall rot." 1st. The name of the idolaters and unbelievers shall be left for a curse, shall be loaded with ignominy, and made for ever infamous. It shall be used in giving ill characters,—Thou art as cruel as a Jew; and in imprecations,—God make thee as miserable as a Jew. It shall be for a curse to God's chosen; that is, for a warning to them. They shall be afraid of falling under the curse upon the Jewish nation, of perishing by the same example of unbelief. The curse of those whom God rejects should make his chosen stand in awe. "The Lord God shall slay thee;" that is, shall quite extirpate the Jews, and cut them off from being a people; they shall no longer live as a nation, nor ever be incorporated again. 2nd. The name of God's chosen shall become a blessing; he shall "call his servants by another name." The children of the covenant shall no longer be called Jews, but Christians; and to them, under that name, all the promises and privileges of the new covenant shall be secured. This other name shall be an honourable name; it shall not be confined to one nation, but with it men shall bless themselves in the earth, that is, all the world over; God shall have servants out of all nations, that shall all be dignified with this new name. First. They shall give honour to God both in their prayers and in their solemn oaths, in their addresses for his favour as their felicity, and their appeals to his justice as their judge. This is a part of the homage we owe to God: we must bless ourselves in him; that is, we must reckon that we have enough to make us happy, that we need no more, and can desire no more, if we have him for our God. It is of great consequence what that is which we bless ourselves in, which we most please ourselves with, and value ourselves by our interest in. Worldly people bless themselves in the abundance they have of this world's goods, Ps. xlix. 18; Lu. xii. 19; but God's servants bless themselves in him, as a God all-sufficient for them. He is their crown of glory, and diadem of beauty, and their strength and portion; by him also they shall swear, and not by any creature or any false god. To his judgment they shall refer themselves from whom every man's judgment doth proceed. Secondly. They shall give honour to him as "the God of truth;" 'the God of the Amen,' so the word is. Some understand it of Christ, who is himself "the Amen, the faithful and true witness," Rev. iii. 14, and in whom all the promises are Yea and Amen, 2 Cor. i. 20. In him we must bless ourselves, and by him we must swear unto the Lord, and covenant with him. He that is blessed in the earth, (so some read it,) shall be blessed in the true God; for Christ is "the true God, and eternal life," 1 Jno. v. 20. And it was promised of old, that in him should all the families of the earth be blessed, Gen. xii. 3. Some read it, He shall bless himself in the God of the faithful people; in God, as the God of all believers; desiring no more but to share in the blessings wherewith they are blessed, to be dealt with as he useth to deal with them. Thirdly. They shall give him honour, as the author of this blessed change which they have the experience of. They shall think themselves happy in having him for their God, that has made them to forget their former troubles, the remembrance of them being swallowed up in their present comforts, because they are hid from God's eyes; that is, they are quite taken away; for if there were any remainder of their troubles, God would be sure to have his eye upon it, in compassion to them, and concern for them. They shall no longer feel them, for God will no longer see them. He is pleased to speak as if he would make himself easy by making them easy; and therefore they shall, with a great deal of satisfaction, bless themselves in him.

17 For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth:
And the former shall not be remembered,
Nor come into mind.
18 But be ye glad and rejoice for ever
In that which I create:
For, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing,
And her people a joy.
19 And I will rejoice in Jerusalem,
And joy in my people:
And the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her,
Nor the voice of crying.
20 There shall be no more thence an infant of days,
Nor an old man that hath not filled his days:
For the child shall die an hundred years old;
But the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed.
21 And they shall build houses, and inhabit them;
And they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them.
22 They shall not build, and another inhabit;

but that a bad man, though he lives to a century, will be accursed. We must omit other interpretations.

lxv. 25. This is justly regarded as metaphorical language. If any one expects the wolf to graze like a lamb, a lion to feed upon straw, and a serpent to eat dust, he must expect a miraculous change in their organisation and instincts, or, in other words, that the wolf, lion, and serpent will become something else. There are those, however, who still hold to a literal exposition, and reject the idea that the subjugation and mollifying of ferocious natures is intended. The mention of the serpent is, of course, an allusion to Gen. iii. 14.

lxvi. 3. The Hebrew here is very abrupt, and our translators have endeavoured to explain it by words in italics. More literally it is, "The slayer of an ox is the killer of a man; the sacrificer of a lamb is the breaker of a dog's neck; the offerer of an oblation is an offerer of a swine's blood; the burner of incense is the blesser of an idol." The general sense is, no doubt, that those who perform the sacrificial

They shall not plant, and another eat:
For as the days of a tree are the days of my people,
And mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands.
23 They shall not labour in vain,
Nor bring forth for trouble;
For they are the seed of the blessed of the LORD,
And their offspring with them.
24 And it shall come to pass,
That before they call, I will answer;
And while they are yet speaking, I will hear.
25 The wolf and the lamb shall feed together,
And the lion shall eat straw like the bullock:
And dust shall be the serpent's meat.
They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain,
Saith the LORD.

MOUNT MORIAH.

These promises, if they were in part fulfilled, when the Jews (after their return out of captivity) were settled in peace in their own land, and brought as it were into a new world, yet they were to have their full accomplishment in the gospel church, militant first, and at length triumphant. The "Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all." In the graces and comforts which believers have in and from Christ, we are to look for this new heaven and new earth. It is in the Gospel that old things are passed away, and all things are become new; and by it, that those that are in Christ are new creatures, 2 Cor. v. 17. It was a mighty and happy change that was described, ver. 16, that the former troubles were forgotten; but here it riseth much higher, even the former world shall be forgotten, and shall no more come into mind. They that were converted to the Christian faith were so transported with the comforts of it, that all the comforts they were before acquainted with became as nothing to them. Not only their foregoing griefs, but their foregoing joys, were lost and swallowed up in this. The glorified saints will therefore have forgotten this world, because they will be entirely taken up with the other. "For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth." See how inexhaustible the Divine power is. The same God that created one heaven and earth can create another. See how entire the happiness of the saints is. It shall be all of a piece; with the new heavens God will create them (if they have occasion for it to make them happy) a new earth too; The world is yours, if you be Christ's, 1 Cor. iii. 22. When God is reconciled to us, which gives us a new heaven, the creatures too are reconciled to us, which gives us a new earth. The future glory of the saints will be so entirely different from what they ever knew before, that it may well be called, "new heavens, and a new earth," 2 Pet. iii. 13. "Behold, I make all things new," Rev. xxi. 5.

First. There shall be new joys. For, 1. All the church's friends, and all that belong to her, shall rejoice, ver. 18. You shall "be glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create." The new things which God creates in and by his gospel are and shall be matter of everlasting joy to all believers. "My servants shall rejoice," ver. 13; at last they shall, though now they mourn. "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." 2. The church shall be the matter of their joy; so pleasant, so prosperous shall her condition be; "I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy." The church shall not only rejoice, but be rejoiced in; those that have sorrowed with the church shall rejoice with her. 3. The prosperity of the church shall be a rejoicing to God himself, who has pleasure in the prosperity of his servants, ver. 19. I will rejoice in Jerusalem's joy, and will joy in my people; for in all their afflictions he was afflicted. God will not only rejoice in the church's well-doing, but will himself rejoice to do her good, and rest in his love to her, Zeph. iii. 17. What God rejoiceth in it becomes us to rejoice in. 4. There shall be no allay of this joy nor any alteration of this happy condition of the church; "The voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her." If this relate to any state of the church in this life, it means no more but that the former occasions of grief shall not return, but God's people shall long enjoy an uninterrupted tranquillity. But in heaven it shall have full accomplishment, in respect both of the perfection and perpetuity of the promised joy; there all tears shall be wiped away.

Secondly. There shall be new life, ver. 20. Untimely deaths by the sword, or sickness shall be no more known as they have been; and by this means there shall be no more crying, ver. 19; when there shall be no more death, there shall be no more sorrow, Rev. xxi. 21. As death has reigned by sin, so life shall reign by righteousness, Rom. v. 14, 21. 1. Believers through Christ shall be satisfied with life, though it be never so short on earth. If an infant end its days quickly, yet it shall not be reckoned to die untimely; for the shorter its life is, the longer will its rest be. Though death reign over them that have not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, yet they, dying in the arms of Christ, the second Adam, and belonging to his kingdom, they are not to be called infants of days: but even the child shall be reckoned to "die a hundred years old," for he shall rise again at full age, shall rise to eternal life. Some understand it of children, that in their childhood are so eminent for wisdom and grace, and by death nipped in the blossom, that they may be said to die a hundred years old; and as for old men, it is promised, that they shall fill their days with the fruits of righteousness, which they still bring forth in old age, to shew that the Lord is upright; and then it is a good old age. An old man that is wise, and good, and useful, may truly be said to have filled his days. Old men that have their hearts upon the world, have never filled their days; never have enough of this world, but would still continue longer in it. But that man dies old, and 'full of days,' —satur dierum, that, with Simon, having seen God's salvation, desires now to depart in peace. 2. Unbelievers shall be unsatisfied, and unhappy in life, though it be never so long. "The sinner," though he live to be "a hundred years old, shall be accursed." His living so long shall be no token to him of the Divine favour and blessing; nor shall it be any shelter to him from the Divine wrath and curse. The sentence he lies under will certainly be executed, and his long life is but a long reprieve. Nay, it is itself a curse to him; for the longer he lives the more wrath he treasures up against the day of wrath, and will have the more sins to answer for. So that the matter is not great whether our lives on earth be long or short, but whether we live the lives of saints, or the lives of sinners.

Thirdly. There shall be a new enjoyment of the comforts of life. That, whereas before it was very uncertain and precarious, their enemies inhabited the houses which they built, and eat the fruit of the trees which they planted, now it shall be otherwise; they shall build houses and inhabit them, shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them, ver. 21, 22. This intimates that the labour of their hands shall be blessed, and be made to prosper They shall gain what they aimed at, and what they have gained shall be preserved and secured to them. They shall enjoy it comfortably, and nothing shall embitter it to them; and they shall live to enjoy it long. Strangers shall not break upon them, to expel them, and plant themselves in their room, as sometimes they have done. "Mine elect shall" wear out, or "long enjoy, the work of their hands;" it is honestly got, and it will wear well. It is the work of their hands, which they themselves have laboured for; and it is most comfortable to enjoy that, and not to eat the bread of idleness, or bread of deceit. If we have a heart to enjoy it, that is the gift of God's grace, Eccl. iii. 13; and if we live to enjoy it long, it is the gift of God's providence; for that is here promised, "As the days of a tree are the days of my people;" as the days of an oak, (ch. vi. 13,) whose substance is in it, though it cast its leaves. Though it be stripped every winter, it recovers itself again, and lasts many ages. 'As the days of the tree of life;' so the Seventy. Christ is to them the tree of life, and in him believers enjoy all those spiritual comforts which are typified by the abundance of temporal blessings here promised; and it shall not be in the power of their enemies to deprive them of these blessings, or disturb them in the enjoyment of them.

Fourthly. There shall be a new generation rising up in their stead, to inherit and enjoy these blessings; ver. 23, "They shall not labour in vain," for they shall not only enjoy the work of their hands themselves; but they shall leave it with satisfaction to those that shall come after them, and not with such a melancholy prospect as Solomon did, Eccl. ii. 18, 19. "They shall not beget and bring forth children for trouble; for they are themselves the seed of the blessed of the Lord," and there is a blessing entailed upon them by descent from their ancestors, which "their offspring with them" shall partake of, and shall be, as well as they, "the seed of the blessed of the Lord." They shall not bring forth for trouble; for, 1. God will make their children that rise up, comforts to them; they shall have the joy of seeing them walk in the truth. 2. He will make the times that come after comfortable to their children. As they shall be good, so it shall be well with them; they shall not be brought forth to days of trouble, nor shall it ever be said, Blessed is the womb that bore not. In the gospel church Christ's name shall be borne up by a succession; "a seed shall serve him," Ps. xxii. 30, "the seed of the blessed of the Lord."

Fifthly. There shall be a good correspondence between them and their God; ver. 34, Even "before they call, I will answer." God will prevent their prayers with the blessings of his goodness. David did but say, "I will confess," and God forgave, Ps. xxxii. 5. The father of the prodigal met him in his return. "While they are yet speaking," before they have finished their prayer, I will give them the thing they pray for, or the assurances and earnests of it. These are high expressions of God's readiness to hear prayer; and this appears much more in the grace of the Gospel than it did under the law; and we owe the comfort of it to the mediation of Christ as our Advocate with the Father, and are obliged in gratitude to give a ready ear to God's calls.

Sixthly. There shall be a good correspondence between them and their neighbours; ver. 25, "The wolf and the lamb shall feed together," as they did in Noah's ark. God's people, though they are as sheep in the midst of wolves, yet shall be safe and unhurt; for God will not so much break the power, and tie the hands of their enemies, as formerly, but will turn their hearts, will alter their disposition by his grace. When Paul, that had been a persecutor of the disciples, (that being of the tribe of Benjamin, ravened as a wolf, Gen. xlix. 27,) joined himself to them, and became one of them, then the wolf and the lamb fed together. So also, when the enmity between Jews and Gentiles was slain, all hostilities ceased, and they fed together as one sheepfold, under Christ the great Shepherd. Jno. x. 16. The enemies of the church ceased to do the mischief they had done, and its members ceased to be so quarrelsome with, and injurious to, one another as they had been; so that there was none, either from without or from within, to hurt or destroy,—none to disturb it, much less to ruin it, in all the holy mountain; as was promised, ch. xi. 9. For, 1. Men shall be changed. "The lion" shall no more be a beast of prey, (as perhaps he never would have been if sin had not entered,) but "shall eat straw like the bullock;" shall know his owner, and his master's crib, as the ox doth. When those that lived by spoil and rapine, and coveted to enrich themselves, right or wrong, are brought by the grace of God to accommodate themselves to their condition, to live by honest labour, and to be content with such things as they have—when they that stole steal no more, but work with their hands the thing that is good,—then this is fulfilled, that "the lion shall eat straw like the bullock." 2. Satan shall be chained, the dragon bound; "for dust shall be the serpent's meat" again. That great enemy, when he has been let loose, has glutted and regaled himself with the precious blood of saints, who, by his instigation, have been persecuted; and with the precious souls of sinners, who, by his instigation, have been persecutors, and have ruined themselves for ever; but now he shall be confined to dust, according to the sentence; "On thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat," Gen. iii. 14. All the enemies of God's church, that are subtle and venomous as serpents, shall be conquered and subdued, and be made to lick the dust. Christ shall reign as Zion's King, till all the enemies of his kingdom be made his footstool, and theirs too; and in the holy mountain above, there, and there only, shall this promise have its full accomplishment, that there shall be none to hurt or destroy.

actions described are as bad as if they did the other wicked or worthless things which are enumerated. The reason for this is not given, but it may be inferred from the latter part of the verse that religious acts are an abomination if only forms, and without holiness of heart and life. God is a spirit, and must be worshipped in spirit and in truth.

lxvi. 17. A difficult verse, and many explanations of it have been proposed. Instead of "in the gardens" some render "for the gardens;" i.e., they sanctify and purify themselves for the gardens in which their ungodly rites are performed (see chap. lxv. 3, 4). The next words, "behind one tree in the midst," are the most obscure and disputed. A very probable explanation is that they purify themselves after "some one" who is among them, the "some one" being a pagan priest or priestess, who leads in the rites which they perform. The "abomination," like the flesh of the swine and the mouse, was some ceremonially unclean food.

CHAPTER LXVI.

The scope of this chapter is much the same with that of the foregoing chapter, and many expressions the same; and therefore looks the same way, to the different state of the good and bad among the Jews, at their return out of captivity; but that typifying the rejection of the Jews in the days of the Messiah, the conversion of the Gentiles, and the setting up of the gospel kingdom in the world. The 1st verse of the chapter is applied by Stephen to the dismantling of the temple, by the planting of the Christian church, Acts vii. 49, 50, which may serve as a key to the whole chapter. We have here, I. The contempt God puts upon ceremonial services, in comparison with moral duties; and an intimation therein of his purpose shortly to put an end to the temple and sacrifice, and reject those that adhered to them, ver. 1—4. II. The salvation God will in due time work for his people, out of the hands of their oppressors, ver. 5; speaking terror to the persecutors, ver. 6, and comfort to the persecuted, a speedy and complete deliverance, ver. 7—9; a joyful settlement, ver. 10, 11; the accession of the Gentiles to them, and abundance of satisfaction therein, ver. 12—14. III. The terrible vengeance which God will bring upon the enemies of his church and people, ver. 15—18. IV. The happy establishment of the church upon large and sure foundations; its constant attendance on God, and triumph over its enemies, ver. 19—24. And we may well expect that this evangelical prophet, here, in the close of this prophecy, should (as he doth) look as far forward as to the latter days, to the last day, to the days of eternity.

THUS saith the LORD,
The heaven is my throne,
And the earth is my footstool:
Where is the house that ye build unto me?
And where is the place of my rest?
2 For all those things hath mine hand made,
And all those things have been, saith the LORD:
But to this man will I look,
Even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit,
And trembleth at my word
3 He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man;
He that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck;
He that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood;
He that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol.
Yea, they have chosen their own ways,
And their soul delighteth in their abominations
4 I also will choose their delusions,
And will bring their fears upon them;
Because when I called, none did answer;
When I spake, they did not hear:
But they did evil before mine eyes,
And chose that in which I delighted not.

Here, First. The temple is slighted in comparison with a gracious soul, ver. 1, 2. The Jews in the prophet's time, and afterwards in Christ's time, gloried much in the temple, and promised themselves great things from it. To humble them therefore, and to shake their vain confidence, both the prophets and Christ foretold the ruin of the temple, that God would leave it, and then it would soon be desolate. After it was destroyed by the Chaldeans it soon recovered itself, and the ceremonial services were revived with it; but by the Romans it was made a perpetual desolation, and the ceremonial law was abolished with it. That the world might be prepared for this, they were often told, as here, of what little account the temple was with God.

1. That he did not need it. The heaven was the throne of his glory and government, there he sits infinitely exalted in the highest dignity and dominion, above all blessing and praise. The earth is his footstool, on which he stands, overruling all the affairs of it according to his will. If God has so bright a throne, so large a footstool, where then is the house they can build unto God, that can be the residence of his glory; or, where is the place of his rest? What satisfaction can the Eternal Mind take in a house made with men's hands? What occasion has he, as we have, for a house to repose himself in, who fainteth not neither is weary, who neither slumbers nor sleeps? Or, if he had occasion he would not tell us, Ps. l. 12; for all these things hath his hands made; heaven, and all its courts; earth, and all its borders, and all the hosts of both. "All those things have been," have had their beginning by the power of God, who was happy from eternity, before they were, and therefore could not be benefited by them. 'All these things are,' so some read it; they still continue, upheld by the same power that made them; so that our goodness extendeth not to him. If he would have had a house for himself to dwell in, he would have made one himself when he made the world; and if he had made one it would have continued to this day, as other creatures do, according to his ordinance; so that he had no need of a temple made with hands.

2. That he would not heed it, so as he would an humble, penitent, gracious heart. He hath a heaven and earth of his own making, and a temple of man's making; but he overlooks them all, that he may look with favour to him that is poor in spirit, humble and serious, self-abasing and self-denying; whose heart is truly contrite for sin, penitent for it, and in pain to get it pardoned, and that trembleth at God's word; not as Felix did, with a transient qualm that was over when the sermon was done, but with an habitual awe of God's majesty and purity, and an habitual dread of his justice and wrath. Such a heart is a living temple for God, he dwells there, and it is the place of his rest; it is like heaven and earth, his throne and his footstool.

Secondly. Sacrifices are slighted when they come from ungracious hands. The sacrifice of the wicked is not only unacceptable, but it is an abomination to the Lord, Pr. xv. 8; this is largely shewed here, ver. 3, 4. Observe,

1. How detestable their sacrifices were to God. The carnal Jews, after their return out of captivity, though they relapsed not to idolatry, yet grew very careless and loose in the service of God. They brought the torn, and the lame, and the sick for sacrifice, Mal. i. 8, 13; and this made their services abominable to God; they had no regard to their sacrifices, and therefore how could they think God should have any regard to them? The unbelieving Jews, after the Gospel was preached, and in it notice given of the offering up of the great sacrifice which put an end to all the ceremonial services, yet continued to offer sacrifices as if the law of Moses had been still in force, and could have made the comers thereunto perfect; and this was an abomination. "He that kills an ox" for his own table is welcome to do it; but he that now kills it, that thus kills it, for God's altar, "is as if he slew a man." It is as great an offence to God as murder itself; he that doth it doth in effect set aside Christ's sacrifice, treads under foot the blood of the covenant, and makes himself accessary to the guilt of the body and blood of the Lord; setting up what Christ died to abolish. "He that sacrificeth a lamb," if it be a corrupt thing, and not the male in his flock, the best he has, if he think to put God off with any thing, he affronts him, instead of pleasing him; it is "as if he cut off a dog's neck;" a creature in the eye of the law so vile that, whereas an ass might be redeemed, the price of a dog was never to be brought into the treasury, Deu. xxiii. 18. "He that offers an oblation," a meat offering, or drink offering, is as if he thought to make atonement with swine's blood; a creature that must not be eaten or touched; the broth of it was abominable, ch. lxv. 4, much more the blood of it. "He that burns incense" to God, and so puts contempt upon the incense of Christ's intercession, he is "as if he blessed an idol;" it was as great an affront to God as if they had paid their devotions to a false god. Hypocrisy and profaneness are as provoking as idolatry.

2. What their wickedness was which made their sacrifices thus detestable. It is because "they have chosen their own ways," the ways of their own wicked hearts; and not only their hands do but "their soul delighteth in their abominations." They were vicious and immoral in their conversations, chose the way of sin rather than the way of God's commandments, and took pleasure in that which was provoking to God; this made their sacrifices so offensive to God, ch. i. 11—15. Those that pretend to honour God by a profession of religion, and yet live wicked lives, put an affront upon him, as if he were the patron of sin. And that which was an aggravation of their wickedness was, that they persisted in it, notwithstanding the frequent calls given them to repent and reform. They turned a deaf ear to all the warnings of Divine justice, and all the offers of Divine grace; "When I called, none did answer," as before, ch. lxv. 12. And the same follows here that did there, "They did evil before mine eyes;" being deaf to what he said they cared not what he saw, but chose that in which they knew he delighted not. How could they expect to please him in their devotions who took no care to please him in their conversations, but, on the contrary, designed to provoke him?

3. The doom passed upon them for this. They chose their own ways, therefore, saith God, I also will choose their delusions; they have made their choice, (as Mr. Gataker paraphraseth it,) and now I will make mine; they have taken what course they pleased with me, and I will take what course I please with them. I will choose their illusions, or mockeries, so some. As they have mocked God, and dishonoured him by their wickedness, so God will give them up to their enemies to be trampled upon and insulted by them. Or, they shall be deceived by those vain confidences with which they have deceived themselves. God will make their sin their punishment; they shall be beaten with their own rod, and hurried into ruin by their own delusions. God will bring their fears upon them; that is, will bring that upon them which shall be a mighty terror to them; or, that which they themselves have been afraid of, and thought to escape by sinful shifts. Unbelieving hearts, and unpurified, unpacified consciences, need no more to make them miserable than to have their own fears brought upon them.

5 Hear the word of the LORD,
Ye that tremble at his word;
Your brethren that hated you,
That cast you out for my name's sake, said,
Let the LORD be glorified:
But he shall appear to your joy, and they shall be [ashamed.
6 A voice of noise from the city,
A voice from the temple,
A voice of the LORD that rendereth recompence to his [enemies.
7 Before she travailed, she brought forth;
Before her pain came, she was delivered of a man child.
8 Who hath heard such a thing? who hath seen such things?
Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day?
Or shall a nation be born at once?
For as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children.
9 Shall I bring to the birth, and not cause to bring forth? saith the LORD:
Shall I cause to bring forth, and shut the womb? saith [thy God
10 Rejoice ye with Jerusalem,
And be glad with her, all ye that love her:
Rejoice for joy with her,
All ye that mourn for her:
11 That ye may suck, and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations;
That ye may milk out, and be delighted with the abundance of her glory.
12 For thus saith the LORD,
Behold, I will extend peace to her like a river,
And the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream:
Then shall ye suck,
Ye shall be borne upon her sides,
And be dandled upon her knees.
13 As one whom his mother comforteth.

lxvi. 19. The first words may be translated "and I will set a mark upon them." In the day of retribution referred to before all shall not perish, but a remnant shall escape, and shall declare the Lord's glory among the Gentiles. Tarshish was a famous emporium, but whether in Spain, India, or Africa is still disputed. Pul is by some thought to be the same as Put or Phut (Ezek. xxvii. 10), and, like Lud, an African tribe under the dominion of Egypt. Both these tribes seem to be meant by them "that draw the bow." Tubal is usually located on the south-east of the Black Sea, where the Greeks place a tribe called Tibarenes. The idea that Pul meant Apulia, and Tubal Italy must not be entertained, as it is unsupported by fact. That Javan is a form of Ionia, and intended for Greece, is commonly admitted. The "isles" may be those of the Mediterranean; but we need not limit the term to them. There is no doubt that the enumeration was intended to foretell a wide dispersion.

lxvi. 20. The word for "nations," both in this verse and in the

So will I comfort you;
And ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem.
14 And when ye see this, your heart shall rejoice,
And your bones shall flourish like an herb:
And the hand of the LORD shall be known toward his servants,
And his indignation toward his enemies.

The prophet, having denounced God's judgments against a hypocritical nation, that made a jest of God's word, and would not answer him when he called to them, here turns his speech to those that trembled at his word, to comfort and encourage them; they shall not be involved in the judgments that are coming upon their unbelieving nation. Ministers must distinguish thus, that when they speak terror to the wicked they may not make the hearts of the righteous sad; Bone Christiane, hoc nihil ad te,—'Good Christian, this is nothing to thee.' The prophet, having assured those that tremble at God's word of a gracious look from him, ver. 1, here brings them a gracious message from him. The word of God has comforts in store for those that by true humiliation for sin are prepared to receive them. There were those, ver. 4, that when God spoke would not hear; but if some will not others will. If the heart tremble at the word the ear will be open to it. Now what is here said to them?

First. Let them know that God will plead their just but injured cause against their persecutors; ver. 5, "Your brethren that hated you said, Let the Lord be glorified; but he shall appear to your joy." This, perhaps, might have reference to the case of some of the Jews, at their return out of captivity; but nothing like it appears in the history, and therefore it is rather to be referred to the first preachers and professors of the Gospel among the Jews to whose case it is very applicable. Observe, 1. How the faithful servants of God were persecuted; their brethren hated them. The apostles were Jews by birth, and yet even in the cities of the Gentiles the Jews they met with there were their most bitter and implacable enemies, and stirred up the Gentiles against them. The spouse complains, Cant. i. 6, that her mother's children were angry with her. Pilate upbraided our Lord Jesus with this; "Thine own nation have delivered thee unto me," Jno. xviii. 35. Their brethren, that should have loved them, and encouraged them for their work's sake, hated them, and cast them out of their synagogues; excommunicated them, as if they had been the greatest blemishes, who really were the greatest blessings, of their church and nation. This was a fruit of the old enmity in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman. They that hated Christ hated his disciples, because they supported his kingdom and interest, Jno. xv. 18; and they cast them out for his name's sake, because they were called by his name, and called upon his name, and laid out themselves to advance his name. Note, It is no new thing for church censures to be misapplied, and for her artillery, that was intended for her defence, to be turned against her best friends, by the treachery of her governors. And they that did this said, "Let the Lord be glorified;" that is, they pretended conscience and a zeal for the honour of God, and the church in it, and did it with all the formalities of devotion. Our Saviour explains this, and seems to have reference to it, Jno. xvi. 2, "They shall put you out of the synagogues," and "whosoever killeth you will think that he doth God service." In nomine Domini incipit omne malum,—'In the name of the Lord commences evil of every kind.' Or, we may understand it as spoken in defiance of God. You say, God will be glorified in your deliverance, let him be glorified then; "Let him make speed and hasten his work," ch. v. 19; let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him. Some take it to be the language of the profane Jews in captivity, bantering their brethren that hoped for deliverance, and ridiculing the expectations they often comforted themselves with, that God would shortly be glorified in it. They thus did what they could to shame the counsel of the poor, Ps. xiv. 6. 2. How they were encouraged under these persecutions. Hold out, faith and patience, yet a little while; your enemies hate you and oppress you; your brethren hate you and cast you out; but your Father in heaven loves you, and will appear for you, when no one else will or dare; his providence shall order things so as shall be for comfort to you; he shall appear for your joy, and confusion to those that abuse you and trample on you; they shall be ashamed of their enmity to you. This was fulfilled when, upon the signals given of Jerusalem's approaching ruin, the Jews' hearts failed them for fear; but the disciples of Christ, whom they had hated and persecuted, lifted up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption drew nigh, Lu. xxi. 28. Though God seem to hide himself he will in due time shew himself.

Secondly. Let them know that God's appearances for them will be such as will make a great noise in the world, ver. 6. There shall be "a voice of noise from the city, from the temple." Some make it the joyful and triumphant voice of the church's friends; others the frightful, lamenting voice of her enemies, surprised in the city, and fleeing in vain to the temple for shelter. These voices do but echo to the voice of the Lord, who is now rendering a "recompence to his enemies;" and those that will not hear him speaking this terror shall hear them returning the alarms of it in doleful shrieks. We may well think what a confused noise there was in the city and temple when Jerusalem, after a long siege, was at last taken by the Romans. Some think this prophecy was fulfilled in the prodigies that went before that destruction of Jerusalem, related by Josephus in his History of the Wars of the Jews, lib. vii. cap. 31, that the temple doors flew open suddenly of their own accord, and the priests heard a noise of motion, or shifting, in the most holy place, and presently a voice saying, 'Let us depart hence.' And some time after one Jesus Bar-Annas, at the feast of tabernacles, went up and down the city, continually crying, 'A voice from the east, a voice from the west, a voice from the four winds; a voice against Jerusalem, and the temple; a voice against all this people.'

Thirdly. Let them know that God will set up a church for himself in the world, which shall be abundantly replenished in little time; ver. 7, "Before she travailed, she brought forth." This is to be applied in the type to the deliverance of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon, which was brought about very easily and silently, without any pain or struggle, such as was when they were brought out of Egypt; that was done by might and power, Deu. iv. 34, but this by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, Zec. iv. 6. The man-child of the deliverance is rejoiced in, and yet the mother was never in labour for it; "before her pain came, she was delivered." This is altogether surprising, uncommon, and without precedent, unless in the story which the Egyptian midwives told of the Hebrew women, Ex. i. 19, that they were lively, and were delivered ere the midwives came unto them. But, "shall the earth be made to bring forth" her fruits "in one day?" no, it is the work of some weeks in the spring to renew the face of the earth, and cover it with its products. Some read it to the same purpose with the next clause, Shall a land be brought forth in one day? or, "Shall a nation be born at once?" Is it to be imagined that a woman at one birth should bring children enough to people a country, and that they should in an instant grow up to maturity? No; something like this was done in the creation; but God hath since rested from all such works, and leaves second causes to produce their effects gradually; nihil facit per saltum,—'he does nothing abruptly.' Yet in this case, "as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth." Cyrus' proclamation was no sooner issued out, but the captives were formed into a body presently, and were ready to make the best of their way to their own land. And the reason is given, ver. 9, because it is the Lord's doing; he undertakes it whose work is perfect. If he bring to the birth in preparing his people for deliverance, he will cause to bring forth in the accomplishment of the deliverance. When every thing is ripe and ready for their release, and the number of their months is accomplished, so that the children are brought to the birth, shall not I then give strength to bring forth, but leave mother and babe to perish together in the most miserable case? How will this agree with the Divine pity? Shall I begin a work and not go through with it? How will that agree with the Divine power and perfection? 'Am I he that causes to bring forth,' (so the following clause may be read,) 'and shall I restrain her?' Doth God cause mankind, and all the species of living creatures, to propagate and replenish the earth, and will he restrain Zion? Will he not make her fruitful in a blessed offspring to replenish the church? Or, am I he that begat, and should I restrain from bringing forth? Did God beget the deliverance in his purpose and promise, and will he not bring it forth in the accomplishment and performance of it? But this was a figure of the setting up of the Christian church in the world, and the replenishing of that family with children which was to be named from Jesus Christ. When the Spirit was poured out, and the Gospel went forth from Zion, multitudes were converted in a little time, and with little pains, compared with the vast product. The apostles, even before they travailed, brought forth; and the children born to Christ were so numerous, and so suddenly and easily produced, that they were rather like the dew from the morning's womb than like the son from the mother's womb, Ps. cx. 3. The success of the Gospel was astonishing; that light, like the morning, strangely diffused itself, till it took hold even of the ends of the earth. Cities and nations were born at once to Christ. The same day that the Spirit was poured out there were three thousand souls added to the church. And when this glorious work was once begun it was carried on wonderfully, beyond what could be imagined; "so mightily grew the word of God and prevailed." He that brought to the birth in conviction of sin caused to bring forth in a thorough conversion to God.

Fourthly. Let them know that their present sorrows shall shortly be turned into abundant joys, ver. 10, 11. Observe,

1. How the church's friends are described. They are such as love her, and mourn with her, and for her. Note, All that love God love Jerusalem; they love the church of God, and lay its interests very near their heart. They admire the beauty of the church, take pleasure in communion with it, and heartily espouse its cause. And they that have a sincere affection for the church have a cordial sympathy with it in all the cares and sorrows of its militant state. They mourn for her; all her grievances are their griefs; and if Jerusalem be in distress their harps are hung on the willow-trees.

2. How they are encouraged. Rejoice with her; and again and again I say, rejoice. This intimates that Jerusalem shall have cause to rejoice; the days of her mourning shall be at an end, and she shall be comforted according to the time that she hath been afflicted. And it is the will of God that all her friends should join with her in her joys, for they shall share with her in those blessings that will be the matter of her joy. If we suffer with Christ, and sorrow with his church, we shall reign with him, and rejoice with it. We are here called, 1st. To bear our part in the church's praises. Come, rejoice with her, rejoice for joy with her; rejoice greatly; rejoice, and know why you rejoice; rejoice on the days appointed for public thanksgiving. You that mourned for her in her sorrows cannot but from the same principle rejoice with her in her joys. 2nd. To take our part in the church's comforts. We must "suck and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations." The word of God, the covenant of grace, especially the promises of that covenant, the ordinances of God, and all the opportunities of attending on him, and conversing with him, are the breasts, which the church calls and counts the breasts of her consolations, where her comforts are laid up, and whence by faith and prayer they are drawn. With her, therefore, we must suck from these breasts, by an application of the promises of God to ourselves, and a diligent attendance on his ordinances; and with the consolations which are drawn from hence we must be satisfied, and not unsatisfied, though we have never so little of earthly comforts. It is the glory of the church that she hath the Lord for her God, that to her pertains the adoption and the service of God, and with the abundance of this glory we must be delighted. We must take more pleasure in our relation to God, and communion with him, than in all the delights of the sons and daughters of men. Whatever is the glory of the church must be our glory and joy, particularly her purity, unity, and increase.

Fifthly. Let them know that he who gives them this call to rejoice will give them cause to do so, and hearts to do so, ver. 12—14.

1. He will give them cause to do so; for, 1st. They shall enjoy a long, uninterrupted course of prosperity; "I will extend," or am extending, "peace to her," that is, all good to her, "like a river," that runs in a constant stream, still increasing till it be swallowed up in the ocean. The Gospel brings with it, wherever it is received in its power, such peace as this, which shall go on like a river, supplying souls with all good, and making them fruitful, as a river doth the lands it passeth through; such a river of peace as the springs of the world's comforts cannot send forth, and the dams of the world's troubles cannot stop or drive back, or its sands rack up; such a river of peace as will carry us to the ocean of boundless and endless bliss. 2nd. There shall be large and advantageous additions made to them; "The glory of the Gentiles" shall come to them "like a flowing stream." Gentile converts shall come pouring into the church, and swell the river of her peace and prosperity; for they shall bring their glory with them,—their wealth and honour, their power and interest, shall all be devoted to the service of God, and employed for the good of the church. Then shall ye suck from the breasts of her consolations; when you see such crowding for a share in those comforts, you shall be the more solicitous, and the more vigorous, to secure your share; not for fear of having the less for others coming in to partake of Christ,—there is no danger of that, he has enough for all, and enough for each,—but their zeal shall provoke you to a holy jealousy. It is well when it doth so, Rom. xi. 14; 2 Cor. ix. 2. 3rd. God shall be glorified in all, and that ought to be more the matter of our joy than any thing else; ver. 14, "The hand of the Lord shall be known towards his servants,"—the protecting, supporting hand of his almighty power; the supplying, enriching hand of his inexhaustible goodness, the benefit which his servants have by both these, shall be known to his glory, as well as theirs. And, to make this the more illustrious, he will at the same time make known his indignation towards his enemies. God's mercy and justice shall both be manifested and for ever magnified.

2. God will not only give them cause to rejoice, but speak comfort to them; will speak it to their hearts; and it is he only that can do that, and make it fasten there. See what he will do for the comfort of all the sons of Zion. 1st. Their country shall be their tender nurse. Ye shall be carried on her one before, is the same as that for Gentiles. The sense of the whole may be that the Israelites who have escaped the national ruin, and have published the divine glory, will bring back their converted brethren to Jerusalem. What lies under this literal sense it is for expounders of prophecy to determine. With regard to the means of conveyance, there is some diversity of opinion on part of the items. The word for "chariots" may mean any vehicle whatever. By "litters" we understand a covered structure, carried like a palanquin. The "swift beasts" are dromedaries, or female camels, as most critics now admit. The converts would be brought with as much care and pious zeal as a meat-offering was brought to the house of the Lord.

lxvi. 23. "From one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another," signify "on every new moon, and on every Sabbath." New moons and Sabbaths were Jewish observances, and all the imagery is based upon Hebrew ideas. Both here and in verse 16 sides, under her arms, as little children are, and shall be dandled upon her knees, as darlings are, especially when they are weary, and out of humour, and must be got to sleep. Those that are joined to the church, must be treated thus affectionately. The great Shepherd gathers the lambs in his arms, and carries them in his bosom, and so must the under-shepherds, that they may not be discouraged. Proselytes should be favourites. 2nd. God will himself be their powerful comforter; "As one whom his mother comforteth," when he is sick or sore, or upon any account in sorrow, "so will I comfort you," not only with the rational arguments which a prudent father useth, but with the tender affections and compassions of a loving mother, that bemoans her afflicted child, when it has fallen and hurt itself, that she may quiet it, and make it easy; or endeavours to pacify it, after she has chidden, and fallen out with it: see Jer. xxxi. 20, "Since I spake against him, my bowels are troubled for him;" he is a dear son, he is a pleasant child; thus the mother comforts. Thus "ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem," in the favours bestowed on the church, which you shall partake of, and in the thanksgivings offered by the church, which you shall concur with. 3rd. They shall feel the blessed effects of this comfort in their own souls; ver. 14, "When ye see this," what a happy state the church is restored to, not only your tongues and your countenances, but "your hearts shall rejoice." This was fulfilled in the wonderful satisfaction which Christ's disciples had in the success of their ministry; Christ, with an eye to that, tells them, Jno. xvi. 22, "Your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you." Then "your bones," that were dried and withered, the marrow of them quite exhausted, shall recover a youthful strength and vigour, and shall "flourish like an herb." Divine comforts reach the inward man; they are marrow, and moistening to the bones, Pr. iii. 8. The bones are the strength of the body; those shall be made to flourish with these comforts. "The joy of the Lord will be your strength," Neh. viii. 10.

15 For, behold, the LORD will come with fire,
And with his chariots like a whirlwind,
To render his anger with fury,
And his rebuke with flames of fire.
16 For by fire and by his sword
Will the LORD plead with all flesh:
And the slain of the LORD shall be many.
17 They that sanctify themselves, and purify themselves in the gardens
Behind one tree in the midst,
Eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the mouse,
Shall be consumed together, saith the LORD.
18 For I know their works and their thoughts:
It shall come, that I will gather all nations and tongues;
And they shall come, and see my glory.
19 And I will set a sign among them,
And I will send those that escape of them unto the nations,
To Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow,
To Tubal, and Javan, to the isles afar off,
That have not heard my fame,
Neither have seen my glory;
And they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles.
20 And they shall bring all your brethren
For an offering unto the LORD out of all nations
Upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters,
And upon mules, and upon swift beasts,
To my holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the LORD,
As the children of Israel bring an offering
In a clean vessel into the house of the LORD
21 And I will also take of them
For priests and for Levites, saith the LORD
22 For as the new heavens
And the new earth, which I will make,
Shall remain before me, saith the LORD,
So shall your seed and your name remain.
23 And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another,
And from one sabbath to another,
Shall all flesh come to worship before me,
Saith the LORD
24 And they shall go forth, and look upon
The carcases of the men that have transgressed against me:
For their worm shall not die,
Neither shall their fire be quenched;
And they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh.

These verses, like the pillar of cloud and fire, have a dark side towards the enemies of God's kingdom and all that are rebels against his crown, and a bright side towards his faithful, loyal subjects. Probably it refers to the Jews in captivity in Babylon, of whom some are said to have been sent thither for their hurt; and those are they with whom God here threatens to proceed in his controversy, who hated to be reformed, and therefore should be ruined by the calamity, Jer. xxiv. 9. Others were sent thither for their good; and they should have the trouble sanctified to them, should in due time get well through it, and see many a good day after it. Divers of the expressions here used are accommodated to that glorious dispensation. But doubtless it looks farther, to the judgment for which Christ did come once, and will come again, into this world; and to the distinction which his word, in both, makes between the precious and the vile.

First. Christ will appear to the confusion and terror of all those that stand it out against him. Sometimes in temporal judgments. The Jews that persisted in infidelity were cut off by fire, and by his sword. The ruin was very extensive; the Lord then pleaded with all flesh, and, it being his sword with which they are cut off, they are called his slain, sacrificed to his justice. And they shall be many. In the great day, the wrath of God will be his fire and sword, with which he will cut off and consume all the impenitent; and his word, when it takes hold of sinners' consciences, burns like fire, and is sharper than any two-edged sword. Idolaters will especially be contended with in the day of wrath, ver. 17. Perhaps some of those who returned out of Babylon retained such instances of idolatry and superstition as are here mentioned; had their idols in their gardens, (not daring to set them up publicly in the high places,) and there purified themselves, as the worshippers of the true God used to do, when they went about their idolatrous rites, one after another; or, as we read it, "behind one tree in the midst;" behind Ahad, or Ehad, some idol that they worshipped by that name, and in honour of which they ate swine's flesh, which was expressly forbidden by the law of God; and other abominations, as the mouse, or some other like animal. But it may refer to all those judgments which the wrath of God, according to the word of God, will bring upon provoking sinners, that live in contempt of God, and are devoted to the world and the flesh; they shall be consumed together. From the happiness of heaven we find expressly excluded all idolaters, and whosoever worketh abomination, Rev. xxi. 27; xxii. 15. In the day of vengeance, secret wickedness will be brought to light, and brought to the account; for, ver. 18, "I know their works, and their thoughts." God knows both what men do, and from what principle and with what design they do it, and therefore is fit to judge the world because he can "judge the secrets of men," Rom. ii. 16.

Secondly. He will appear to the comfort and joy of all that are faithful to him, in the setting up of his kingdom in this world, the kingdom of grace, the earnest and firstfruits of the kingdom of glory. The time shall come that he will gather all nations and tongues to himself, that they might come and see his glory, as it shines in the face of Jesus Christ, ver. 18. This was fulfilled when all nations were to be discipled, and the gift of tongues bestowed in order thereunto. The church had hitherto been confined to one nation, and in one tongue only was God worshipped; but in the days of the Messiah the partition wall shall be taken down, and those that had been strangers to God shall be brought acquainted with him, and shall see his glory in the Gospel, as the Jews had seen it in the sanctuary. As to this, it is here promised,

1. That some of the Jewish nation should, by the grace of God, be distinguished from the rest, and marked for salvation. I will not only set up a gathering ensign among them, to which the Gentiles shall seek, as is promised ch. xi. 12; but there shall be those among them on whom I will set a differencing sign, for so the word signifies. Though they are a corrupt, degenerate nation, yet God will set apart a remnant of them, that shall be devoted to him, and employed for him, and a mark shall be set upon them; with such certainty will God own them, Eze. ix. 4. The servants of God shall be sealed in their foreheads, Rev. vii. 3. The Lord knows them that are his. Christ's sheep are marked.

2. That those who are themselves distinguished thus by the grace of God shall be commissioned to invite others to come and take the benefit of that grace. Those that escape the power of those prejudices by which the generality of that nation is kept in unbelief, they shall be sent into the nations to carry the Gospel among them, and preach it to every creature. Note, Those who themselves have escaped the wrath to come should do all they can to snatch others also as brands out of the burning. God chooseth to send those on his errands that can deliver their message feelingly and experimentally, and warn people of their danger by sin, as those who have themselves narrowly escaped the danger. 1st. They shall be sent unto the nations; divers of which are here named, Tarshish, and Pul, and Lud, &c. It is uncertain, nor are interpreters agreed, what countries are here intended. Tarshish signifies in general, the sea, yet some take it for Tarsus in Cilicia. Pul is mentioned sometimes as the name of one of the kings of Assyria; perhaps some part of that country might likewise bear that name. Lud is supposed to be Lydia, a warlike nation, famed for archers. The Lydians are said to handle and bend the bow, Jer. xlvi. 9. Tubal, some think, is Italy or Spain; and Javan most agree to be Greece, the Iones; and the isles of the Gentiles, that were peopled by the posterity of Japhet, Gen. x. 5, probably are here meant by the "isles afar off, that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory." In Judah only God was known, and there only his name was great for many ages. Other countries sat in darkness; heard not the joyful sound, saw not the joyful light. This deplorable state of theirs seems to be spoken of here with compassion; for it is pity that any of the children of men should be at such a distance from their Maker as not to hear his name, and see his glory. In consideration of this, 2nd. Those that are sent to the nations shall go upon God's errand to declare his glory among the Gentiles. The Jews that shall be dispersed among the nations shall declare the glory of God's providence concerning their nation all along, by which many shall be invited to join with them, as also by the appearances of God's glory among them in his ordinances. Some out of all languages of the nations shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, entreating him to take notice of them, to admit them into his company, and to stay a little while for them, till they are ready: for, "we will go with you," having "heard that God is with you," Zec. viii. 23. Thus the glory of God was in part declared among the Gentiles, but more clearly and fully by the apostles and preachers of the Gospel, who were sent into all the world, even to the isles afar off, to publish the glorious Gospel of the blessed God. "They went forth, and preached every where, the Lord working with them," Mar. xvi. 20.

3. That many converts shall hereby be made; ver. 20, "They shall bring all your brethren" (for proselytes ought to be owned and embraced as brethren) "for an offering unto the Lord." God's glory shall not be in vain declared to them, but by it they shall be both invited and directed to join themselves to the Lord. They that are sent to them shall succeed so well in their negociation, that thereupon there shall be great flocking to Jerusalem, as used to be at the time of a solemn feast, when all the males from all parts of the country were to attend there, and not to appear empty. Observe, 1st. The conveniencies that they shall be furnished with for their coming. Some shall come upon horses, because they came from far, and the journey was too long to travel on foot, as the Jews usually did to their feasts. Persons of quality shall come in chariots, and the aged, and sickly, and little children, shall be brought in litters, or covered waggons, and the young men on mules, and swift beasts. This intimates their zeal and forwardness to come. They shall spare no trouble or charge to get to Jerusalem; those that cannot ride on horseback shall come in litters; and in such haste shall they be, and so impatient of delay, the phrase "all flesh" is to be limited to residents in Jerusalem, or extends at most to Palestine; for it is simply impossible that all the world should visit the Temple either weekly or monthly. The next verse plainly favours this view, because it refers us back to the destruction already mentioned in verse 16. The natural and logical sense of the whole passage must be observed, if any consistent and true explanation of its prophetic intention is to be attained.

Supplementary Notes.—Although, as observed in note, page 489, the chief attacks upon this book by certain critics have been against the last twenty-seven chapters, other portions have also been assailed as spurious. Dr. S. Davidson has treated of the whole question in his "Introduction to the Old Testament" (London, 1863), and has collected and condensed most of the objections of German writers, adding a few of his own. He thinks the book of Isaiah proceeded from different prophets, at different times, was not compiled by one editor, and is not arranged on any definite plan. The contents are that those that can shall ride upon mules and swift beasts. These expressions are figurative, and those various means of conveyance are heaped up to intimate (saith the learned Mr. Gataker) the plentiful affording of all gracious helps requisite for the bringing of God's elect home to Christ. All shall be welcome, and nothing shall be wanting for their assistance and encouragement. 2nd. The character under which they shall be brought. They shall come, not as formerly they used to come, to Jerusalem, to be offerers, but to be themselves an offering unto the Lord, which must be understood spiritually, of their being presented to God as living sacrifices, Rom. xii. 1. The apostle explains this, and perhaps refers to it, Rom. xv. 16, where he speaks of his ministering the Gospel to the Gentiles, that the offering up or sacrificing of the Gentiles might be acceptable. They shall offer themselves, and those that are the instruments of their conversion shall offer them, as the spoils they have taken for Christ, and which are devoted to his service and honour. They shall be brought "as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel," with great care that they be holy, purified from sin, and sanctified to God. It is said of the converted Gentiles, Acts xv. 9, that their hearts were purified by faith. Whatever was brought to God was brought in a clean vessel, a vessel appropriated to religious uses. God will be served and honoured in the way that he has appointed, in the ordinances of his own institution, which are the proper vehicles for these spiritual offerings. And when the soul is offered up to God, the body must be a clean vessel for it, possessed in sanctification and honour, and not in the lusts of uncleanness, 1 Thes. iv. 4, 5. And converts to Christ are not only purged from an evil conscience, but have their bodies also washed with pure water, Heb. x. 22. Now this may refer, First. To the Jews, devout men, and proselytes out of every nation under heaven, that flocked together to Jerusalem, expecting the kingdom of the Messiah to appear, Acts ii. 5, 6, 10. They came from all parts to the holy mountain of Jerusalem, as an offering to the Lord, and there many of them were brought to the faith of Christ, by the gift of tongues poured out on the apostles. Methinks there is some correspondence between that history and this prophecy. The eunuch some time after came to worship at Jerusalem in his chariot, and took home with him the knowledge of Christ, and his holy religion. Secondly. To the Gentiles, some of all nations, that should be converted to Christ, and so added to his church, which, though a spiritual accession, is as often in prophecy represented by a local motion. The apostle saith of all true Christians, that they are come to mount Zion, and the heavenly Jerusalem, Heb. xii. 22, which explains this here, and shews that the meaning of all this parade is, only that they shall be brought into the church by the grace of God, and in the use of the means of that grace, as carefully, and safely, and comfortably, as if they were carried in chariots and litters. Thus God shall persuade Japhet, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, Gen. ix. 27.

4. That a gospel ministry shall be set up in the church, it being thus enlarged by the addition of such a multitude of members to it; ver. 21, "I will take of them," of the proselytes, of the Gentile converts, "for priests, and for Levites," to minister in holy things, and to preside in their religious assemblies, which is very necessary for doctrine, worship, and discipline. Hitherto the priests and Levites were all taken from among the Jews, and were all of one tribe; but in gospel times God will take of the converted Gentiles to minister to him in holy things, to teach the people, and to bless them in the name of the Lord, and to be the stewards of the mysteries of God, as the priests and Levites were under the law; to be pastors and teachers, or bishops, to give themselves to the word and prayer; and deacons to serve tables, and, as the Levites, to take care of the outward business of the house of God, Phil. i. 1; Acts vi. 2—4. The apostles were all Jews, and so were the seventy disciples; the great apostle of the Gentiles was himself a Hebrew of the Hebrews; but when churches were planted among the Gentiles they had ministers settled that were of themselves, elders in every church, Acts xiv. 23, Tit. i. 5, which made the ministry to spread the more easily, and to be the more familiar; and if not the more venerable, yet the more acceptable. Gospel grace, it might be hoped, would cure people of those corruptions which kept a prophet from having honour in his own country. God saith, I will take not all of them, (though they are all in a spiritual sense made to our God kings and priests,) but of them, some of them. It is God's work originally to choose ministers, by qualifying them for, and inclining them to, the service, as well as to make ministers, by giving them their commission. I will take them, that is, I will admit them, though Gentiles, and will accept of them and their ministrations. This is a great honour and advantage to the Gentile church, as it was to the Jewish church, that God raised up of their sons for prophets, and their young men for Nazarites, Am. ii. 11.

5. That the church and ministry, being thus settled, shall continue and be kept up in a succession from one generation to another, ver. 22. The change that will be made by the setting up the kingdom of the Messiah is here described to be, 1st. A very great and universal change. It shall be a new world, the new heavens and the new earth, promised before, ch. lxv. 17. "Old things are passed away, behold all things are become new," 2 Cor. v. 17; the old covenant of peculiarity set aside, and a new covenant, a covenant of grace, established, Heb. viii. 13. We are now to serve "in newness of the spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter," Rom. vii 6. New commandments are given relating both to heaven and earth, and new promises relating to both, and both together make a new testament; so that they are new heavens and a new earth that God will create, and these a preparative for the new heavens and new earth designed at the end of time, 2 Pet. iii. 13. 2nd. A change of God's own making. He will create the new heavens and the new earth. The change was made by him that had authority to make new ordinances, as well as power to make new worlds. 3rd. It will be an abiding, lasting change; a change never to be changed; a new world, that will be always new, and never wax old, as that which is ready to vanish away doth. It shall remain before me unalterable; for the gospel dispensation is to continue to the end of time, and not to be succeeded by any other. The kingdom of Christ is a kingdom that cannot be moved; the laws and privileges of it are things which cannot be shaken, but shall for ever remain, Heb. xii. 27, 28. It shall therefore remain, because it is before God; it is under his eye, and care, and special protection. 4th. It will be maintained in a seed that shall serve Christ. Your seed, and in them your name, shall remain. A seed of ministers, a seed of Christians. As one generation of both passeth away, another generation shall come; and thus the name of Christ, with that of Christians, shall continue on earth while the earth remains, and his throne as the days of heaven. The gates of hell, though they fight against the church, shall not prevail, nor wear out the saints of the Most High.

6. That the public worship of God in religious assemblies shall be carefully and constantly attended upon by all that are thus brought as an offering to the Lord, ver. 23. This is described in expressions suited to the Old Testament dispensation; to shew that, though the ceremonial law should be abolished, and the temple service at an end, yet God should be still as regularly, and constantly, and acceptably worshipped as ever. Heretofore Jews only went up to appear before God, and they were bound to attend only three times a year, and the males only; but now "all flesh," Gentiles as well as Jews, women as well as men, shall come and worship before God, in his presence, though not in his temple at Jerusalem, but in religious assemblies dispersed all the world over, which shall be to them as the tabernacle of meeting was to the Jews. God will in them record his name; and though but two or three come together, he will be among them, will meet them, and bless them. And they shall have the benefit of these holy convocations frequently, every new moon, and every sabbath; not as formerly, at the three annual feasts only. There is no necessity of one certain place, as the temple was of old. Christ is our temple, in whom by faith all believers meet; and now the church is so far extended, it is impossible that all should meet at one place. But it is fit there should be a certain time appointed, that the service may be done certainly, and done frequently, and a token thereby given of the spiritual communion which all Christian assemblies have with each other, by faith, hope, and holy love. The new moons and the sabbaths are mentioned, because, under the law, though the yearly feasts were to be celebrated at Jerusalem, yet the new moons and the sabbaths were religiously observed all the country over, in the schools of the prophets first, and afterwards in the synagogues, 2 Kin. iv. 23, Am. viii. 5, Acts xv. 21, according to the model of which Christian assemblies seem to be formed. Where the Lord's day is weekly sanctified, and the Lord's supper monthly celebrated, and both duly attended on, there this promise is fulfilled; there the Christian new moons and sabbaths are observed. See here, that God is to be worshipped in solemn assemblies; that it is the duty of all, as they have opportunity, to wait upon God in those assemblies; all flesh must come. Though flesh, weak, and corrupt, and sinful, let them come, that the flesh may be mortified. In worshipping God, we present ourselves before him, and are in a special manner in his presence. For doing this there ought to be stated times, and are so; and we must see that it is our interest, as well as our duty, constantly and conscientiously to observe these times.

7. That their thankful sense of God's distinguishing favour to them should be very much increased by the consideration of the fearful doom and destruction of those that persist and perish in their infidelity and impiety, ver. 24. They that have been worhipping the Lord of hosts, and rejoicing before him in the goodness of his house, to affect themselves the more with their own happiness, shall take a view of the misery of the wicked. Observe, 1st. Who they are whose misery is here described. They are men that have transgressed against God; not only broken his laws, but broken covenant with him, and thought themselves able to contend with him. It may be meant especially of the unbelieving Jews, that rejected the Gospel of Christ. 2nd. What their misery is. It is here represented by the frightful spectacle of a field of battle, covered with the carcases of the slain, that lie rotting above ground, full of worms, crawling about them, and feeding on them; and if you go to burn them, they are so scattered, and it is such a noisome piece of work to get them together, that it would be endless, and the fire would never be quenched; so that they are an "abhorring unto all flesh,"—nobody cares to come near them. Now this is sometimes accomplished in temporal judgments, and, perhaps, never nearer the letter than in the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation by the Romans; in which destruction it is computed that above two millions, first and last, were cut off by the sword, besides what perished by famine and pestilence. It may refer likewise to the spiritual judgments that came upon the unbelieving Jews, which St. Paul looks upon, and shews us, Rom. xi. 8, &c. They become dead in sins, twice dead; the church of the Jews was a carcase of a church; all its members were putrid carcases, their worm died not, their own consciences made them continually uneasy; and the fire of their rage against the Gospel was not quenched, which was their punishment as well their sin; and they became, more than ever any nation under the sun, an abhorring to all flesh. But our Saviour applies it to the everlasting misery and torment of impenitent sinners in the future state, where their worm dies not, and their fire is not quenched, Mar. ix. 44; for the soul, whose conscience is its constant tormentor, is immortal; and the God, whose wrath is its constant terror, is eternal. 3rd. What notice shall be taken of it. They that worship God shall go forth and look upon them, to affect their own hearts with the love of their Redeemer, when they see what misery they are redeemed from. As it will aggravate the miseries of the damned, to see others in the kingdom of heaven, and themselves thrust out, Lu. xiii. 28, so it will illustrate the joys and glories of the blessed, to see what comes of them that died in their transgression; and it will elevate their praises to think that they were themselves as brands plucked out of that burning. To the honour of that free grace which thus distinguished them, let the redeemed of the Lord with all humility, and not without a holy trembling, sing their triumphant songs.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES* TO THE BOOK OF ISAIAH.

THE natural and obvious division of Isaiah is into two parts, the first of which closes with the 39th chapter, and the latter of which comprises the remainder of the book, (xl.—lxvi.) In this division the latter portion is regarded as substantially a continuous prophecy, or an unbroken oracle or vision, relating to far distant events, and having little reference to existing things at the time when Isaiah lived, except the implied censures which are passed on the idolatry of the Jews in the time of Manasseh. The main design and scope, however, is to pourtray events to come,—the certain deliverance of the Jews from the bondage in Babylon, and the higher deliverance of the world under the Messiah, of which the former was the suggestor and the emblem. This former part (ch. i.—xxxix.)

* Selected chiefly from the works on Isaiah, of Albert Barnes, and Joseph Addison Alexander. The letter A. refers to Mr. Alexander's work. The remaining extracts, except where other names are given, are generally from Barnes.

divided by him into four parts, viz., chapters i.—xii.; xiii.—xxiii.; xxiv.—xxxix.; xl.—lxvi. He admits the genuineness of the first twelve chapters. The next eleven chapters are regarded as partly genuine and partly spurious; and a similar judgment is passed upon the sixteen chapters following. The last twenty-seven chapters are declared not Isaiah's. The reasons alleged for rejecting so large a portion of the book cannot all be mentioned, much less discussed, in this note, as they involve minute verbal criticisms quite unintelligible to ordinary readers. Some of them seem to undermine the very foundations of prophecy as commonly understood. Thus the opinion that a prophet might place himself, so to speak, amid the far distant events he foretold is denied, so that he could not identify himself with what he prophesied. Sometimes the objection is based on a supposed incongruity between the tone and temper of a passage and those of Isaiah, which is assuming that the prophet could not change his style with his subject. Resemblances to passages in later prophets comprises a collection of independent prophecies and writings composed at various periods during the public ministry of the prophet, and designed to produce an immediate effect on the morals, the piety, the faith, and the welfare of the nation. The general drift is, that Jerusalem and the people of God were secure; that the kingdom of God on earth could not be destroyed; that however much his people might be subjected to punishment for their sins, and however long and grievous might be their calamities, and however mighty their foes; yet that the kingdom of God could not be overturned, and all his promises set at nought. Hence in all the predictions of judgment and calamity, in all the reproofs for crime, idolatry, and sin, there is usually found a saving clause,—an assurance that the people of God should finally triumph, and be secure. And hence so large a portion of this division of the book is occupied with a prophetic statement of the entire and utter overthrow of the formidable states, nations, and cities with which they had been so often engaged in war, and which were so decidedly hostile to the Jews. The prophet, therefore, goes over in detail these cities and nations, and depicts successively the destruction of the Assyrians, of Babylon, Tyre, Moab, Damascus, Edom, &c., until he comes to the triumphant conclusion in ch. xxxv., that all the enemies of the people of God should be destroyed, and his kingdom be established on an imperishable basis under the Messiah.—Barnes' Introduction.

CHAP. I.—8. Zion, or Sion, was the name of one of the hills on which the city of Jerusalem was built. On this hill formerly stood the city of the Jebusites, and when David took it from them he transferred to it his court, and it was called the city of David, or the holy hill. It was in the southern part of the city. Daughter of Zion. The extent of the desolation is expressed by comparing the church or nation to a watch-shed in a field or vineyard, far from other habitations, and forsaken after the ingathering. "And the daughter of Zion," that is, the people of Zion or Jerusalem, considered as the capital of Judah, and therefore representing the whole nation, "is left," not forsaken, but left over or behind as a survivor, "like a booth," a temporary covert of leaves and branches, "in a vineyard, like a lodge in a melon field, like a watched city;" that is, watched by friends and foes, besieged and garrisoned, and therefore insulated, cut off from all communication with the country.—A. 18. Scarlet. This colour was a fast, or fixed colour. Neither dew, nor rain, nor washing, nor long usage, would remove it. Hence it is used to represent the fixedness and permanency of sins in the heart. No human means will wash them out. No effort of man, no external rites, no tears, nor sacrifices, nor prayers, are of themselves sufficient to take them away. They are deep-fixed in the heart, as the scarlet colour was in the web of cloth, and an almighty power is needful to remove them.

> 'Jesus, my Lord, thy blood alone
> Hath power sufficient to atone;
> Thy blood can make me white as snow,
> No Jewish types could cleanse me so.'—Watts.

The prophet means to say that, though they were thus fixed, and immovable by any human means, yet that the mercy of God can take away all the stain. 30. Garden that hath no water. In Eastern countries this image would be more striking than with us. In those hot regions, a constant supply of water is necessary for the cultivation, and even for the very existence and preservation, of a garden. Should it want water for a few days, every thing in it would be burnt up with heat, and totally destroyed. In all gardens, therefore, in those regions, there must be a constant supply of water, either from some neighbouring river or from some fountain or reservoir within it.

CHAP. II.—2. Mountain. The temple was built on mount Moriah, which was hence called the mountain of the Lord's house. The temple to a Jew was the usual place of worship. And hence, to say that that should be elevated higher than all other hills or mountains, means, that the worship of the true God should become an object so conspicuous as to be seen by all nations; and so conspicuous that all nations should forsake other objects and places of worship, being attracted by the devotion and glory of the worship of the true God. 4. Swords into ploughshares. The ploughshare is a piece of iron, broad but not large, which tips the end of the shaft. So much does it resemble the short sword used by the ancient warriors, that it may, with very little trouble, be converted into that deadly weapon, and, when the work of destruction is over, reduced again to its former shape, and applied to the purposes of agriculture. In allusion to the first operation, the prophet Joel summons the nations to leave their employments in the cultivated fields, and buckle on their armour: "Beat your ploughshares into swords, and your pruning hooks into spears." This beautiful image the prophet Isaiah has reversed, and applied to the establishment of that profound and lasting peace which is to bless the church of Christ in the latter days.—Paxton. 6. Therefore. The exhortation in ver. 5 implied that the Jews were not actually walking in God's light, but were alienated from him, a fact which is now explicitly asserted and the reason of it given, namely, illicit intercourse with foreign nations, as evinced by the adoption of their superstitious practices, reliance on their martial and pecuniary aid, and last, but worst of all, the worship of their idols. In this verse, the first of these effects is ascribed to intercourse with eastern countries, which are always represented by the ancients as the cradle of the occult arts and sciences. As if he had said, I thus exhort, O Lord, thy chosen people, 'because thou hast forsaken thy people, because they are replenished from the East and (full of) soothsayers like the Philistines, and with the children of strangers they abound.' The various renderings of the Hebrew word by 'therefore,' 'verily,' 'surely,' 'but,' &c., all arise from misconception or neglect of the connexion, which requires the common meaning 'for,' 'because.'—A. 13. Cedars of Lebanon. This is a beautiful specimen of the poetic manner of writing so common among the Hebrews, where spiritual and moral subjects are represented by the grand or beautiful imagery taken from objects of nature. Mount Lebanon bounded Palestine on the north. It was formerly much celebrated for its large and lofty cedars. These cedars were said to have been from thirty-five to forty feet in girth, and very high. They were magnificent trees, and were very valuable for ceiling, statues, or roofs, that required durable and beautiful timber. A few lofty trees of this description are still remaining on mount Lebanon. 20. And to the bats. The East may be termed the country of bats; they hang by hundreds and thousands in caves, ruins, and under the roofs of large buildings. To enter such places, especially after rain, is most offensive. No wonder, then, that its name is used by the Hindoos (as by the prophet) for an epithet of contempt. When a house ceases to please the inhabitants, on account of being haunted, they say, (and also do,) give it to the bats. 'Alas, alas! my wife and children are dead; my houses, my buildings, are all given to the bats.' 'The bats are now the possessors of the once splendid mansions of royalty.'—Roberts.

CHAP. III.—16-21. Ornaments, &c. Besides ornamental rings in the nose and the ears, they (Oriental females) wore others round the legs, which made a tinkling as they went. This custom has also descended to the present times, for Rauwolf met with a number of Arabian women on the Euphrates, whose ankles and wrists were adorned with rings, sometimes a good many together, which, moving up and down as they walked, made a great noise. Chardin attests the existence of the same custom in Persia, in Arabia, and in very hot countries, where they commonly go without stockings, but ascribes the tinkling sound to little bells fastened to those rings. In the East Indies, golden bells adorned the feet and ankles of the ladies from the earliest times; they placed them in the flowing tresses of their hair; they suspended them round their necks, and to the golden rings which they wore on their fingers, to announce their superior rank, and extort the homage which they had a right to expect from the lower orders; and from the banks of the Indus it is probable the custom was introduced into the other countries of Asia.—Paxton. 25. Shall sit upon the ground. It is a remarkable coincidence that, in the medals which were made by the Romans to commemorate the captivity of Judæa and Jerusalem, Judæa is represented under the figure of a female sitting in a posture of grief under a palm-tree, with this inscription, Judæa capta,—'Judæa is taken.' The passage here, however, refers not to the captivity by the Romans, but to the first destruction by Nebuchadnezzar. It is a tender and most affecting image of desolation; and a representation which was fulfilled to an extent of sorrow and calamity which was never suffered by those who heard Isaiah.

CHAP. IV.—2. The branch of the Lord. The word 'branch' is derived from the verb tzamahh, signifying to sprout, to spring up, spoken of plants. Hence the word branch means properly that which shoots up, or sprouts from the root of a tree, or from a decayed tree: compare Job xiv. 7—9; Jer. xxxiii. 15; Zec. iii. 8; vi. 12. In all these places there can be no doubt that there is reference to him who was to be raised up as the successor of David; who was to spring up from him as a sprout does from a decayed and fallen tree; and who is therefore called a root, a branch of the royal stock. (See Supplementary Note on ch. xi. 1.) 6. From the heat. The heat in those regions was often very intense, particularly in the vast plains of sand. For a place of refuge. A place to which to flee in the midst of a storm, as a tent would be. There are few images more beautiful than this. Soon the storms of Divine vengeance will beat on the sinner. God will summon him to judgment. He will pour out his fury. But then, he who has fled to the Messiah, the Lord Jesus, as the refuge of his soul, shall be safe. He shall have nothing to fear, and in his arms shall find defence and salvation.

CHAP. V.—22. Mighty. Strong. Perhaps those who prided themselves on their ability to drink much without becoming intoxicated; who had been so accustomed to it, that they defied its effects, and boasted of their power to resist its usual influence. A similar idea is expressed in ch. lvi. 12. 23. For reward. For bribes. It is remarkable that this is introduced in immediate connection with their being mighty to mingle strong drink. One effect of intemperance is to make a man ready to be bribed.

CHAP. VI.—8. Who will go for us? Jerome's explanation of the plural, as implying a plurality of persons in the speaker, is approved by Calvin, who was doubtful with respect to the τρισάγιον in ver. 3. This explanation is the only one that accounts for the difference of number in the verb and pronoun, 'whom shall I send, and who will go for us?' Jerome compares it with the words of Christ, Jno. x. 30, "I and my Father are one;" one referring to the nature, are to the plurality of persons.—A. 10. Make the heart of this people fat. Make them insensible, not by an immediate act of power, nor by any direct influence whatever, but by doing your duty, which their wickedness and God's righteous judgments will allow to have no other effect. In this sense the prophet might be said to preach them callous. In other cases, where his personal agency no longer needed to be set forth or alluded to, the verse is quoted, not as a command, but a description of the people, or as a declaration of God's agency in making them insensible. Thus in Mat. xiii. 15, and in Acts xxviii. 26, the Septuagint version is retained, in which the people's own guilt is the prominent idea, 'for this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed, lest,' &c. In Jno. xii. 40, on the other hand, the sentence takes a new form, in order to bring out distinctly the idea of judicial blindness, "he hath blinded their eyes and hardened their heart," lest, &c. Both these ideas are in fact included in the meaning of the passage, though its form is different, in order to suit the occasion upon which it was originally uttered.—A. 13. And shall be eaten. This is an unhappy translation. It has arisen from the difficulty of making sense of the passage, by not taking into consideration the circumstances just adverted to. The word translated 'eaten' means to feed, to graze, to consume by grazing, to consume by fire, to consume or destroy in any way, to remove. Here it means that this remnant shall be for destruction; that judgments and punishments shall follow them after their return from Egypt, Moab, &c. Even this remnant shall be the object of Divine displeasure, and shall feel the weight of his indignation: see Jer. xliii., xliv.

No prophecy, perhaps, has been more remarkably fulfilled than that in this verse. 'Though the cities be waste and the land be desolate, it is not from the poverty of the soil that the fields are abandoned by the plough, nor from any diminution of its ancient and natural fertility, that the land has rested for so many generations. Judæa was not forced only by artificial means, or from local and temporary causes, into a luxuriant cultivation, such as a barren country might have been, concerning which it would not have needed a prophet to tell that, if once devastated and abandoned, it would ultimately revert to its original sterility. Phœnicia at all times held a far different rank among the richest countries of the world; and it was not a bleak and sterile portion of the earth, nor a land which even many ages of desolation and neglect could impoverish, that God gave in possession and by covenant to the seed of Abraham. No longer cultivated as a garden, but left like a wilderness, Judæa is indeed greatly changed from what it was; all that human ingenuity and labour did devise, erect, or cultivate, men have laid waste and desolate; all the "plenteous goods" with which it was enriched, adorned, and blessed, have fallen like seared and withered leaves when their greenness is gone; and, stripped of its "ancient splendour," it is left "as an oak whose leaf fadeth;" but its inherent sources of fertility are not dried up; the natural richness of the soil is unblighted; "the substance is in it," strong as that of the teil-tree or the solid oak, which retain their substance when they cast their leaves. And as the leafless oak waits throughout winter for the genial warmth of returning spring, to be clothed with renewed foliage, so the once glorious land of Judæa is yet full of latent vigour, or of vegetative power, strong as ever, ready to shoot forth, even "better than at the beginning," whenever the sun of heaven shall shine on it again, and "the holy seed" be prepared for being finally "the substance thereof." "The substance that is in it"—which alone has here to be proved—is, in few words, thus described by an enemy: "The land in the plains is fat and loamy, and exhibits every sign of the greatest fecundity. Were nature assisted by art, the fruits of the most distant countries might be produced within the distance of twenty leagues." "Galilee," says Malte Brun, "would be a paradise, were it inhabited by an industrious people, under an enlightened government. Vine stocks are to be seen here a foot and a half in diameter."'—Keith.

CHAP. VII.—3. Conduit of the upper pool. The mention of these now obscure localities, although it detracts nothing from the general clearness of the passage, is an incidental proof of authenticity which no later writer would or are set down as imitations by the personifier of Isaiah, whereas the exact contrary may be the fact. Certain words are said not to belong to the time or to the vocabulary of Isaiah; which cannot be proved. What are called Aramaic forms, for example, may occur in Isaiah without disproving his authorship, because such forms existed before his time. As for the alleged "later words," some of them are found in the very earliest books of the Bible. What we say of the objections to words applies to objections to phrases; it is precarious reasoning which rejects a book because it contains peculiar phrases not found in other writings claiming the same author. Occasionally it may even be admitted that expressions are more recent than the substance of a sacred book, without rejecting the authorship of that book. That explanatory notes appear in the Pentateuch itself is now denied by few critics, however firmly they advocate the Mosaic authorship; and the same is true of some other portions of Holy Writ. Objectors very much rely upon the doctrinal clearness and develop-could have forged. The upper pool, which has been placed by different writers upon almost every side of Jerusalem, is identified by Robinson and Smith with a large tank at the head of the valley of Hinnom, about seven hundred yards west-north-west from the Jaffa gate. It is full in the rainy season, and its waters are then conducted by a small rude aqueduct to the vicinity of the gate just mentioned, and so to the pool of Hezekiah within the walls. This aqueduct is probably the conduit mentioned in the text, and the end of this conduit the point where it enters the city, as appears from the fact that, when Rabshakeh afterwards conferred with the ministers of Hezekiah at this same spot, he was heard by the people on the city wall, ch. xxxvi. 2, 12. 14. Therefore the Lord himself. The king having refused to ask a sign, the prophet gives him one, by renewing the promise of deliverance, (ver. 8, 9,) and connecting it with the birth of a child, whose significant name is made a symbol of the Divine interposition, and his progress a measure of the subsequent events. Instead of saying that God would be present to deliver them, he says the child shall be called Immanuel (God with us); instead of mentioning a term of years, he says, before the child is able to distinguish good from evil; instead of saying that until that time the land shall lie waste, he represents the child as eating curds and honey, spontaneous products, here put in opposition to the fruits of cultivation. At the same time, the form of expression is descriptive. Instead of saying simply that the child shall experience all this, he represents its birth and infancy as actually passing in his sight; he sees the child brought forth and named Immanuel; he sees the child eating curds and honey till a certain age. 'Therefore,' because you have refused to choose, 'the Lord himself will give you a sign. Behold! the virgin pregnant and bringing forth a son, and she calls his name Immanuel,' God with us, 'curds and honey shall he eat,' because the land lies waste, 'until he shall know (how) to reject the evil and to choose the good,' but no longer; 'for before the child shall know (how) to reject the evil and to choose the good, the land, of whose two kings thou art afraid,' that is, Syria and Israel, 'shall be forsaken,' that is, desolate, which of course implies the previous deliverance of Judah. All interpreters appear to be agreed that these three verses contain a threatening of destruction to the enemies of Judah, if not a direct promise of deliverance, and that this event is connected in some way with the birth of a child, as the sign or pledge of its certain occurrence. ——Either the prophet, while he foretells the birth of Christ, foretells that of another child, during whose infancy the promised deliverance shall be experienced; or else he makes the infancy of Christ himself, whether foreseen as still remote or not, the sign and measure of that same deliverance. While some diversity of judgment ought to be expected and allowed, in relation to this secondary question, there is no ground, grammatical, historical, or logical, for doubt as to the main point, that the church in all ages has been right in regarding this passage as a signal and explicit prediction of the miraculous conception and nativity of Jesus Christ. 17. The Lord will bring upon thee—days that have not come—even the king of Assyria. Let it be observed that the days here threatened were to be worse, not simply with respect to individual suffering or temporary difficulties of the state itself, but to the loss of its independence, its transition to a servile state, from which it was never permanently freed, the domination of Assyria being soon succeeded by that of Egypt, and this by that of Babylon, Persia, Syria, and Rome, the last ending only in the downfal of the state, and that general dispersion of the people which continues to this day.——It is implied, of course, in this interpretation, that Sennacherib's invasion was not the beginning of the days here threatened, which is rather to be sought in the alliance between Ahaz and Tiglath-pileser, "who came unto him, and distressed him, and strengthened him not," (2 Chr. xxviii. 19, 20,) but exacted repeated contributions from him as a vassal; which degrading and oppressive intercourse continued till his death, as appears from the statement, 2 Kin. xviii. 7, that "Hezekiah rebelled against the king of Assyria, and served him not," clearly implying that he did at first, as he offered to do afterwards, on Sennacherib's approach, with confession of his fault, a renewal of his tribute, and a repetition of his father's sacrilege, 2 Kin. xviii. 13—16. That during the whole term of this foreign ascendancy, Judah was infested by Assyrian intruders, and by frequent visitations for the purpose of extorting their unwilling tribute, till at last the revolt of Hezekiah, no longer able to endure the burthen, led to a formal occupation of the country, is not only probable in itself, but seems to be implied in the subsequent context, ver. 18—20.—A. See wood engraving taken from one of the sculptures recently found on a mound at Nimroud, on the left bank of the Tigris, and now in the British Museum. Without affirming that it represents one or other of the events referred to in this note, the engraving may serve to illustrate them. The relievo whence the above is taken is a representation of 'the league or treaty of peace.' A king is supposed to have arrived at the frontier of his dominions. He has descended from his chariot to meet another king. The conqueror still retains the implements of war, and holds in his right hand two arrows perpendicularly, apparently a mystical sign of friendship. His adversary at the same time holds up his right hand, supposed by some to signify supplication; but may it not be expressive of swearing fealty as a tributary king? There is a common prisoner bowing in the dust, and thought to be kissing the feet of the clement conqueror. Immediately behind the great king are two eunuchs, each holding bows and quivers of arrows. 25. And on all hills. Not only the fields, not only the vineyards, shall be overrun with thorns and briers, but the very hills, now laboriously cultivated with the hand, shall be given up to like desolation. 'And all the hills;' that is, even all the hills 'which are digged with the hoe,' because inaccessible to the plough; 'thou shalt not go' even 'there, for fear of briers and thorns, and' being thus uncultivated, 'they shall be for a sending-place of cattle and a trampling-place of sheep;' that is, a place where cattle may be sent to pasture, and which may be trodden down by sheep. The reference is probably to the hills of Judæa, anciently cultivated to the very top, by means of terraces that still exist, for an account of which by eyewitnesses see Keith's Land of Israel, ch. xii., and Robinson's Palestine, vol. ii. p. 187. Thus understood, the verse merely strengthens the foregoing description, by declaring that even the most carefully cultivated portions of the land should not escape the threatened desolation. It is equally gratuitous, and therefore inadmissible, to take thorns and briers in a different sense from that which they have in the preceding verses, for example, in that of a thorn hedge, implying that the vineyard should no longer be enclosed, (Grotius, Cocceius, Vitringa,) an arbitrary change which cannot be justified by Matthew Henry's epigrammatic observation, that the thorns, instead of growing where they would be useful, should spring up in abundance where they were not wanted.—A.

CHAP. VIII.—7. The waters of the river; that is, the Euphrates, as an emblem of Assyrian power. As the king of Assyria, and all his glory; having particular reference to military strength and display. See wood engraving, in loc. 14. For a sanctuary, (a holy thing, an object to be sanctified.) The quotations, Lu. i. 35; 1 Pet. ii. 7; Rom. ix. 33, seem to shew that the prophet's words have an extensive import, and are not to be restricted either to his own times or the time of Christ. The doctrine of the text is, that even the most glorious exhibitions of God's holiness; that is, of his infinite perfection, may occasion the destruction of the unbeliever. The most signal illustration of this general truth was that afforded in the advent of the Saviour. It was frequently exemplified, however, in the interval, and one of these exemplifications was afforded by the conduct of the unbelieving Jews in the reign of Ahaz, to whom the only power that could save them was converted by their own unbelief into a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence. The same idea is then expressed by another simple and familiar figure, that of a snare or trap. Both figures naturally suggest the idea of inadvertence and unforeseen ruin.—A.

CHAP. IX. The division of the chapters is in this part of the book peculiarly unfortunate; the first part of the ninth (ver. 1—6) containing the conclusion of the eighth, and the first part of the tenth (ver. 1—4) the conclusion of the ninth. 6. A child is born. Emphatically 'born for us' and 'given to us,' as the 'Son' of God and the 'Son' of man, as being 'wonderful' in his person, works, and sufferings,—a 'counsellor,' prophet, or authoritative teacher of the truth, a wise administrator of the church, and confidential adviser of the individual believer, —a real man, and yet the 'mighty God,—eternal' in his own existence, and the 'giver of eternal life' to others,—the great peace-maker between God and man, between Jew and Gentile, the umpire between nations, the abolisher of war and the giver of internal peace to all who "being justified by faith have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ," Rom. v. 1.—A. The ancient Jews incontestably referred it to the Messiah. Thus the Targum of Jonathan renders it, 'His name shall be called God of wonderful counsel, man abiding for ever, the Messiah, whose peace shall be multiplied upon us in his days.' The older interpreters unanimously suppose that this refers to the Messiah; and this view was entertained by the Jews in ancient times. Thus Rabbi Jose, of Galilee, says, 'The name of the Messiah is Shalom,' as it is said in Isa. ix. 6, "Father of eternity, Prince of peace." Ben Sira (fol. 40, of the Amsterdam edition, 1679,) numbers among the eight names of the Messiah those also taken from this passage, Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty God, Prince of Peace. The latter Jews, however, have rejected this interpretation, because the Messiah is here described as God, contrary to their system of doctrines. 7. Throne of David. The endless increase of power and prosperity on the throne of David means of course that the Prince whose reign was to be thus powerful and prosperous, would be a descendant of David. This is indeed a repetition and explanation of a promise given to David, 2 Sam. vii. 11—16; 1 Kin. viii. 25, and repeatedly referred to by him, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1—5; Ps. ii., xlv., lxxii., lxxxix., cxxxii. Hence the Messiah is not only called the Branch or Son of David, 2 Sam. vii. 12, 13; Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15, but David himself, Jer. xxx. 9; Eze. xxxiv. 23, 24; xxxvii. 24; Hos. iii. 5. The two reigns are identified, not merely on account of an external resemblance or a typical relation, but because the one was really a restoration or continuation of the other. Both kings were heads of the same body, the one a temporal head, the other spiritual; the one temporary, the other eternal. The Jewish nation, as a spiritual body, is really continued in the Christian church. The subject of the prophecy is the reign of the Messiah; the effect predicted, its stability and increase; the means to be employed, judgment and justice; the efficient cause, the zeal of Jehovah.—A. The zeal. The word here used denotes ardour, intense desire in accomplishing an object, and means here that the establishment of this kingdom was an object of intense and ardent desire on the part of Jehovah, and that he would accomplish it. It is also implied that nothing else than that zeal of Jehovah could do it. We may remark here, 1. That if Jehovah feels so intense a desire for this, then the subjects of the Messiah's reign should also feel this. 2. If Jehovah feels this zeal, and if he will certainly accomplish this, then Christians should be encouraged in their efforts to spread the Gospel. His purpose to do this is their only encouragement,—and a sufficient encouragement,—to excite their zeal in this great and glorious work.

CHAP. X.—28. He is come to Aiath. The places here enumerated seem to have belonged chiefly or wholly to the tribes of Benjamin and Judah. Some of them are still in existence, and the site of several has been recently determined by the personal observations and inquiries of Robinson and Smith. The catalogue begins at the frontier of the kingdom of Judah, and, as J. D. Michaelis suggests, at the first place conquered by the Israelites on taking possession of the land. The language is precisely that of an eyewitness describing at the moment what he actually sees. 'He is come to Aiath—he is passed to Migron —to Michmash he intrusts his baggage.' For the best illustration of the geographical details in verses 28, 32, see Robinson's Palestine, vol. ii., pp. 104, 151. —A. 33. Shall lop the bough. In ver. 18, 19, the prophet had described the army of the Assyrians as a magnificent forest. Here he says that the glory of that army should be destroyed, as the vitality and beauty of the waving bough of a tree is quickly destroyed when it is lopped with an axe. There can scarcely be conceived a description that would more beautifully represent the fading of the strength of the army of the Assyrian than this. With terror. With tremendous violence.

CHAP. XI.—1. Come forth a rod. A twig or shoot. Between the Assyrian and the person who is the subject of this chapter there is a most striking and beautiful contrast. The one was at first magnificent like a vast spreading forest, yet should soon fall and decay; the other was the little sprout of a decayed tree, which should yet rise, expand, and flourish. Of Jesse. The father of David. It means, that he who is here spoken of should be of the family of Jesse or David. Though Jesse had died, and though the ancient family of David should fall into decay, yet there should arise from that family a descendant. The beauty of this description is apparent if we bear in recollection that, when the Messiah was born, the ancient and much honoured family of David had fallen into decay; that the mother of Jesus, though appertaining to that family, was poor, obscure, and unknown; and that, to all appearance, the glory of the family had departed. Yet from that, as from a long decayed root in the ground, he should spring who would restore the family to more than its ancient glory, and shed additional lustre on the honoured name of Jesse. 6. The wolf also. Calvin and Hengstenberg suppose the passage to include a promise of a future change in the material creation, restoring it to its original condition, (Rom. viii. 19—22,) while they agree with other writers in regarding the pacific effects of true religion as the primary subject of the prophecy. 7. The lion. The lion's eating straw denotes a total change of habit, and indeed of nature, and is therefore a fit emblem for the revolution which the Gospel, in proportion to its influence, effects in the condition of society, with some allusion, possibly, as before suggested, to the ultimate deliverance of the κτισις or irrational creation from that bondage of corruption, to which, for man's sake, it is now subjected.—A. 8. And the sucking child. An emblem here of harmlessness and innocence. The change in the world under the Messiah shall be as great as if a sucking infant should be able to play unharmed with a venomous serpent.

> 'The lambs with wolves shall graze the verdant mead,
> And boys in flowery bands the tigers lead,
> The steer and lion at one crib shall meet,
> And harmless serpents lick the pilgrim's feet.
> The smiling infant in his hand shall take
> The crested basilisk and speckled snake;
> Pleased, the green lustre of the scales survey,
> And with the forked tongue shall innocently play.

ment of the last twenty-seven chapters, because, they maintain, there had not been time when Isaiah lived for the growth of such opinions. To which the obvious answer is that prophecy is not a natural growth, but a Divine revelation, which fact the objection ignores or repudiates. Not even the occurrence of the name of Cyrus offers any difficulty to those who believe the prophets spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost: it was as easy for Divine omniscience to reveal the name of Cyrus before he was born as anything else.

So much has been written in defence of the disputed portions of Isaiah that a bare list of writers would occupy considerable space. They all belong to modern times, of necessity, because the first to throw a doubt upon the last twenty-seven chapters was Koppe, a German, about 1780. The more important defenders of the book, who have written in English, are considerably later, as Henderson, Barnes, Professor Alexander, and the Dean of Canterbury, Dr. Payne Smith. The arguments used are both external and internal. Thus

9. As the waters cover the sea. 'They,' indefinitely, men in general, 'shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, because the land is full of the knowledge of Jehovah,' literally, of knowing him, 'like the waters covering the sea.' The strict sense of the words is, 'covering with respect to the sea.' The point of comparison is not the mere extent of surface (Vatablus) nor the depth (Vitringa), but the fulness of the land to the extent of its capacity. This passage is descriptive of the reign of the Messiah, not at any one period, but as a whole. A historian, as Vitringa well observes, in giving a general description of the reign of David, would not use language applicable only to its beginning. The prophecy is therefore one of gradual fulfilment. So far as the cause operates, the effect follows, and when the cause shall operate without restraint the effect will be complete and universal. The use of the future in the first clause, and the preterite in the second, may imply, that the prevalence of the knowledge of Jehovah must precede that of universal peace. It is not till the land 'has been filled' with that knowledge, that men 'will cease' to injure and destroy.—A. 11. Remnant of his people. Deu. xxviii. 62, 64; Jer. xxiv. 9, 10; xv. 7; xlvi. 27, 28; Eze. v. 10; xii. 15; Am. ix. 9. From all these, and from numerous other passages in the Old Testament, it is evident that it was designed that the Jewish nation should never be wholly destroyed; that they should be scattered among the nations, but should still be a distinct people; that while other nations should be utterly wasted and ruined, and should wholly cease to exist, yet that a remnant of the Jewish people, with the national peculiarities and customs, should still survive. How entirely this has been fulfilled, the remarkable history of the Jewish people everywhere testifies. Their present condition on the earth as a people scattered in all nations, yet surviving, without a king and a temple, yet preserving their national prejudices and peculiarities, is a most striking fulfilment of the prophecy. See Bishop Newton on the Prophecies, and Keith's Evidence of the Fulfilment of Prophecy, pp. 64—82. Recover the remnant. A prophecy of the recovery of the Israelites. Pathros. One of the three ancient divisions of Egypt. Cush. Cush, among the Hebrews, usually denoted the southern parts of Arabia. Elam. The southern part of Persia. Shinar. A part of Babylonia. Hamath. A celebrated city of Syria. The Assyrians became masters of this city about 753 years B.C., 2 Ki. xvii. 24. Islands of the sea. These meant, among the Hebrews, distant regions of the sea, whether coasts or islands. 12. An ensign. The Messiah, ver. 10. 13. Ephraim shall not envy Judah, &c. There shall be no strife like tike that subsisting between Israel and Judah. 14. But they shall fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines; that is, invade their borders. The conversion of all the enemies of God should speedily follow that of the Jews, and thus they should be conquered to the Messiah. 15. Shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea, &c. It should be dried up, to present no obstruction. The idea is, that God would remove the obstruction to the rapid and complete deliverance and conversion of men. 16. There shall be an highway, &c. The same idea is conveyed; all obstructions shall be removed, just as formerly at the Red sea. It is obvious from such prophecies that God yet intends to make great use of the Jews in spreading Messiah's kingdom.—Cobbin's Domestic Bible.

CHAP. XIII.—1. The burden, a threatening prophecy, of Babylon. Babylon (derived from Babel, and probably built on the same spot as the tower of Babel,) was the capital of Babylonia, or Chaldea, and was probably built by Nimrod; but it was a long period before it obtained its subsequent size and splendour. It stood in the midst of a large plain, and on a very deep and fertile soil. It was on both sides of the river Euphrates, and of course was divided by that river into two parts. The two parts were connected by a bridge sixty feet in width near the centre of the city; and there is also said to have been a tunnel or subterranean passage, made from the palace on the east of the river to the palace on the west under the river. The old city was on the east, and the new city, built by Nebuchadnezzar, was on the west. According to the lowest estimates, it could not have been less than twelve miles square, or forty-eight miles in circumference; and was at least eight times as large in extent as London and its appendages. The walls of Babylon are said by Herodotus to have been eighty-seven feet thick, and three hundred and fifty high. There were a hundred gates of solid brass, between every two of which were three towers, raised ten feet above the wall. The whole city was surrounded by an immense ditch. See Edin. Ency.; Calmet; Bishop Newton, and Keith on the Prophecies. It is to be borne in mind, however, in order to a just view of this prophecy, that Babylon did not attain its highest splendour and magnificence until after the time of Isaiah. It was under Nebuchadnezzar, who ascended the throne of Babylon about one hundred years after Isaiah died, that it rose to its highest degree of splendour and power. Babylon was the natural seat of empire in the East, and was early distinguished for its commercial advantages. A simple glance at the map of Asia will convince any one that somewhere in the vicinity of Babylon is the natural seat of power in the East, and that few places on the globe are more eligibly situated for a vast trade, as it was conducted before the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope. Thus by the fertility of the soil, by its size and strength, by its strong and lofty walls, by its commercial advantages, and by every thing that could contribute to the defence of an ancient city, Babylon seemed to be safe; and if there was any ancient city that appeared to bid defiance to the attacks of enemies, or to the ravages of time, it was Babylon. Yet Isaiah said that it should be destroyed; and in the course of our exposition we shall be greatly struck, not only with the certain fulfilment of the prediction, but with the wonderful accuracy and minuteness of the entire prophetic statement. 4. The noise. By a beautiful poetic image, the prophet represents himself as immediately, on the issuing of this command, listening to the tumult and noise caused by those who were assembling for war; by the gathering together of nations; by their assembling from a far country to destroy the whole land. 17. I will stir up the Medes against them. At the time when this prophecy was uttered, Media was a dependent province of the kingdom of Assyria. Six years they passed in a sort of anarchy, until, about seven hundred years before Christ, they found in Dejoces an upright statesman, who was proclaimed king by universal consent. His son and successor, Phraortes, subdued the Persians and all upper Asia, and united them to his kingdom. He also attacked Assyria, and laid siege to Nineveh, the capital, but was defeated. Nineveh was finally taken by his successor, Cyaxares, with the aid of his ally, the king of Babylon; and Assyria became a province of Media. This widely extended empire was delivered by him to his son Astyages, the father of Cyrus. Astyages reigned about thirty-five years, and then delivered the vast kingdom to Cyrus, about five hundred and fifty-six years before Christ, under whom the prediction of Isaiah respecting Babylon was fulfilled. 19. As when God overthrew Sodom. It does not mean that it shall be overthrown in the same manner as Sodom was, but that it should be as completely and entirely ruined. 20. It shall never be inhabited. This has been completely fulfilled; for centuries it has remained a scene of wide desolation, and a heap of ruins. Neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there. The wandering tribes of Arabs should even shun it as a resting-place for a single night. Neither shall the shepherds, &c. This was a fertile spot, and, though in a desolate state, might yet have furnished pasturage; but the whole region, after Babylon was taken, was laid under water by the Euphrates, and became a stagnant pool. It is said that the Arabs cannot be persuaded to stay there a night. 21. But wild beasts. Dens of these are in various parts, and travellers have seen lions, hyenas, and jackals about the ruins; bats, owls, porcupines, &c., are also found there. Satyrs. Some uncommon creatures of the goat kind.—Domestic Bible. For striking proofs of the fulfilment of the various parts of this prediction, see Keith on the Prophecies. On this whole prophecy, we may observe, 1. That it was uttered at least a hundred and seventy years before it was fulfilled. 2. When uttered, there was the strongest improbability that it would be fulfilled. This improbability arose from the following circumstances: (a) The Jews were safe and secure in their own land, and they had no alliance with Babylon, nor any reason to dread the Babylonians. (b) The great strength and security of Babylon rendered it improbable. (c) It was improbable that it would be overthrown by the Medes. Media was, at the time when the prophecy was uttered, a dependent province of Assyria, (Note, ver. 17;) and it was wholly improbable that the Medes would revolt; that they would capture Nineveh; that they would subdue their masters; that they would be united to the Persians, and that thus a new kingdom would arise, that should overthrow the most mighty capital of the world. (d) It was improbable that Babylon would become uninhabitable. How could mere human sagacity have foreseen that there would not be a house in it in the sixteenth century; or that now (in 1839) it would be a wide and dreary waste? Can human foresight tell distinctly what will take place two thousand three hundred years beforehand? Can any man now tell what London, or Paris, or New York, or Philadelphia will be two thousand years hence? Yet a prediction that those cities shall be the residence of 'wild beasts of the desert,' of 'satyrs,' and 'dragons,' and that they should never be inhabited, would be as probable now as was the prediction respecting Babylon at the time when Isaiah uttered these remarkable prophecies. 3. The prophecy is not vague conjecture. It is not a general statement. It is not the result of political sagacity. It is a minute, and definite, and particular statement; and those statements have been as definitely, and minutely, and particularly, fulfilled. 4. This is one of the evidences of the Divine origin of the Bible. How will the infidel account for this prophecy and its fulfilment? It will not do to say that it is accident. It is too minute, and too particular. It is not human sagacity. No human sagacity could have foretold it. It is not fancied fulfilment. It is real, in the most minute particulars. And, if so, then Isaiah was commissioned by Jehovah, as he claimed to be,—for none but the omniscient Jehovah can foresee and describe future events as the destruction of Babylon was foreseen and described. And, if this prophecy was inspired by God, by the same train of reasoning it can be proved that the whole Bible is a revelation from heaven.

CHAP. XIV. This chapter is a continuation of the prophecy respecting Babylon which was commenced in the previous chapter. The prophecy is concluded at ver. 27 of this chapter. A considerable portion of this chapter is a poem of unequalled beauty and sublimity. 'I believe it may be affirmed,' says Lowth, 'that there is no poem of its kind extant in any language in which the subject is so well laid out, and so happily conducted, with such a richness of invention, with such a variety of images, persons, and distinct actions, with such rapidity and ease of transition in so small a compass, as in this ode of Isaiah. For beauty of disposition, strength of colouring, greatness of sentiment, brevity, perspicuity and force of expression, it stands among all the monuments of antiquity unrivalled.'

CHAP. XVI. This chapter is a continuance of the former, and the scope of it is to give advice to the Moabites, and to threaten them with punishment in case, as the prophet foresaw, they should neglect or refuse to follow it. 1. Sela. The word Sela means a rock; and by it here there can be no doubt that there is intended the city of that name which was the capital of Arabia Petrea. The city was situated within the bounds of Arabia, or Idumæa, but was probably at this time in the possession of the Moabites. It was, therefore, the remotest part of their territory, and the sense may be, 'Send tribute even from the remotest part of your land.' See Supplementary Note, 2 Kin. xiv. 14. And the remnant. What is left in the land. There shall be few cities, few men, and very little wealth that shall escape the desolation. On the present state of Moab, and the complete fulfilment of the prophecies respecting it, the following works may be consulted:—Newton on the Prophecies, Keith on the Prophecies, Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, Captains Irby and Mangles' Travels, and Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible. In regard to the fulfilment of these predictions respecting the destruction of Moab, it may be sufficient to remark, that all travellers concur in the general desolation of that country which was once so thickly studded with towns, and that abounded so richly in flocks, and produced so luxuriantly the grape. It is now a country strewed with ruins. All the cities of Moab have disappeared. Their place is characterised, in the map of Volney's Travels, by the ruins of towns. Burckhardt, who encountered many difficulties in so desolate and dangerous a land, thus records the brief history of a few of them 'The ruins of Eleale, Hesebon, Meon, Medaba, Dibon, Arver. all situated on the north side of the Arnon, still subsist to illustrate the history of the Beni Israel.'—Life and Travels, prefixed to the Travels in Nubia, pp. 48, 49. 'And it might be added,' says Keith, 'that they still subsist to confirm the inspiration of the Jewish Scriptures, for the desolation of each of these cities was the theme of a distinct prediction.'—Prophecies, p. 129. Within the boundaries of Moab, Burckhardt enumerates about fifty ruined cities, many of them extensive. In general they are a broken down and undistinguishable mass of ruins. But, in some instances, there are remains of temples, sepulchral monuments, traces of hanging gardens, entire columns lying on the ground, and dilapidated walls made of stones of large dimensions.—See Travels in Syria, pp. 311—456, and illustrative heading of the Book. In view of the 15th and 16th chapters, constituting one prophecy, and the facts in regard to the present state of the country of Moab, we may observe that we have here an evidence of the genuineness and truth of the sacred records. That evidence is found in the particularity with which places are mentioned; and in the fact that impostors would not specify times or places any farther than was unavoidable. Mistakes, we all know, are liable to be made by those who attempt to describe the geography of places which they have not seen. Yet here is a description of a land and its numerous towns, made nearly three thousand years ago, and in its particulars it is sustained by all the travellers in modern times. In the language of Prof. Stuart (Bib. Repos., vol. vii., pp. 108, 109,) we may say, 'How happens it, now, that the authors of the Old Testament Scriptures should have possessed such a wonderful tact in geography, as it would seem they did, unless they lived at the time and in the countries of which they have spoken? This happens not elsewhere. It is but yesterday since one of the first scientific writers on geology in Great Britain published to the world the declaration that our Mississippi and Missouri rivers belong to the tropics. Respectable writers, even in Germany, the land of classical attainments, have sometimes placed Cœle-Syria on the east of the Anti-Libanus ridge, or even seemed to transfer Damascus over the mountains, and place it between the two Lebanon ridges in the valley.' No such mistakes occur in the sacred writers. They write as men who were familiar with the geography of places named, they mention places with the utmost familiarity; and, after a lapse of almost three thousand years, every successive traveller who visits Moab, Idumæa, or Palestine, does something to it is observed that the genuineness of the whole book was never questioned, either by Jews or Christians, until the close of the eighteenth century; the whole book is found in all Hebrew copies, and in all the ancient versions; and it is attested both in the Apocrypha and in the New Testament. It is alleged that a unity of design pervades the whole book, that the language is similar throughout, and that later prophets seem to have been acquainted with the book as we possess it. Dr. Davidson, in "Horne's Introduction," thinks that incorrect views of the nature of Biblical prophecy lie at the basis of many of the objections to the last twenty-seven chapters; and that another fundamental error is the making the whole of this portion turn upon the deliverance of Israel from the Babylonish exile. The two errors are indeed very closely connected; and it is almost necessary that men who doubt the reality of prophecy, or restrict it to the narrowest limits, should identify the date of these predictions with their prominent theme, and call that theme the confirm the accuracy of Isaiah. Towns, bearing the same name, or the ruins of towns, are located in the same relative position in which he said they were; and the ruins of once splendid cities, broken columns, dilapidated walls, trodden down vineyards, half-demolished temples, and fragments broken and consumed by time, proclaim to the world that those cites are what he said they would be, and that he was under the inspiration of God.

CHAP. XVIII. The two great powers of Western Asia, in the days of Isaiah, were Assyria and Egypt or Ethiopia, the last two being wholly or partially united under Tirhakah, whose name and exploits are recorded in Egyptian monuments still extant, (see Supplementary Note, 2 Chr. xxxvi.,) and who is expressly said in Scripture (2 Kin. xix. 9) to have come out against Sennacherib. With one or other of these great contending powers Judah was commonly confederate, and of course at war with the other. Hezekiah is explicitly reproached by Rabshakeh (ch. xxxvi. 9) with relying upon Egypt, that is, the Ethiopico-Egyptian empire. These historical facts, together with the mention of Cush in ver. 1, and the appropriateness of the figures in ver. 4, 5, to the destruction of Sennacherib's army, give great probability to the hypothesis now commonly adopted, that the prophet here announces that event to Ethiopia, as about to be effected by a direct interposition of Jehovah, and without human aid. At the same time, some of the expressions here employed admit of so many interpretations, that it is best to give the whole as wide an application as the language will admit, on the ground before suggested, that it constitutes a part of a generic prophecy or picture of God's dealings with the foes of his people, including illustrations drawn from particular events, such as the downfal of Syria and Israel, and the slaughter of Sennacherib's army.—A. 1. Woe. Rather signifies, 'Ho!' it does not mean a threatening, but a call. Land shadowing with wings. This is supposed by some to denote the protection which the people's god extended over the land. (See wood engraving.) Some have made the prophecy relate to Egypt and Israel; but Dr. Henderson adopts the opinion maintained by several modern critics, that Ethiopia is intended. He says, 'To no country could the words at the time more aptly apply than to Ethiopia. Its armies were exceedingly numerous. If, as there is reason to believe, Zerah, mentioned 2 Chr. xiv. 9, was king of the African Ethiopians, that people was able to bring into the field, in the reign of Asa, not fewer than a million of men, "a huge host with very many chariots and horsemen," ch. xvi. 8; and Tirhakah was so celebrated as a mighty conqueror, that Megasthenes mentions his having advanced as far as the pillars of Hercules, and classes him along with Sesostris and Nebuchadnezzar.' Beyond the rivers of Ethiopia. 'Cush,' now known by the name of Abyssinia. It was at times subject to the Pharaohs; at other times, Upper Egypt was subject to its monarchs: the latter was the case when Isaiah wrote. 2. That sendeth ambassadors by the sea. From their bordering upon the Red sea, the Ethiopians must have carried on a maritime intercourse with the opposite coast of Arabia, and eastwards in the direction of India, if they did not trade with that country itself, in vessels of bulrushes, 'of papyrus,' that is, the Egyptian reed. Of this material the vessel was constructed to which Moses was committed, Ex. ii. 2. Go, ye swift messengers. The vast power and extensive influence of Tirhakah would require an incessant transmission of despatches to foreign parts, the facilities of which by water were great. There is here evidently a reference to the swiftness with which they proceeded on their embassies in the papyrus boats. To a nation. The prophet calls upon the messengers to go with all celerity to Ethiopia, to announce the wonderful interposition of Jehovah for the deliverance of the Jews. Information would first of all be conveyed to Tirhakah and his army in Egypt, and then to the Thebaid and Ethiopia; so that the whole nation would become acquainted with the way in which their formidable enemy, Sennacherib, had been overthrown. Scattered and peeled. Henderson reads, 'drawn out and plucked,' which he considers as expressing the state of the Ethiopian nation during the extensive wars of Tirhakah, when the mass of the people were 'drawn out,' or taken away from their occupations and homes.—Domestic Bible.

CHAP. XIX. This chapter admits of a well defined division into two parts, one of which contains threatenings, ver. 1—17, and the other promises, ver. 18—25. The first part may again be subdivided. In ver. 1—4, the Egyptians are threatened with a penal visitation from Jehovah, with the downfal of their idols, with intestine commotions, with the disappointment of their superstitious hopes, and with subjection to hard masters. In ver. 5—10, they are threatened with physical calamities, the drying up of their streams, the decay of vegetation, the loss of their fisheries, and the destruction of their manufactures. In ver. 11—17 the wisdom of their wise men is converted into folly, the courage of their brave men into cowardice, industry universally suspended, and the people filled with dread of the anger of Jehovah. The second part may be also subdivided. In ver. 18—21, the Egyptians are described as acknowledging the true God, in consequence of what they had suffered at his hand, and the deliverance which he had granted them. In ver. 22—25, the same cause is described as leading to an intimate union between Egypt, Assyria, and Israel, in the service of Jehovah, and the enjoyment of his favour. 25. Whom the Lord of hosts shall bless. 'Which Jehovah of hosts has blessed,' or 'with which Jehovah of hosts has blessed it,' saying, 'Blessed be my people Egypt, and the work of my hands Assyria, and my heritage' or peculiar people 'Israel.' The perfect union of the three great powers in the service of God, and the enjoyment of his favour, is now expressed by a solemn benediction on the three, in which language commonly applied to Israel exclusively is extended to Egypt and Assyria. The force of the expressions would be much enhanced by the habitual associations of a Jewish reader. It arises very much from the surprise excited by the unexpected termination of the clauses. Instead of 'Blessed be my people Israel,' the formula is 'blessed be my people Egypt.' That 'the work of my hands' does not mean merely 'my creature,' or a creature perfectly at my disposal, but my creature in a special and a spiritual sense, the same in which God is said to be the maker or founder of Israel, (Deu. xxxii. 6; ch. xliii. 6, 7,) is evident from this consideration, that the clause would otherwise say nothing peculiar or distinctive of Assyria, as those before and after it do of Egypt and Israel. As to the application of the prophecy there are three distinct opinions. One is that the prophet here anticipates a state of peace and international communion between Egypt, Israel, and Assyria in his own times, which may or may not have been actually realised. Another is that he predicts what actually did take place under the reign of Alexander and the two great powers that succeeded him, namely, the Græco-Syrian and Egyptian monarchies, by which the true religion was protected and diffused, and the way prepared for the preaching of the Gospel. A third is that Egypt and Assyria are here named as the two great heathen powers known to the Jews, whose country lay between them, and was often the scene if not the subject of their contests, so that for ages they were commonly in league with the one against the other. To describe these two great belligerent powers as at peace with Israel and one another, was not only to foretell a most surprising revolution in the state of the world, but to intimate at least a future change in the relation of the Jews and Gentiles. When he goes still farther, and describes these representatives of heathenism as received into the covenant and sharing with the church of God its most distinctive titles, we have one of the clearest and most striking predictions of the calling of the Gentiles that the word of God contains. One advantage of this exposition is that while it thus extends and elevates the scope of the prediction, it retains unaltered whatever there may be of more specific prophecy or of coincidence with history. If Alexander is referred to, and the spread of Judaism under him and his successors, and the general pacification of the world and progress of refinement, these are so many masterly strokes added to the great prophetic picture; but they cannot be extracted from it and made to constitute a picture by themselves.—A.

CHAP. XXI.—11. Dumah. It is evident from the prophecy itself, that Idumæa is particularly referred to, for the prophet immediately adds, that the voice came to him from mount 'Seir,' which was the principal mountain of Idumæa. Idumæa, or the country of Edom, is frequently referred to by the prophets: see Jer. xlix. 7—10, 12—18; Eze. xxxv. 1—4, 7, 9, 14, 15; Joel iii. 19; Am. i. 11; Oba. ver. 1—18; Mal. i. 3, 4. For a description of Idumæa, and of the prophecies respecting it, see Supplementary Notes on ch. xxxiv.

CHAP. XXII.—16. Sepulchre on high. The labour and expense bestowed on ancient sepulchres (of far later date however than Isaiah's time) is still attested by the tombs remaining at Jerusalem, Petrea, and Persepolis, where some are excavated near the tops of lofty rocks in order to be less accessible, to which practice there may be allusion in the verse before us, as well as in the words of 2 Chr. xxxii. 33, as explained by most interpreters, namely, that Hezekiah was buried in the highest of the tombs of the sons of David.—See Robinson's Palestine, i., 516—539; ii. 525, and wood engraving in loc.

CHAP. XXIII. Tyre. Tyre, the subject of the prophecies, particularly of Isaiah and Ezekiel, who both predicted its overthrow, (ch. xxiii., Eze. xxvi.—xxix.,) was a celebrated city of Phœnicia, and is usually mentioned in connexion with Sidon: Mat. xi. 21, 22; Lu. x. 13, 14; Mat. xv. 21; Mar. iii. 8; vii. 24, 31. Tyre was distinguished for its enterprise, its commercial importance, its luxury, and its magnificence. Few, perhaps none, of the cities of antiquity were more favourably situated for commerce. It was also a place of great strength. Old Tyre was defended by a wall which was regarded as impregnable. Nebuchadnezzar took the city after a siege of thirteen years, during the time of the Jewish captivity, about five hundred and seventy-three years before Christ. This was in accordance with the prophecy in this chapter, (ver. 13,) and according to the predictions also in Ezekiel. The desolation was entire. The city was destroyed, and the inhabitants driven into foreign lands, (ver. 7, 12.) The city lay desolate for seventy years, (ver. 15, 17,) and Old Tyre was in ruins in the time of the invasion of Alexander the Great. A new city had risen, however, on the island, called New Tyre, and this city was taken by Alexander after a siege of eight months, and after he had made a causeway from Old Tyre to the new city out of the ruins of the former. Near the shore the water is said to have been shallow, but near the new city it was three fathoms or nineteen feet in depth. The city of Tyre was taken by Alexander three hundred and thirty-two years before Christ, and two hundred and forty-one years after its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, and consequently about one hundred and seventy years after it had been rebuilt. It was not, however, entirely destroyed by Alexander. It became an object of contention to the successors of Alexander. It was successively invested by Antigonus and Ptolemy, and fell into the hands of the latter. In the apostolic age, it seems to have regained somewhat of its ancient splendour. There were some Christians here, Acts xxi. 3, 4. In the time when it was visited by Volney and Maundrell, it was a miserable village, where the inhabitants subsisted chiefly by fishing, and the rock of Tyre was a place on which they spread their nets. Its exports consist only of a few sacks of corn and cotton, and the only merchant of which it could boast in the time when Volney was there, was a solitary Greek, who could hardly gain a livelihood. See Calmet; Edin. Ency.; Newton on the Prophecies; Keith on the Prophecies; and the Travels of Volney and Maundrell.

CHAP. XXIV.—20. Like a cottage. Or, rather, shall move or vacillate like a cottage. The word cottage means, properly, a temporary shed or lodge for the watchman of a garden or vineyard, while the fruit was ripening. 21. That day, &c. The sense may simply be, that God will judge the high or lofty host, namely, the kings of the land upon the land. But even if there be an antithesis, and even if the host of heaven in the usual sense of the expression be alluded to, the analogy of this whole context would seem to indicate that this is merely a strong figure for different ranks or degrees of dignity on earth. 22. And they. The persons meant are of course the principalities and powers of the verse preceding. 23. The moon shall be confounded. The simple meaning of the verse appears to be that Jehovah's reign over his people shall be more august than that of any created sovereign. This is true of the church in various periods of history, but more especially in those when the presence and power of God are peculiarly manifested.—A. It may be added, that when Jehovah, by the Messiah, shall reign over all the earth, all the glory of the wisest and greatest princes and monarchs shall be dimmed; the celebrity of their wisdom, and power, and plans shall be obscured in the superior splendour of the wisdom, power, and plans of God, in reigning through the laws of his Son over the human race. Come that blessed day; and speedily let the glory of the moon be confounded, and the sun be ashamed, and all inferior magnificence fade away before the splendour of the Sun of Righteousness!

CHAP. XXV.—8. Will wipe away tears from off all faces. This is quoted in Rev. xxi. 4, as applicable to the power of the Gospel. The sense is, that Jehovah would devise a plan that would be fitted to furnish entire consolation to the afflicted; to comfort the broken-hearted; and that would, in its final triumphs, remove calamity and sorrow from men for ever. The fulness of this plan will be seen only in heaven. In anticipation of heaven, however, the Gospel now does much to alleviate human woes, and to wipe away tears from the mourner's eyes. This passage is exquisitely beautiful. The poet Burns once said that he could never read it without being affected to tears. It may be added, that nothing but the Gospel will do this. No other religion can furnish such consolations; and no other religion is, therefore, adapted to man.

CHAP. XXVIII.—9. Whom shall he teach. The true sense of the passage has undoubtedly been suggested by Lowth. 'What!' say they, 'does God treat us as children? Does he deal with us as we deal with infants just weaned, perpetually repeating and inculcating the same elementary lesson, and teaching the mere rudiments of knowledge?' The expression, therefore, "Whom shall he teach knowledge?" or, 'whom does he teach,' is an expression of contempt supposed to be spoken by the intemperate priests and prophets—the leaders of the people. 'Whom does God take us to be? Does he regard us as mere children? Why are we treated as children with the mere rudiments of knowledge, and with endless repetition of the same elementary instruction?'

CHAP. XXIX.—8. A thirsty man dreameth. As the simile of the prophet is drawn from nature, an extract which describes the actual occurrence of such a circumstance will be agreeable. 'The scarcity of water,' says Park, 'was greater here at Bubaker than at Benown. Day and night the wells were crowded with cattle lowing and fighting with each other to come at the trough.

only one. That the captivity and restoration of Israel occupies a foremost place is scarcely to be questioned, but there is much which reaches to other, greater, and later events. The application of these last-named elements to the sufferings and glory of the Messiah, and to the Church of the future, is both natural and reasonable, and has been practised by expositors in all ages. Dr. Davidson (who subsequently refuted himself) placed these facts in their proper light in "Horne's Introduction;" and the curious reader cannot do better than compare his earlier defence with his later rejection of parts of Isaiah. We quite agree with him when, after a minute analysis of the objections of German critics, he says, "On the whole, we must express our conviction of the weakness attaching to the long and laboured arguments of Knobel and his fellows against the authenticity of the portion before us" (chapters xl.—lxvi.). Nor can we do better than quote him when he says, "On the supposition of these chapters being spurious, it is very difficult to give any rational explanation of their

Excessive thirst made many of them furious: others being too weak to contend for the water, endeavoured to quench their thirst by devouring the black mud from the gutters near the wells, which they did with great avidity, though it was commonly fatal to them. This great scarcity of water was felt by all the people of the camp, and by none more than myself. I begged water from the negro slaves that attended the camp, but with very indifferent success; for, though I let no opportunity slip, and was very urgent in my solicitations both to the Moors and to the negroes, I was but ill supplied, and frequently passed the night in the situation of Tantalus. No sooner had I shut my eyes, than fancy would convey me to the streams and rivers of my native land; there, as I wandered along the verdant bank, I surveyed the clear stream with transport, and hastened to swallow the delightful draught; but alas! disappointment awakened me, and I found myself a lonely captive, perishing of thirst amid the wilds of Africa.'—Travels in Africa. 23. But when he seeth his children. 'For in his seeing' (that is, when he sees) 'his children, the work of my hands, in the midst of him, they shall sanctify my name, and sanctify (or, yes they shall sanctify) the Holy One of Jacob, and the God of Israel they shall fear.' We have reason, wholly independent of this verse, to believe that the immediately preceding context has respect to the excision of the Jews and the vocation of the Gentiles. Now the latter are described in the New Testament as Abraham's (and consequently Jacob's) spiritual progeny, as such distinguished from his natural descendants. May not these adventitious or adopted children of the patriarch, constituted such by the electing grace of God, be here intended by the phrase, 'the work of my hands?' If so, the whole may thus be paraphrased: when he (the patriarch, supposed to be again alive and gazing at his offspring) shall behold his children (not by nature, but) created such by me, in the midst of him (that is, in the midst, or in the place, of his natural descendants,) they, (that is, he and his descendants jointly) shall unite in glorifying God as the author of this great revolution.—A. 24. They also that erred. 'Then shall the erring in spirit know wisdom, and the murmurers (or rebels) shall receive instruction.' These words would be perfectly appropriate as a general description of the reclaiming and converting influence to be exerted upon men in general. But under this more vague and comprehensive sense, the context, and especially the verse immediately preceding, seems to shew that there is one more specific and significant included. If the foregoing verse predicts the reception of the Gentiles into the family of Israel, and if this reception, as we learn from the New Testament, was connected with the disinheriting of most of the natural descendants, who are nevertheless to be restored hereafter, then the promise of this final restoration is a stroke still wanting to complete the fine prophetic picture now before us. That finishing stroke is given in this closing verse, which adds to the promise that the Gentiles shall become the heirs of Israel, another that the heirs of Israel according to the flesh shall themselves be restored to their long lost heritage, not by excluding their successors in their turn, but by peaceful and brotherly participation with them.—A.

CHAP. XXXIV. The thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth chapters make one distinct and beautiful prophecy, consisting of two parts, the first containing a denunciation of judgment on the enemies of the Jews and of Jehovah—particularly Edom, (ch. xxxiv.,) and the second a most beautiful description of the flourishing state of the people of God that should follow these judgments, ch. xxxv. Idumæa was the name given by the Greeks to the land of Edom, the country which was settled by Esau. The country which they occupied extended originally from the Dead sea to the Elanitic gulf of the Red sea. Their territory, however, they extended considerably by conquest, and carried their arms to the east and north-east of Moab, and obtained possession of the country of which Bozrah was the chief city. To this city they had had access through the intervening desert, without crossing the country of the Moabites, or Ammonites. The capital of East Idumæa was Bozrah; the capital of South Edom was Petra, or Sela, called in 2 Kin. xiv. 7, Joktheel. See Supplementary Note, ch. xvi. 1. This country received its name from Esau, the son of Isaac, and the twin brother of Jacob, and the elder of the two. He was called Edom, which signifies red, from the colour of the red pottage which he obtained from Jacob by the sale of his birthright, Gen. xxv. 30. After his marriage he removed to mount Seir, and made that his permanent abode, and the country adjacent to it received the name of Edom.——In the reign of Amaziah, king of Judah, the Edomites were attacked, and ten thousand of them fell in battle in the valley of Salt, and many were made prisoners; their capital, Selah, was taken by storm, and the two thousand captives were, by Amaziah's orders, thrown down the ragged precipices near the city, and dashed in pieces, 2 Kin. xiv. 7; 2 Chr. xxv. 12; Universal History, vol. i., p. 380, Ed. Lond. 1779, 8vo. When the Jews were subdued by the Babylonians, and carried captive, when their city and temple were destroyed and the land laid waste, they seem to have regarded it as a favourable opportunity to avenge all the injustices which they had suffered from the hands of the Jews. They joined the Babylonians in their attempts to subdue Jerusalem, and exulted in the fall and ruin of the city.

> "Remember, O LORD, the children of Edom
> In the day of Jerusalem; who said,
> Rase it, rase it, even to the foundation thereof."—Ps. cxxxvii. 7.

See particularly Oba. 10—12, 18; Eze. xxv. 12—14; xxxv. 3—15. It was for this especially that they were denounced and threatened by the prophets with heavy judgment, and with the utter destruction of the nation, ch. xxxiv. 5, 10—17; Jer. xlix. 7—10, 12—18; Eze. xxv. 12—15; xxxv. 1—15; Joel iii. 19; Am. i. 11; Oba. 2, 3, 8, 17, 18; Mal. i. 3, 4. This refusing to aid their brethren the Jews, and joining with the enemies of the people of God, and exulting in their success, was the great crime in their history which was to call down the Divine vengeance, and terminate in their complete and utter ruin. Their exultation did not long continue; and their cruelty to the Jews did not long remain unpunished. Five years after the taking of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar humbled all the states around Judæa, and particularly Idumæa, Jer. xxv. 15—26; Mal. i. 3, 4. John Hircanus afterwards entirely conquered them, and compelled them to receive circumcision and the law. They continued subject to the later kings of Judæa until Jerusalem was taken by the Romans. A part of them left their own land and settled in the southern part of Judæa, within the boundaries of the tribes of Simeon and Judah. The name Idumæa was transferred to this part of the land of Judæa which they occupied, and this is the Idumæa which is mentioned by Pliny, Ptolemy, Strabo, and other ancient writers. The people who remained in the vicinity of mount Seir, and who occupied the ancient territory of Idumæa, became mingled with the children of Nebaioth, a son of Ishmael, and were called ever afterwards by the name of Nabatheans. Their own kingdom was thus blotted out, and their name was lost. In their own land they ceased to be a separate people, and mingled with the other descendants of Ishmael; in Judæa they became, under John Hircanus, converts to the Jewish faith, received the rite of circumcision, and were incorporated with the Jews. Very interesting remains of cities and towns of Idumæa, and particularly Petra, have been recently discovered by the travellers Burckhardt and Seetzen. See Universal History, vol. i. 370—383; and the Travels of Burckhardt, Legh, Laborde, and Stephens; Keith on the Evidences of Prophecy, pp. 135—168.; and Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible, vol. i. 289, 336, and vol. ii. 723, 741. 6. And the streams thereof. This verse as Calvin well observes, announces nothing new, but repeats the same prediction under other figures, borrowed from the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, which throughout the Bible "are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire," Jude 7.—A. 10. Day and night it shall not be quenched; for ever shall its smoke go up; from generation to generation shall it lie waste, for ever and ever, there shall be no one passing through it. These sublime and fearful images are copied in the book of Rev. xiv. 10, 11, but it does not follow that the copy, though inspired and prophetic, was intended to determine the sense of the original. Rosenmuller and Knobel understand the last words as meaning that no one shall 'go to it,' or 'pass into it,' but Gesenius and Ewald with the older writers, that no one shall pass 'through' or 'over it,' implying that it shall not be a thoroughfare for caravans or single travellers. Keith, in his Evidences of Prophecy, has collected some remarkable illustrations of this passage from the incidental statements of modern travellers with respect to what was once the land of Edom. Thus Volney speaks of thirty deserted towns within three days' journey; Seetzen, of a wide tract utterly without a place of habitation, and of his own route through it as one never before attempted; Burckhardt, of the passage as declared by the people of the nearest inhabited districts to be impossible, in accordance with which notion he was unable to procure guides at any price. These are striking coincidences, and, as illustrations of the prophecy, important, but are not to be insisted on as constituting its direct fulfilment, for in that case the passage of these very travellers through the country would falsify the prediction which they are cited to confirm. The truth of the prophecy in this clause is really no more suspended on such facts, than that of the first clause and of the preceding verse upon the actual existence of bituminous streams and a sulphureous soil throughout the ancient Idumæa. The whole is a magnificent prophetic picture, the fidelity of which, so far as it relates to ancient Edom, is notoriously attested by its desolation for a course of ages.—A. 'I would,' says Stephens, when standing amidst the ruins of Petra, the capital of Idumæa, and with this passage of Isaiah in his eye, 'I would that the sceptic could stand as I did, among the ruins of this city among the rocks, and there open the sacred book, and read the words of the inspired penman, written when this desolate place was one of the greatest cities in the world.'—Incidents of Travel, vol. ii. p. 76.

CHAP. XXXV.—7. Parched ground. The Hebrew word, Sharab, properly denotes the heat of the sun, (ch. xlix. 10,) and then the phenomenon which is produced by the refraction of the rays of the sun on the glowing sands of a desert, and which gives the appearance of a sea or lake of water, so that the most experienced travellers are often deceived. This phenomenon is witnessed in the deserts of Arabia and Egypt, and has been also seen occasionally in the south of France, and in Russia. We have no word in English to express it. The French word by which it is commonly designated is mirage. The idea of the prophet, if he refers, as I suppose he does, to this phenomenon, is exceedingly beautiful. The hopes and promises which this world can furnish are as delusive as is the mirage to the exhausted and thirsty traveller. But the blessings of religion, the promises of God through the Messiah, are like real lakes of water and running streams to the thirsty traveller.

CHAP. XXXVII.—36. Then the angel of the Lord. The terms used can naturally signify nothing but a single instantaneous stroke of Divine vengeance, and the parallel passage (2 Kin. xix. 35) says expressly that the angel smote this number 'in that night.' Sceptical critics would be glad to have it in their power to plead the silence of profane tradition as an objection to the narrative before us. But although such an inference would be wholly inconclusive, even if the fact were so, it happens in this case that the fact is not so. The account which Herodotus received from the Egyptian priests, as to Sennacherib's retreat from Pelusium, occasioned by an irruption of field mice, which Vulcan sent to rescue Sethos, who was priest to that divinity as well as king of Egypt, is admitted by the latest German writers, notwithstanding the denial of Gesenius, to be an evident variation of this history, not more corrupt than in many other cases where the identity of origin has never been disputed. The transfer of the scene of the event to Egypt, and the substitution of Sethos and Vulcan for Hezekiah and Jehovah, are in strict accordance with the common practice of the ancient nations, to connect the most remarkable events, by their traditions, with their own early history. Even the figment of the mice may be regarded as a change of no unusual character or magnitude, unless we choose to assume, with J. D. Michaelis, that it was founded on a misconception of the mouse as the hieroglyphical emblem of destruction.—A. 38. Esar-haddon. The wood engraving in loc. is from the Assyrian marbles, and considered to be authentic.

CHAP. XXXVIII.—8. The shadow of degrees. It is most probable that it was an inclination of the rays of the sun, or a miraculous causing of the shadow itself to recede. This is the whole statement of the sacred writer; and this is all that is necessary to be supposed. What Hezekiah desired was a miracle; a sign that he should recover. That was granted. The retrocession of the shadow in this sudden manner was not a natural event. It could be caused only by God; and this was all that was needed. A simple exertion of Divine power on the rays of the sun which rested on the dial deflecting those rays, would accomplish the whole result. It may be added that it is not recorded, nor is it necessary to an understanding of the subject to suppose, that the bending of the rays was permanent, or that so much time was lost. The miracle was instantaneous, and was satisfactory to Hezekiah, though the rays of the sun casting the shadow may have again been soon returned to their regular position, and the shadow restored to the place in which it would have been had it not been interrupted. No infidel, therefore, can object to this statement, unless he can prove that this could not be done by Him who made the sun, and who is himself the fountain of power. By which degrees it was gone down. By the same steps, or degrees on which the shadow had descended. So the Seventy express it; "so the sun reascended the ten steps by which the shadow had gone down." It was the shadow on the dial which had gone down. The sun was ascending, and the consequence was, of course, that the shadow on a vertical dial would descend. The 'sun' here means, evidently, the sun as it appeared; the rays, or the shining of the sun. A return of the shadow was effected such as would be produced by the recession of the sun itself.

CHAP. XL. It is admitted, on all hands, that the second part of Isaiah, comprising the prophecies which commence at the fortieth chapter, and which continue to the end of the book, is to be regarded as the most sublime, and to us the most important, part of the Old Testament. In the previous portions of his prophecies there was much that was local and temporary. Indeed, all, or nearly all, that occurs from ch. i. to ch. xxxix. had direct and immediate reference to the times in which the prophet lived, or was suggested by the events which occurred in those times. For though the mind of the prophet is carried forward by the laws of prophetic suggestion, and he describes the times of the Messiah, yet the immediate and primary reference of those prophecies is to events which were then occurring, or soon to occur; and to Judæa, or to the kingdoms and countries in the vicinity of Judæa, with which the Jews were in various ways connected. In this portion of the prophecy, incorporation with Isaiah. This problem is still more intricate to those who find a farrago of authentic and spurious pieces in the first thirty-nine chapters likewise." Such is still the verdict of real criticism.

Chap. vii. 13, 14. The insincerity of Ahaz is perceived, and a sign given in remarkable terms. Much has been written respecting the sign promised, and the translation of the words in which it appears. As to the translation, we unhesitatingly approve the one given in our version. The only change we can admit is this: "Behold, the virgin conceives and bears a son, and calls his name Immanuel." The suggestion in the margin, "Thou, O virgin, shalt," &c., is uncalled for. The word rendered "virgin" is by some said to be mistranslated, but it is so rendered in the ancient Greek, Syriac, and Latin. This word, almah, is only found in six other texts of the Hebrew Bible, and in every case may fairly be explained as here; even Prov. xxx. 19 is not really an exception. Nor would an objection have been thought of however there is little that is local and temporary. It is wholly occupied with a description of events which were to occur long after the time of the prophet, and which should be of interest, not only to the Jewish nation, but to the whole human family. It is a beautiful and glowing description of occurrences in which men of these times and of all subsequent times will have as deep an interest as they who have lived at any former period. Indeed, it is not improbable that, as the world advances in age, the interest in this portion of Isaiah will increase; and that as the Gospel is carried around the globe, and the earth comes under its influence, the beauty and accuracy of these descriptions will be more clearly seen, and more highly appreciated; and that nations will yet derive their highest consolations, and see the clearest proof of the inspiration of the sacred volume, from the entire correspondence between this portion of Isaiah and the future events which are yet to gladden the world.—9. Lift it up. Barnes thinks it necessary to prevent abuse of this text by affirming, that it 'will not justify boisterous preaching, or a loud and unnatural tone of voice, alike offensive to good taste, injurious to health, and destructive of the life of the preacher.' He also infers from it that 'the glad tidings of salvation should be delivered in an animated and ardent manner; the future punishment of the wicked in a tone serious, solemn, subdued, awful.'—A.

CHAP. XLI. Until the ends of Israel's national existence are accomplished, that existence must continue, in spite of hostile nations and their gods, who shall all perish sooner than the chosen people, ver. 1—16. However feeble Israel may be in himself, Jehovah will protect him, and raise up the necessary instruments for his deliverance and triumph, ver. 17—29. 8. Thou, Israel, art. 'And thou, Israel, my servant, Jacob whom I have chosen, the seed of Abraham my friend.' The insertion of the substantive verb in the first clause, 'thou Israel art my servant,' is unnecessary. This whole verse, with the next, may be understood as a description of the object of address, or of the person to whom the exhortation in ver. 10 is directed. 10. Fear thou not. This may be regarded as the conclusion of the sentence beginning in ver. 8, as the address to which the two preceding verses are an introduction. 15. Threshing instrument. The oriental threshing machine is sometimes a sledge of thick planks armed with iron or sharp stones, sometimes a system of rough rollers joined together like a sledge or dray. Both kinds are dragged over the grain by oxen.—A.

CHAP. XLII.—3. A bruised reed. The verse continues the description of the mode in which the Messiah and his people were to 'bring forth judgment to the nations,' or, in other words, to spread the true religion. It was not to be by clamour or by violence. The first of these ideas is expressed in the preceding verse, the last in this. That such is the true import of the words is clear from the addition of the last clause, which would be unmeaning if the verse related merely to a compassionate and sympathetic temper. That this verse is included in Matthew's quotation (Mat. xii. 10) shews that he did not quote the one before it as descriptive of a modest and retiring disposition. For, although such a temper might be proved by Christ's prohibiting the publication of his miracles, this prohibition could not have been cited as an evidence of tenderness and mildness. The only way in which the whole quotation can be made appropriate to the case in hand, is by supposing that it was meant to be descriptive, not of our Saviour's human virtues, but of the nature of his kingdom, and of the means by which it was to be established. That he was both lowly and compassionate is true, but it is not the truth which he established by his conduct upon this occasion, nor the truth which the evangelist intended to illustrate by the citation of these words. As well in their original connection as in Matthew's application of them, they describe that kingdom which was not of this world; which came not with observation, Lu. xvii. 20; which was neither meat nor drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, Rom. xiv. 17; which was founded and promoted not by might nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord, and of which its founder said, Jno. xviii. 36, "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews, but now is my kingdom not from hence." And again, Jno. xviii. 27, when Pilate said unto him, "Art thou a king then?" Jesus answered, "Thou sayest," rightly, "that I am a king; to this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth; every one that is of the truth heareth my voice." How perfectly does this august description tally with the great prophetic picture of the Servant of Jehovah, who was to bring forth judgment to the nations, and in doing so was not to cry or raise his voice, or let men hear it in the streets, not by brutal force to break the crushed reed, or quench the dim wick, but to conquer by healing and imparting strength.—A. 11. The wilderness—the cities, &c. The only consistent supposition is that sea, islands, deserts, mountains, towns, and camps, are put together as poetical ingredients of the general conception, that the earth in all its parts shall have occasion to rejoice.—A.

> 'The dwellers in the vales and on the rocks,
> Shout to each other, and the mountain tops,
> From distant mountains catch the flying joy;
> Till nation after nation taught the strain,
> Earth rolls the rapturous hosannas round.'—Cowper.

15. I will make waste. 16. Bring the blind. Some writers understand the first clause as specifically meaning, that the exiles in Babylon should be delivered at a time and in a manner which they had not expected; while another class apply the words exclusively to spiritual exercise or religious experience. To both these objects the description admits of an easy application; but neither of them is to be considered its specific subject. It is impossible, without the utmost violence, to separate this one link from the chain of which it forms a part, that is to say, from the series of strong and varied metaphors, by which the prophet is expressing the idea of abrupt and total change. The same thing that is meant by the wasting of cultivated hills, the withering of herbage, and the drying up of streams and lakes, is also meant by the leading of blind men in a new path, that is, causing them to witness things of which they had had no previous experience.—A.

CHAP. XLIII. Israel is the peculiar people of Jehovah, cherished and favoured at the expence of other nations, ver. 1—4. But these are one day to become partakers of the same advantages, ver. 5—9 The proofs of the Divine protection are afforded by the history of Israel, ver. 10—13. One of the most remarkable, yet future, is the downfal of Babylon and the liberation of the exiles, ver. 14, 15. An analogous example in more ancient times was the deliverance from Egypt, ver. 16, 17. But both these instances shall be forgotten in comparison with the great change which awaits the church hereafter, ver. 18—21. Of all these distinguishing favours none was owing to the merit of the people, but all to the sovereign grace of God, ver. 22—25. The people were not only destitute of merit, but deserving of punishment, which they had experienced, and must experience again, ver. 26—28. 1. And now. The prophet is accounting for the sufferings of Israel, and his preservation from destruction on the same ground, namely, Jehovah had chosen them, and therefore would preserve them, but that they were unfaithful, and must therefore suffer. The intermingling of the promises and threatenings is not to be explained by supposing a reference to different periods or different subjects; nor is it to be set down as capricious and unmeaning, but as necessary to the prophet's purpose. The 'now' will then have a logical rather than a temporal meaning, as introductory to an explanation of the strange fact, that the bush was burned but not consumed. 4. Since thou wast precious. The first clause, as the whole context clearly shews, does not refer to intrinsic qualities, but to an arbitrary sovereign choice. Since I began to treat thee as a thing of value, thou hast been distinguished among the nations. The verse, so far from ascribing any merit to the people, refers all to God.—A. Therefore will I give men for thee. He would cause other nations to be destroyed, if it were necessary, in order to effect their deliverance, and to restore them to their own land. As his people, they were of more value than other nations; and he would suffer Cyrus to overturn the Babylonish empire, suffer armies to be discomfited and fall, in order that they might be delivered. We learn here, 1. That nations and armies are in the hand of God, and at his disposal; 2. That his people are dear to his heart, and that it is his purpose to defend them; 3. That the revolutions among nations, the rise of one empire and the fall of another, are often in order to promote the welfare of his church, to defend it in danger, and deliver it in time of calamity; and, 4. That his people should put the utmost confidence in God, as being able to defend them, and as having formed a purpose to preserve and save them. 10. No god before me. Instead of saying, in a bald prosaic form, all other gods are the work of men's hands, but I am uncreated and exist from all eternity, he condenses all into the pregnant declaration, there was no god manufactured before me, that is, all other gods were made, but none of them was made before I had a being. The sarcasm is rendered still more pungent by the use of the Divine name, thus bringing into the most revolting contrast the pretended divinity of idols and their impotence; as if he had said, none of these almighty gods were made before I had a being.—A.

CHAP. XLIV.—3, 4. I will pour water—and they shall spring up. These two verses teach us, 1. That God will pour his blessing on the children of his people—a promise which, in all ages, when parents are faithful, is abundantly fulfilled. 2. That one of the richest blessings which can be imparted to a people is, that God's Spirit should descend on their children. Nothing can be better fitted to comfort them in calamity and trial. 3. That the Spirit of God alone is the source of true happiness and prosperity to our children. All else, property, learning, accomplishment, beauty, vigour, will be vain. It is by his blessing only—by the influence of piety—that they will spring forth as among the grass, and like willows by the streams of water. 4. Parents should seek this blessing as the richest inheritance which they can have for their children. Parents may leave the world in peace, if they see the Divine blessing—the Spirit of God, descend on their children like waters on the thirsty land, and like torrents upon the dry ground. 5. Parents should pray earnestly for a revival of religion. No better description can be given of a revival than that given here, of the Spirit of God descending like streams and floods, on the children and the young; and their springing forth, in the graces of piety, as among the grass, and growing in love to God and love to men, like willows by the water-courses. Who would not pray for such a work of grace? What family, what congregation, what people, can be happy or blessed without it? 5. I am the Lord's. I belong to Jehovah; I devote myself to him. This expresses the true nature of a profession of religion, a feeling that we are not our own, but that we belong to God. It is, that we not only feel that we are bound to worship him, but that we actually belong to him; that our bodies and spirits, and all that we have and are, are his, and are to be sacredly employed in his service, and his service alone: see 1 Cor. vi. 20; 2 Cor. viii. 5; v. 14, 15. 22. As a thick cloud—and as a cloud. 'I have blotted out, like a cloud, thy transgressions, and, like a vapour, thy sins.' Many think they improve the verse by putting the 'thick cloud' last. They overlook the true force of the words The Lord declares his full forgiveness; forgiveness that leaves not a stain remaining. I have blotted out thy transgressions as the sun would break through and scatter a thick cloud; nay, more, it is like the sun dissolving and dissipating even the thin cloud or vapour that might still be lingering in the sky, so that not even the vestige remains of what formed a veil between you and God. It is thus the prophet describes complete forgiveness, the entire pardon of sin, and the delivering of the soul from the slightest stain. Not a thread of the veil is left, not a breath of the vapour. The thick cloud melts into vapour, and the vapour is dissolved—a clear blue sky remains, and a cloudless sun.—Presbyterian Review, Edin., No. 79.

CHAP. XLV.—1. To subdue nations before him. Besides his native subjects, the nations which Cyrus subdued, and over which he reigned, were the Cilicians, Syrians, Paphlagonians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, Lydians, Carians, Phœnicians, Arabians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Bactrians, Sacæ, and Maryandines. Xenophon describes his empire as extending from the Mediterranean and Egypt to the Indian Ocean, and from Ethiopia to the Euxine sea, and conveys a physical idea of its extent by observing that the extremities were difficult to inhabit from opposite causes,—some from excess of heat, and others from excess of cold; some from a scarcity of water, and others too great abundance. To open the two leaved gates. In the scene of revelry which prevailed in Babylon when Cyrus took the city, the gates within the city which led from the streets to the river were left open, or the city could not have been taken, even after Cyrus had got within the walls; for the city was not only enclosed with walls, but there were walls within the city, on each side of the river Euphrates, with gates, by which the inhabitants had access to the water of the river. Had not these gates been left open on that occasion, contrary to the usual custom, the Persians would have been shut up in the bed of the river, and could all have been destroyed. And the gates shall not be shut. This is a most remarkable prophecy, and its fulfilment was remarkable. It was usual to close the gates of a city at night, and on the approach of an enemy. But in regard to Babylon, the inner gates leading to the river were left open in the revelry which prevailed in the city, and Cyrus had unarrested and unopposed access even to the palace itself. None but an omniscient Being could have predicted, a hundred and fifty years before it occurred, that such an event would take place; and this is one of the many prophecies which demonstrate in the most particular manner, that Isaiah was inspired. 3. Treasures of darkness. The treasures of the kings of the east were usually hidden in some obscure and strong place, and were not to be touched, except in cases of pressing necessity. Alexander found vast quantities of treasure thus hidden among the Persians; and it was by taking such treasures that the rapacity of the soldiers who followed a conqueror was satisfied, and in fact by a division of the spoils thus taken that they were paid. There can be no doubt that large quantities of treasure in this manner would be found in Babylon. 14. They shall fall down unto thee. Instead of saying, 'they shall worship God who dwells in thee,' the prophet makes his language more expressive by saying, 'they shall worship thee;' and then immediately explains his own language by adding their acknowledgment, 'only in thee is God,' or, to give the Hebrew word its full force, 'an almighty God,' implying that the gods of other nations were but gods in name. This exclusive recognition of the God of Israel is here but for the evangelical extension of the prophecy to Jesus in Matt. i. 22, 23. As it regards the application and exposition of the passage, we cannot here so much as enumerate conflicting opinions. A child may have been born in accordance with and in part fulfilment of the prediction, as a sign to Ahaz; but the ultimate accomplishment in Jesus can only be denied by those who reject the testimony of St. Matthew.

vii. 15. The word rendered "butter" means thick milk, whether creamy or curdled. To eat butter and honey may be to live in peace and plenty. For "that he may know," render "until he know."

vii. 16. The latter part of this verse is variously translated. Barnes gives, "Desolate shall be the land before whose two kings thou art in terror." With some modifications, this construction has been advocated by many critics. Many older scholars and some recent ones, including Dr. Henderson, defend the order of the then repeated in a way which may to some seem tautological, but which is really emphatic in a high degree.—A.——One of the most remarkable characteristics of the present time is, that a state of religious inquiry extensively exists; that heathen nations are becoming increasingly sensible of their ignorance, and comparative degradation; that they welcome the ministers and teachers sent out from Christian lands; and the increased commerce of the world is thus diffusing a spirit of universal inquiry, and preparing the world for the final spread of the Gospel.

CHAP. XLVIII.—22. There is no peace with the wicked. This verse was intended to restrict the operation of the foregoing promises to true believers, or the genuine Israel, as if he had said, All this will God accomplish for his people, but not for the wicked among them. The grand conclusion to which all tends is, that God is all, and man nothing; that even the chosen people must be sufferers, because they are sinners; that peculiar favour confers no immunity to sin or exemption from responsibility, but that even in the Israel of God, and the enjoyment of the most extraordinary privileges, it still remains for ever true, that "there is no peace to the wicked."—A.

CHAP. XLIX.—12. The land of Sinim. See a work under the title of "The Land of Sinim, or an exposition of Isaiah xlix. 12, together with a brief account of the Jews and Christians in China." (Philadelphia, 1845.) It is well said by this writer, that the verse before us is the central point of the prophetical discourse of which it forms a part, inasmuch as it embodies the great promise, which in various forms is exhibited before and afterwards. This relation of the text to the context is important, because it creates a presumption in favour of the widest meaning which can be put upon the terms of the prediction, and against a restricted local application. If the land of Sinim meant the wilderness of Sin, or even Egypt, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to give a satisfactory solution of its singular position here as one of the great quarters or divisions of the world. But if it mean China, that extreme limit of the eastern world, that hive of nations, supposed to comprehend a third part of the human race, the enigma explains itself. Even to us there would be nothing unintelligible or absurd, however strange or novel, in the combination, north, west, south, and China. On the whole then, a hypothesis which solves all difficulties, satisfies the claims of philology and history, unites the suffrages of the most independent schools and parties, fully meets the requisitions of the text and context, and opens a glorious field of expectation and of effort to the church, may be safely regarded as the true one. 22. Daughters upon the shoulders. Children of both sexes are carried on the shoulders. Thus may be seen the father carrying his son, the little fellow being astride on the shoulder, having with his hand, hold of his father's head. Girls, however, sit on their shoulder, as if on a chair, their legs hanging in front, while they also, with their hands, lay hold of the head. In going to or returning from heathen festivals, thousands of parents and their children may be thus seen marching along with joy.—Roberts. It is no forced interpretation of this passage which regards it as teaching, that the parents who should be converted among the Gentiles should bring their offspring to the Redeemer, and present them publicly to God.

CHAP. LI.—16. My words in thy mouth. The Messiah is the object of address, and that his work or mission is here described, namely, to plant the heavens, that is, to establish them, perhaps with allusion to the erection of a tent by the insertion of its stakes in the ground. The new creation thus announced can only mean the reproduction of the church in a new form, by what we usually call the change of dispensations. The outward economy should all be new, and yet the identity of the chosen people should remain unbroken; for he whom God had called to plant new heavens and to found a new earth was likewise commissioned to say to Zion, Thou art still my people.

CHAP. LIII.—3. Grief. The word rendered 'grief,' means usually sickness, disease. Deu. vii. 15; xxviii. 61; Isa. i. 5; but it also means anxiety, affliction, grief, Eccl. v. 16; and then any evil or calamity, Eccl. vi. 2. 7. He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter. 'As a lamb that is led to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so was he.' He made no resistance; he uttered no complaint. He suffered himself to be led quietly along to be put to death. What a striking and beautiful description! How tender and how true! We can almost see here the meek and patient Redeemer led along without resistance; and amidst the multitude that were assembled with various feelings to conduct him to death, himself perfectly silent and composed. With all power at his disposal, yet as quiet and gentle as though he had no power; and with a perfect consciousness that he was going to die, as calm and as gentle as though he were ignorant of the design for which they were leading him forth. 8. He was taken from prison. 'From distress and from judgment he was taken; and in his generation who will think that he was cut off from the land of the living for the transgression of my people,' as 'a curse for them?' In (or among) his generation (that is, his contemporaries,) who considered that he was cut off from the land of the living? &c. 9. Because. This word here has probably the signification of, although. Thus it is used in Job xvi. 17, "Not for any injustice in my hands," Heb., 'Although there is no injustice in my hands.' The sense here demands this interpretation. According to our common version, the meaning is, that he was buried with the rich man because he had done no violence, and was guilty of no deceit; whereas it is rather to be taken in connection with the entire strain of the passage, and to be regarded as meaning, that he was wounded, rejected, put to death, and buried by the hands of men, although he had done no violence. Assuming now (see the Analysis in Barnes' Commentary, on ch. lii. 13, seq.) that this was written more than seven hundred years before the Lord Jesus was born, there are some remarks of great importance, to which we may just refer in the conclusion of this exposition. 1. The first is, the minute accuracy of the statements here as applicable to the Lord Jesus. It describes, as minutely as could have been done after the events occurred, the manner of his trial, of his rejection, the fact of his being taken from detention, and by a judicial sentence, and the manner in which it was designed that he should be buried, and yet the remarkable fact that this was prevented, and that he was interred in the manner in which the rich were buried. 2. We are then prepared to ask an infidel how he will dispose of this prophecy. That it existed seven hundred years before Christ, is as certain as that the poems of Homer or Hesiod had an existence before the Christian era; as certain as the existence of any ancient document whatever. It will not do to say that it was forged, for this is not only without proof, but would destroy the credibility of all ancient writings. It will not do to say that it was the result of natural sagacity in the prophet—for whatever may be said of conjectures about empires and kingdoms, no natural sagacity can tell what will be the character of an individual man, or whether such a man as here referred to would exist at all. It will not do to say that the Lord Jesus was a cunning impostor, and resolved to fulfil this ancient writing, and thus establish his claims; for such an attempt would have belied human nature; and, if attempted, could not have been accomplished. It remains then to ask, what solution the infidel will give of these remarkable facts. We present him the prophecy, not a rhapsody, not conjecture, not a general statement, but minute, full, clear, unequivocal, relating to points which could not have been the result of conjecture, and over which the individual had no control. And then we present him with the record of the life of Jesus,—minutely accurate in all the details of the fulfilment, a coincidence as clear as that between a biography and the original, and ask him to explain it. And we demand a definite and consistent answer to this. To turn away from it does not answer it. To laugh does not answer it. To say that it is not worth inquiry is not true, for it pertains to the great question of human redemption. But if he cannot explain it, then he should admit that it is such a prediction as only God could give, and that Christianity is true. 3. This chapter proves that the Redeemer died as an atoning sacrifice for men. It would be impossible to state in more explicit language the truth that he died as a sacrifice for the sins of men,—that he suffered to make proper expiation for the guilty. No confession of faith on earth, no creed, no symbol, no standard of doctrine, contains more explicit statements on the subject. And if the language here used does not demonstrate that the Redeemer was an atoning sacrifice, it is impossible to conceive how such a doctrine could be taught or conveyed to men. 4. This whole chapter is exceedingly important to Christians. It contains the most full, continuous statement in the Bible of the design of the Redeemer's sufferings and death. And after all the light which is shed on the subject in the New Testament, after all the full and clear statements made by the Redeemer and the apostles, still, if we wish to see a full and continuous statement on the great doctrine of the atonement, we naturally recur to this portion of Isaiah. If we wish our faith to be strengthened, and our hearts warmed, by the contemplation of his sufferings, we shall find no portion of the Bible better adapted to it than this. It is a portion that should not only be the subject of contemplation, but of much fervent prayer. No man can study it too profoundly. No one can feel too much anxiety to understand it. Every verse, every phrase, every word, should be studied and pondered, until it fixes itself deep in the memory, and makes an eternal impression on the heart. If a man understands this portion of the Bible, he will have a correct view of the plan of salvation. And it should be the subject of profound and prayerful contemplation, till the heart glows with love to that merciful God who was willing to give the Redeemer to such sorrow, and to the gracious Saviour who for our sins was willing to pour out his soul unto death.

CHAP. LIV.—11, 12. Sapphires—agates. Lowth says that, 'these seem to be general images to express beauty, magnificence, purity, strength, and solidity agreeably to the ideas of the eastern nations, and to have never been intended to be strictly scrutinized, or minutely and particularly explained, as if they had each of them some precise moral or spiritual meaning.'—A.

CHAP. LVII.—20. The wicked are like the troubled sea. The agitation and commotion of the sinner here referred to relates to such things as the following: 1. There is no permanent happiness or enjoyment. There is no reconciliation with God. 2. Raging passions. The sinner is under their influence, and they may be compared to the wild and tumultuous waves of the ocean. 3. Conscience. Nothing more resembles an agitated ocean casting up mire and dirt than a soul agitated by the recollections of past guilt. 4. The fear of judgment and of hell. Many a sinner has no rest day or night, from the fear of future wrath. His troubled mind looks onward, and he sees nothing to anticipate but the wrath of God, and the horrors of an eternal hell. How invaluable is religion! All these commotions are stilled by the voice of pardoning mercy, as the billows of the deep were hushed by the voice of Jesus. ——We all must soon lie down on beds of death; and in all these scenes there is nothing that can give permanent and solid peace but the religion of the Redeemer. Oh, that stills all the agitation of a troubled soul; lays every billow of tumultuous passion to rest; calms all the conflicts of a guilty bosom; reveals God, reconciled through a Redeemer, to our souls; and removes all the anticipated terrors of a bed of death, and of the approach to the judgment bar. Peacefully the Christian can die, not like the troubled sinner, when he leaves the world with a bosom agitated like the stormy ocean, but as peacefully as the gentle ripple dies away on the beach.

CHAP. LVIII.—3. And exact all your labours. There was no kindness shewn to the poor, to the labouring classes, to those who were in their employ, to those who were indebted to them, to those who had injured or offended them. Alas, how often is this still true! 14. For the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. This formula often occurs when an important promise is made, and it is regarded as ample security for the fulfilment that Jehovah has promised it. What more ample security can be required, or conceived, than the promise of the eternal God? From the closing portion of this chapter we may derive the following important inferences respecting the sabbath: 1. It is to be of perpetual obligation. The whole chapter occurs in the midst of statements that relate to the times of the Messiah. But there is no intimation that the sabbath was to be abolished; but it is fairly implied, that its observance was to be attended with most happy results in those future times. At all events, Isaiah regarded it as of binding obligation, and felt that its proper observance was identified with the national welfare. 2. We may see the manner in which the sabbath is to be observed. In no place in the Bible is there a more full account of the proper mode of keeping that holy day. We are to refrain from ordinary travelling and employments; we are not to engage in doing our own pleasure; we are to regard it with delight, and to esteem it a day worthy to be honoured; and we are to shew honour to it by not performing our own ordinary works, or pursuing pleasure, or engaging in the common topics of conversation. 3. Important benefits result from the right observance of the sabbath. In the passage before us these are said to be, that they who thus observed it should find pleasure in Jehovah, and should be signally prospered and be safe. But those benefits are by no means confined to the Jewish people. It is as true now as it was then, that they who observe the sabbath in a proper manner find a pleasure and happiness in the Lord—in his existence, perfections, promises, law, and in communion with him—which is to be found nowhere else. Of this fact there are abundant witnesses now in every Christian church, and they will continue to be multiplied, in every coming age. 4. Society will have seasons of cessation from labour, and when they are not made occasions for the promotion of virtue, they will be for the promotion of vice. It is vain to attempt to blot out wholly the observance of the Christian sabbath; and since it will and must be observed as a day of cessation from toil, all that remains is, for society to avail itself of the advantages which may be derived from its proper observance, and to make it the handmaid of temperance, intelligence, and pure religion. It is deeply, therefore, to be regretted that this sacred institution has been, and is, so widely abused in Christain lands. As it is, it is extensively a day of feasting, amusement, dissipation, and revelry. And while its observance is more decidedly than any thing else the means of perpetuating virtue and religion on earth, it is, perhaps, not too much to say, that it is the occasion of more intemperance, vice, and crime, than all the other days of the week put together. This is particularly the case in our large cities and towns. 6. While the friends of religion, therefore, mourn over the desecration of the Christian sabbath, let them remember that their example may contribute more to secure a proper observance of that day. On the friends of the Redeemer it devolves to rescue the common version. Our own conclusions favour the change, "The land will be desolate of whose two kings thou art afraid"—the land here meant being Israel and Syria, which are spoken of as one because acting together against Judah. As a matter of fact, Rezin was slain by the king of Assyria a year or so after this, and about a year later Pekah was killed by Hoshea. (See 2 Kings xv. 30, xvi. 9.)

vii. 17. According to our version, the Lord would bring upon the people times of unparalleled calamity, and the king of Assyria was the chief agent in the work. This view is probably correct, but the Greek and Syriac differ; the former having "from what day Ephraim took away from Judah the king of the Assyrians," and the latter, "from the day wherein the king of Assyria separated Ephraim from Judah." The Latin Vulgate also varies, having "from the days of the separation of Ephraim from Judah with the king of the Assyrians."

day from desecration; and by the Divine blessing it may be done. The happiness of every Christian is indissolubly connected with the proper observance of the sabbath. The perpetuity of the true religion, and its extension throughout the earth, is identified with the observance of the sabbath. And every true friend of God the Saviour, as he values his own peace, and as he prizes the religion which he professes to love, is bound to restrain his foot on the sabbath; to cease to find his own pleasure, and to speak his own words on that holy day; and to shew that the sabbath is to him a delight, and that he esteems the holy day of Jehovah a day to be honoured and to be loved.

CHAP. LIX.—21. From henceforth and for ever. This is in accordance with the promises which everywhere occur in the Scriptures, that God would bless the posterity of his people, and that the children of the pious should partake of his favour: see Ex. xx. 6, "shewing mercy unto thousands" (that is, thousands of generations) "of them that love me, and keep my commandments:" compare Deu. vii. 9; iv. 37; v. 29; Ps. lxxxix. 24—36; Jer. xxxii. 39, 40. There is no promise of the Bible that is more full of consolation to the pious, or that has been more strikingly fulfilled than this. And though it is true that not all the children of holy parents become truly pious; though there are instances where they are signally wicked and abandoned, yet it is also true that rich spiritual blessings are imparted to the posterity of those who serve God, and who keep his commandments. The following facts are well known to all who have ever made any observation on this subject. 1. The great majority of those who become religious are the descendants of those who were themselves the friends of God. Those who now compose the Christian churches the world over, are not those generally who have been taken from the ways of open vice and profligacy; from the ranks of infidelity; or from the immediate descendants of scoffers, drunkards, and blasphemers. Such men usually tread, for a few generations at least, in the footsteps of their fathers. The church is composed mainly of the descendants of those who have been true Christians, and who trained their children to walk in the ways of pure religion. 2. It is a fact that comparatively a large proportion of the descendants of the pious themselves, for many generations, become true Christians. I know that it is often thought to be otherwise, and especially that it is often said that the children of clergymen are less virtuous and religious than others. But it should be remembered that such cases are more prominent than others; that they attract attention; and especially that the profane and the wicked have a malicious pleasure in making them the subject of remark. The son of a drunkard will be intemperate without attracting notice; for such a result is expected; the son of an infidel will be an infidel; the son of a scoffer will be a scoffer; of a thief a thief; of a licentious man licentious, without being the subject of special remark. It is expected, and is regarded as a matter of course. But when the son of an eminent Christian is profane, licentious, or an infidel,—when he treads the path of open profligacy, it at once excites remark, because such is not the usual course, and is not usually expected; and because a wicked world has pleasure in marking the case, and calumniating religion through the prominent instances of imperfection and sin. But such is not the common result of religious training. Some of the most devotedly pious people of the United States are the descendants of the Hugonots who were expelled from France. A very large proportion of all the piety in this country has been derived from the "Pilgrims," who landed on the rock of Plymouth, and God has blessed their descendants in New England, and elsewhere, with numerous revivals of religion. I am acquainted with the descendants of John Rogers, the first martyr in Queen Mary's reign, of the tenth and eleventh generations. With a single exception, the oldest son in the family has been a clergyman; some of them eminently distinguished for learning and piety; and there are few families now in this land a greater proportion of whom are pious than of that family. The secretary of the Massachusetts Sabbath School Society made a limited investigation this year (1838) for the purpose of ascertaining the facts about the religious character of the families of ministers and deacons, with reference to the charge so often urged that the "sons and daughters of ministers and deacons were worse than common children." The following is the result. In 268 families which he canvassed, he found 1,290 children over fifteen years of age; of these children, 884, almost three-fourths, are hopefully pious; 794 have united with the churches; sixty-one entered the ministry; only seventeen are dissipated, and about half only of these became so while with their parents. In eleven of these families there are 123 children, and all but seven pious. In fifty-six of these families there are 249 children over fifteen, and all hopefully pious. When and where can any such result be found in the families of infidels, of the vicious, or of irreligious men? Indeed, it is the great law by which religion and virtue are spread and perpetuated in the world, that God is faithful to this covenant, and that he blesses the efforts of his friends in endeavouring to train up generations for his service. 3. All pious parents should repose on this promise of a faithful God. They may and should believe that it is his design to perpetuate religion in the families of those who truly serve and obey him. They should be faithful in imparting religious truth; faithful in prayer; faithful in a meek, holy, pure and benevolent example; they should so live, that their children may safely tread in their footsteps; they should look to God for his blessing on their efforts, and their efforts will not be in vain. They shall see their children walk in the ways of virtue; and when they die they may leave the world with unwavering confidence that God will not suffer his faithfulness to fail; that he will not break his covenant, nor alter the thing that is gone out of his lips, Ps. lxxxix. 33, 34.

CHAP. LX. Having repeatedly and fully shewn that the national pre-eminence of Israel was not to be perpetual, that the loss of it was the natural consequence, and righteous retribution, of iniquity, and that their loss did not involve the destruction of the true church or spiritual Israel, the prophet now proceeds to shew, that to the latter the approaching change would be a glorious and blessed one. 11. Therefore thy gates shall be open continually. The sense is, 1. That there will be immense multitudes that shall enter the true church from the heathen world. 2. That the Gospel will be constantly and unceasingly offered to men. The doors of the church shall at no time be closed. 3. It will be a time of safety, when the world shall be brought under the influence and the dominion of the Prince of peace. Should the principles of Christianity be every where diffused, the walls of all cities might be suffered to fall down, their gates to stand open till they should decay, ships of war to lie in the dock till they should sink to the bottom, forts and fleets to be dismantled, and the whole business of making locks, and shackles, and of building prisons, and manufacturing instruments of war, would come to an end. 12. For the nation. The "For" at the beginning of the verse is commonly explained as introducing a reason for the confluence of strangers just before predicted, namely, the desire of escaping this destruction; but it may as well be understood to give a reason for the promise of increase in general. The gates of Zion shall be crowded, because all shall enter into them but those who are to perish.—A.

CHAP. LXI.—6. Ye shall eat the riches. 'And ye, or more emphatically, as for you, 'the priests of Jehovah shall ye be called, the ministers of our God shall be said to you, (or of you,) 'the strength of nations shall ye eat, and in their glory shall ye substitute yourselves,' or into their glory shall ye enter by exchange. The true antithesis is, 'ye shall be their priests, and they shall be your purveyors; you shall supply their spiritual wants, and they shall supply your temporal wants.' This explanation of the verse, to which we have been naturally led by philological induction, and the context, coincides, in a manner too remarkable to be considered accidental, with the words of Paul in writing to the Romans of the contribution made by the churches of Macedonia and Achaia, for the poor saints at Jerusalem. "It hath pleased them verily, and their debtors they are," that is, they have chosen to do it, and indeed were bound to do it, "for if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things," Rom. xv. 27. This may seem, however, to determine the object of address to be the Jews; but no such inference can fairly be deduced from the words of the apostle, who is only making one specific application of the general truth taught by the prophet. What was true of the Gentile converts then, in relation to the Jewish Christians as their mother church, is no less true of the heathen now, or even of converted Jews, in reference to the Christians who impart the Gospel to them. The essential idea in both places is, that the church, the chosen people, or the Israel of God, is charged with the duty of communicating spiritual things to those without, and entitled in return to an increase of outward strength from those who thus become incorporated with it.—But it is not merely in this lower sense that the people of God are in the law (Ex. xix. 20) and the Gospel, (1 Pet. i. 3,) as well as in the prophets, represented as the ministers and priests of God. Not only as instructors and reclaimers of the unbelieving world do they enjoy this sacred dignity, but also as the only representatives of their great High Priest, in him and through him possessing free access to the fountain of salvation and the throne of grace, Heb. iv. 14—16. In this respect, as in every other, which concerns the method of salvation and access to God, there is no distinction of Jew and Gentile, any more than of Greek and barbarian, male and female, bond and free, but all are Christ's, and Christ is God's, and all alike are priests and ministers of God.—A. To the system of more literally interpreting this and other chapters in Isaiah, reference is made in the Supplementary Notes to Jeremiah. ch. xxiii.

CHAP. LXIII. The influx of the Gentiles into Zion having been described in the preceding verses, the destruction of her enemies is now sublimely represented as a sanguinary triumph of Jehovah or the Messiah, ver. 1—6. The prophet then supposes the catastrophe already past, and takes a retrospective view of God's compassions towards his people, and of their unfaithfulness during the old economy, ver. 7—14. He then assumes the tone of earnest supplication, such as might have been offered by the believing Jews when all seemed lost in the destruction of their commonwealth and temple, ver. 15—19. 1. From Edom. With some exceptions, most interpreters, even of the modern German school, suppose Edom to be here, as in ch. xxxiv., the representative of Israel's most inveterate enemies. 3. I have trodden the winepress alone. The most satisfactory solution seems to be, that these words are added to convey the idea that all the nations were on the adverse side, none on that of the conqueror. The sense will then be, not that they refuse to join in trampling others, but simply that they were among the trampled; as if he had said, I trod the press alone, and all the nations, without exception, were trodden in it. By all the nations we are of course to understand all but God's people. The treading of the winepress alone is an expression often applied in sermons, and in religious books and conversation, to our Saviour's sufferings. This application is described as customary in his own time by Vitringa, who considers it as having led to the forced exposition of the whole passage by the fathers and Cocceius as a description of Christ's passion. While the impossibility of such a sense in the original passage cannot be too strongly stated, there is no need of denying that the figure may be happily accommodated in the way suggested; as many expressions of the Old Testament may be applied to different objects with good effect, provided we are careful to avoid confounding such accommodations with the strict and primary import of the passage. 16. Though Abraham be ignorant of us. The true sense of the verse, as it appears to me, is that the church or chosen people, although once, for temporary reasons, coextensive and coincident with a single race, is not essentially a national organization, but a spiritual body. Its father is not Abraham or Israel, but Jehovah, who is, and always has been, its Redeemer, who has borne that name from everlasting.—A.

CHAP. LXIV.—4. Thou meetest him. There is perhaps no sentence in Isaiah or indeed in the Old Testament, which has more divided and perplexed interpreters, or on which the ingenuity and learning of the modern writers have thrown less light. To enumerate the various interpretations would be endless and of no avail. I shall not attempt to define what is correct and what erroneous in these various constructions, but simply to justify the one assumed in my own version. The general meaning of the sentence may be thus expressed in paraphrase: 'Although thou hast cast off Israel as a nation, thou hast nevertheless met, or favourably answered, every one rejoicing to do righteousness, and in thy ways or future dispensations such shall still remember and acknowledge thee; thou hast been angry, and with cause, for we have sinned, but in them, thy purposed dispensations, there is perpetuity, and we shall be saved.' The abrogation of the old economy, though fatal to the national pre-eminence of Israel, was so far from destroying the true church or the hopes of true believers, that it revealed the way of life more clearly than ever, and substituted for an insufficient, temporary system, a complete and everlasting one.—A.

CHAP. LXVI.—24. Their worm shall not die. The Saviour (Mar. ix. 44, 64,) applied the language to the future punishment of the wicked, and no one, I think, can doubt that in Isaiah it includes that consummation of worldly affairs. The radical and essential idea in the prophet is, as it seems to me, that all the foes of God would be destroyed; that his people and cause would be firmly established, and would be delivered from all their foes; and that such would be the entire overthrow and punishment of the enemies of God; so condign their punishment, so deep their sufferings, so loathsome and hateful when visited with the Divine vengeance for their sins, that they would be an object of loathing and abhorrence. They would be swept off as unworthy to live with God, and they would be consigned to punishment—loathsome, like that of ever-gnawing worms on the carcases of the slain, and interminable and dreadful like ever-consuming and inextinguishable fires. This is the consummation of the series of bright visions that passed before the mind of Isaiah. This is an appropriate termination of this succession of wonderful revelations. Where could it more appropriately terminate than in the consummation of all things,—in the final triumph of the true religion, and in the complete and final destruction of all the enemies of God? The vision stretches on to the judgment, and is closed by a contemplation of those scenes which commence there, but which never end. The church is triumphant; its conflicts cease; its foes are slain; its Redeemer is revealed; and its everlasting happiness is founded on a basis which can never be shaken.

vii. 18. On the hissing, see note to chap. v. 26. "The fly" is probably the one made famous by African travellers, and especially by Dr. Livingstone, as the tsetse. This insect, although not much larger than a house-fly, is armed with enormous powers of destruction. This and many other flies of a dangerous kind may be found in divers parts of East and South Africa, and it has been thought that the text will include them all, the word zebub, or fly, being a generic term. The fly from Egypt is a metaphor for the enemy from Egypt, and the bee from Assyria is similarly explained. Egypt was pre-eminently a land for flies, and bees are abundant all through Western Asia.

vii. 19. This verse describes the invading hordes from Egypt and Assyria as settling everywhere, like swarms of bees and flies or locusts, who come down upon places remote and unattractive, as desolate valleys, &c., and on objects as insignificant as thorns and bushes.

AN EXPOSITION

OF THE BOOK OF

THE PROPHET JEREMIAH,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THE prophecies of the Old Testament, as the epistles of the New, are placed rather according to their bulk than their seniority,—the longest first, not the oldest. There were divers prophets, and writing ones, that were contemporaries with Isaiah, as Micah; or a little before him, as Hosea, and Joel, and Amos; or soon after him, as Habakkuk and Nahum are supposed to be; and yet the prophecy of Jeremiah, who began many years after Isaiah finished, is placed next to his, because there is so much in it. Where we meet with most of God's word, there let the preference be given; and yet those of lesser gifts are not to be despised or excluded. Nothing now occurs to be observed farther concerning prophecy in general, but concerning this prophet Jeremiah we may observe, I. That he was betimes a prophet; he began young, and therefore could say from his own experience that it is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth, the yoke both of service and of affliction, Lam. iii. 27. Jerome observes, that Isaiah, who had more years over his head, had his tongue touched with a coal of fire, to purge away his iniquity, ch. vi. 7; but when God touched Jeremiah's mouth, who was yet but young, nothing was said of the purging of his iniquity, ch. i. 9, because, by reason of his tender years, he had not so much sin to answer for. II. That he continued long a prophet; some reckon fifty years, others above forty. He began in the thirteenth year of Josiah, when things went well under that good king; but he continued through all the wicked reigns that followed: for when we set out for the service of God, though the wind may then be fair and favourable, we know not how soon it may turn and be tempestuous. III. That he was a reproving prophet; was sent in God's name to tell Jacob of their sins, and to warn them of the judgments of God that were coming upon them. And the critics observe, that therefore his style and manner of speaking is more plain and rough, and less polite, than that of Isaiah and some other of the prophets. Those that are sent to discover sin ought to lay aside the enticing words of man's wisdom; plain dealing is best when we are dealing with sinners to bring them to repentance. IV. That he was a weeping prophet. So he is commonly called, not only because he penned the Lamentations, but because he was all along a mournful spectator of the sins of his people, and of the desolating judgments that were coming upon them; and for this reason, perhaps, those who imagined our Saviour to be one of the prophets thought him of any of them to be most like to Jeremiah, Mat. xvi. 14, because he was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. V. That he was a suffering prophet. He was persecuted by his own people more than any of them, as we shall find in the story of this book,—for he lived and preached just before the Jews' destruction by the Chaldeans, when their character seems to have been the same as it was just before their destruction by the Romans, when they killed the Lord Jesus, and persecuted his disciples, pleased not God, and were contrary to all men,—for wrath was come upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thes. ii. 15, 16. The last account we have of him in his history is, that the remaining Jews forced him to go down with them into Egypt, where, as the current tradition is among Jews and Christians he suffered martyrdom. Hottinger, out of Elmakin, an Arabic historian, relates that, he continuing to prophesy in Egypt, against the Egyptians and other nations, he was stoned to death; and that long after, when Alexander entered Egypt, he took up the bones of Jeremiah, where they were buried in obscurity, and carried them to Alexandria, and buried them there. The prophecies of this book, which we have in the first nineteen chapters, seem to be the heads of the sermons he preached in a way of general reproof for sin, and denunciation of judgment; afterwards they are more particular and occasional, and mixed with the history of his day, but not placed in due order of time. With the threatenings many gracious promises are intermixed of mercy to the penitent, of the deliverance of the Jews out of their captivity, and some that have a plain reference to the kingdom of the Messiah. Among the Apocryphal writings there is extant an epistle, said to be written by Jeremiah to the captives in Babylon, warning them against the worship of idols, by exposing the vanity of idols, and the folly of idolaters; it is in Baruch, ch. vi. But it is supposed not to be authentic; nor has it, methinks, any thing like the life and spirit of Jeremiah's writings. It is also related concerning Jeremiah, 2 Mac. ii. 4, that when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans, he, by direction from God, took the ark and the altar of incense, and carried them to mount Nebo, lodged them in a hollow cave there, and stopped the door; but some that followed him, and thought they had marked the place, could not find it: he blamed them for seeking it, telling them the place should be unknown till the time that God should gather his people together again. But I know not what credit is to be given to that story, though it is there said to be found in the records. We cannot but be concerned, in the reading of Jeremiah's prophecies, to find that they were so little regarded by the men of that generation; but let us make use of that as a reason why we should regard them the more, for they are written for our learning too, and for warning to us and to our land.

A.M. 3375. B.C. 629.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. The general inscription or title of this book; with the time of the continuance of Jeremiah's public ministry, ver. 1—3. II. The call of Jeremiah to the prophetical office, his modest objection against it answered, and an ample commission given him for the execution of it, ver. 4—10. III. The visions of an almond-rod and a seething-pot, signifying the approaching ruin of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, ver. 11—16. IV. Encouragement given to the prophet to go on undauntedly in his work, in an assurance of God's presence with him, ver. 17—19. Thus is he set to work by One that will be sure to bear him out.

THE words of Jeremiah the son of Hilkiah, of the priests that were in Anathoth in the land of Benjamin: 2 To whom the word of the LORD came in the days of Josiah the son of Amon king of Judah, in the thirteenth year of his reign. 3 It came also in the days of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, unto the end of the eleventh year of Zedekiah the son of Josiah king of Judah, unto the carrying away of Jerusalem captive in the fifth month.

We have here as much as it was thought fit we should know of the genealogy of this prophet, and the chronology of his prophecy.

First. We are told what family the prophet was of. He was the son of Hilkiah. It is supposed not that Hilkiah that was high priest in Josiah's time, for then he would have been called so, and not, as here, one "of the priests that were in Anathoth," but another of the same name. Jeremiah signifies 'one raised up by the Lord.' It is said of Christ, that he is a prophet whom the Lord our God raiseth up unto us, Deu. xviii. 15, 18. He was of the priests, and, as a priest, was authorized and appointed to teach the people; but to that authority and appointment God added the extraordinary commission of a prophet. Ezekiel also was a priest. Thus God would support the honour of the priesthood at a time when, by their sins and God's judgments upon them, it was sadly eclipsed. He was of the priests in Anathoth, a city of priests, which lay but three miles from Jerusalem. Abiathar had his country house there, 1 Kin. ii. 26.

Secondly. We have the general date of his prophecies, the knowledge of which is requisite to the understanding of them. 1. He began to prophesy in the thirteenth year of Josiah's reign, ver. 2. Josiah, in the twelfth year of his reign, began a work of reformation; applied himself, with all sincerity, to purge Judah and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the images, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 3. And very seasonably then was this young prophet

i. 1—3. The real site of Anathoth seems to have been discovered by Dr. Robinson, the American traveller, who found a place called Anata upon one of the ridges some distance north-east of Jerusalem. Dr. Thomson describes it as a "small, half-ruined hamlet, but was once much larger, and appears to have had a wall around it, a few fragments of which are still to be seen;" and again, "The prospect east and south-east, toward the Dead Sea and the Lower Jordan, is one of the most dreary that my eye ever rested on." At present the inhabitants of the locality occupy themselves partly with agriculture and partly in quarrying stone, of which considerable quantities are dug here and sent to Jerusalem, where it is much in request. The thirteenth year of Josiah's reign, according to Ussher's calculation, is B.C. 629; but the precise year is not wholly undisputed, and the reckoning of the writer of the article "Chronology" in "Cassell's Bible Dictionary" would make it about B.C. 625. So the eleventh of Zedekiah would be B.C. 586, according to the second raised up to assist and encourage the young king in that good work. Then the word of the Lord came to him; not only a charge and commission to him to prophesy, but a revelation of the things themselves which he was to deliver. As it is an encouragement to ministers to be countenanced and protected by such pious magistrates as Josiah was, so it is a great help to magistrates, in any good work of reformation, to be advised and animated, and to have a great deal of their work done for them by such faithful, zealous, ministers as Jeremiah was. Now one would have expected when these two joined forces, such a prince and such a prophet, (as in a like case, Ezr. v. 1, 2,) and both young, such a complete reformation should have been brought about and settled, as would have prevented the ruin of the church and state; but it proved quite otherwise. In the eighteenth year of Josiah we find there were a great many of the relics of idolatry that were not purged out; for what can the best princes and prophets do to prevent the ruin of a people that hate to be reformed? And therefore, though it was a time of reformation, Jeremiah continued to foretell the destroying judgments that were coming upon them. For there is no symptom more threatening to any people than fruitless attempts of reformation. Josiah and Jeremiah would have healed them, but they would not be healed. 2. He continued to prophesy through the reigns of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, who each reigned eleven years. He prophesied to "the carrying away of Jerusalem captive," ver. 3, that great event which he had so often prophesied of. He continued to prophesy after that, ch. xl. 1, but the computation here is made to end with that, because it was the accomplishment of many of his predictions; and from the thirteenth of Josiah to the captivity was just forty years. Dr. Lightfoot observes, that as Moses was so long with the people a teacher in the wilderness, till they entered into their own land, Jeremiah was so long in their own land a teacher before they went into the wilderness of the heathen; and he thinks that therefore a special mark is set upon the last forty years of the iniquity of Judah, which Ezekiel bore forty days, a day for a year; because during all that time they had Jeremiah prophesying among them, which was a great aggravation of their impenitency. God, in this prophet, suffered their manners, their ill manners, forty years, and at length sware in his wrath that they should not continue in his rest.

4 Then the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
5 Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee;
And before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee,
And I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations.
6 Then said I, Ah, Lord GOD! behold, I cannot speak: for I am a child. 7 But the LORD said unto me, Say not, I am a child: for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak. 8 Be not afraid of their faces: for I am with thee to deliver thee, saith the LORD. 9 Then the LORD put forth his hand, and touched my mouth. And the LORD said unto me, Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth
10 See, I have this day set thee over the nations
And over the kingdoms,
To root out, and to pull down,
And to destroy, and to throw down,
To build, and to plant.

Here is, First. Jeremiah's early designation to the work and office of a prophet, which God gives him notice of as a reason for his early application to that business, ver. 4, 5. The word of the Lord came to him with a satisfying assurance to himself that it was the word of the Lord, and not a delusion; and God told him, 1. That he had "ordained him a prophet to the nations," or against the nations. The nation of the Jews in the first place, who are therefore now reckoned among the nations, because they had learned their works, and mingled themselves with them in their idolatries, which otherwise they should not have been, Num. xxiii. 9. Yet he was given to be a prophet, not to the Jews only, but to the neighbour nations, to whom he was to send yokes, ch. xxvii. 3, and whom he must make to drink of the cup of the Lord's anger, ch. xxv. 17. He is still in his writings a prophet to the nations, (to our nation among the rest,) to tell them what the national judgments are which may be expected from national sins. It would be well for the nations, would they take Jeremiah for their prophet, and attend to the warnings he gives them. 2. That before he was born, even in his eternal counsel, he had designed him to be so. Let him know that he who gave him this commission is the same that gave him his being; that formed him in the belly, and brought him forth out of the womb, and therefore was his rightful owner, and might employ him and make use of him as he pleased; and that this commission was given him in pursuance of the purpose God had purposed in himself concerning him, before he was born: "I knew thee, and I sanctified thee;" that is, I determined that thou shouldest be a prophet, and set thee apart for the office. Thus St. Paul saith of himself, that God had separated him from his mother's womb, to be a Christian and an apostle, Gal. i. 15. Observe, 1st. The great Creator knows what use to make of every man before he makes him. He has made all for himself, and of the same lump of clay designs a vessel of honour or dishonour, as he pleaseth, Rom. ix. 21. 2nd. What God has designed men for he will call them to; for his purposes cannot be frustrated. Known unto God are all his own works beforehand, and his knowledge is infallible, and his purpose unchangeable. 3rd. There is a particular purpose and providence of God conversant about his prophets and ministers. They are by special counsel designed for their work; and what they are designed for they are fitted for. I that knew thee, sanctified thee. God destines them to it, and forms them for it, then when he first forms the spirit of man within him. Propheta nascitur, non fit,—'Original endowment, not education, makes a prophet.'

Secondly. His modest declining of this honourable employment, ver. 6. Though God had predestinated him to it, yet it was news to him, and a mighty surprise to hear that he should be "a prophet unto the nations." We know not what God intends us for, but he knows. One would have thought he should have catched at it as a piece of preferment, for so it was; but he objects against it, disables himself; "Ah, Lord God, behold I cannot speak" to great men and multitudes as prophets must. I cannot speak fine nor fluently, cannot word things well, as a message from God should be worded; I cannot speak with any authority, nor can expect to be heeded; for "I am a child," and my youth will be despised. Note, It becomes us, when we have any service to do for God, to be afraid lest we mismanage it, and lest it suffer through our weakness and unfitness for it. It becomes us likewise to have low thoughts of ourselves, and to be diffident of our own sufficiency. Those that are young should consider that they are so; should be afraid, as Elihu was, and not venture beyond their length.

Thirdly. The assurance God graciously gave him, that he would stand by him, and carry him on in his work.

1. Let him not object that he is a child, he shall be a prophet for all that; ver. 7, "Say not" any more "I am a child." It is true thou art; but, 1st. Thou hast God's precept, and let not that hinder thee from obeying it: go to all to whom I shall send thee, and speak whatsoever I command thee. Note, Though a sense of our own weakness and insufficiency should make us go humbly about our work, yet it should not make us draw back from it when God calls us to it. God was angry with Moses even for his modest excuses, Ex. iv. 14. 2nd. Thou hast God's presence, and let not thy being young discourage thee from depending upon it. Though thou art a child, thou shalt be enabled to go to all to whom I shall send thee, though they are never so great, and never so many. And whatsoever I command thee, thou shalt have judgment, memory, and language wherewith to speak it as it should be spoken. Samuel delivered a message from God to Eli when he was a little child. Note, God can when he pleaseth make children prophets, and ordain strength out of the mouth of babes and sucklings.

2. Let him not object that he shall meet with many enemies, and much opposition; God will be his protector, ver. 8; "Be not afraid of their faces." Though they look big, and so think to outface thee, and put thee out of countenance, yet be not afraid to speak to them, no, not to speak that to them which is most unpleasing; thou speakest in the name of the King of kings, and, by authority from him, and with that thou mayest face them down. Though they look angry, be not afraid of their displeasure, nor disturbed with apprehensions of the consequences of it. Those that have messages to deliver from God must not be afraid of the face of man, Eze. iii. 9. And thou hast cause to be both bold and easy, for I am with thee, not only to assist thee in thy work, but to deliver thee out of the hands of thy persecutors; and if God be for thee who can be against thee? If God do not deliver his ministers from trouble, it comes much to one, if he deliver them from sinking under their trouble. Mr. Gataker well observes here, that earthly princes are not wont to go along with their ambassadors, but God goes along with those whom he sends, and is, by his powerful protection, at all times and in all places present with them, and with this they ought to animate themselves, Acts xviii. 10.

3. Let him not object that he cannot speak as becomes him; God will enable him to speak. 1st. To speak intelligently, and as one that had acquaintance with God, ver. 9. He having now a vision of the Divine glory, "the Lord put forth his hand," and, by a sensible sign, conferred upon him so much of the gift of the tongue as was necessary for him. He touched his mouth, and with that touch opened his lips, that his mouth should shew forth God's praise; with that touch sweetly conveyed his words into his mouth, to be ready to him upon all occasions, so that he could never want words, who was thus furnished by him that made man's mouth. God not only put knowledge into his head, but words into his mouth; for there are words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, 1 Cor. ii. 13. It is fit God's message should be delivered in his own words, that it may be delivered punctually; Eze. iii. 4, "Speak with my words;" and those that faithfully do so, shall not want instructions as the case requires. God will give them a mouth and wisdom in that same hour, Mat. x. 19. 2nd. To speak powerfully, and as one that had authority from God, ver. 10. It is a strange commission that is here given him: "See, I have this day set thee over the nations, and over the kingdoms," which sounds very great, and yet Jeremiah is a poor, despicable priest still. He is not set over the kingdoms as a prince, to rule them by the sword, but as a prophet, by the power of the word of God. Those that would from hence prove the Pope's supremacy over kings, and his authority to depose them, and dispose of their kingdoms at his pleasure, must prove that he has the same extraordinary spirit of prophecy that Jeremiah had; else how can he have the power that Jeremiah had by virtue of that spirit? And yet the power that Jeremiah had, (who, notwithstanding his power, lived in meanness and contempt, and under oppression,) would not content those proud men. Jeremiah was set over the nations, the Jewish nation in the first place, and other nations (some great ones) besides, against whom he prophesied,—was set over them, not to demand tribute from them, or enrich himself with their spoils, but to root out, and pull down and destroy, and yet withal to build and plant. First. He must attempt to reform the nations, to root out, and pull down, and destroy idolatry and other wickednesses among them, to extirpate those vicious habits and customs which had long taken root, to throw down the kingdom of sin, that religion and virtue might be planted and built among them. And to the introducing and establishing of that which is good, it is necessary that that which is evil be removed. Secondly. He must tell them, that it would be well or ill with them, according as they were or were not reformed. He must set before them life and death, good and evil, according to God's declaration of the method he takes with kingdoms and nations, ch. xviii. 7—10. He must assure those who persisted in their wickedness, that they should be rooted out and destroyed, and those who repented, that they should be built and planted. He was authorized to read the doom of nations, and God would ratify and fulfil it, Isa. xliv. 26, would do it according to his word, and therefore is said to do it by his word. It is thus expressed, partly to shew how sure the word of prophecy is, it will as certainly be accomplished as if it were done already; and partly to put an honour upon the prophetical office, and make it look truly great, that others may not despise prophets, nor they disparage themselves. And yet more honourable doth the gospel ministry look, in that declarative power Christ gave his apostles to remit and retain sin, Jno. xx. 23; to bind and loose, Mat. xviii. 18.

11 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see a rod of an almond tree. 12 Then said the LORD unto me, Thou hast well seen: for I will hasten my word to perform it. 13 And the word of the LORD came unto me the second time, saying, What seest thou? And I said, I see a seething pot; and the face thereof is toward the north. 14 Then the LORD said unto me, authority just mentioned, but 588 according to the other. The uncertainty of which we have here an example is of constant occurrence in ancient chronology, as might be expected. Infidels pervert the circumstance to malicious ends, but recklessly, for there may be doubt as to the precise time of an event, when there is none as to the event having occurred; and the reality of the event is the one thing to know.

i. 10. It seems almost superfluous to remark that these words are wholly metaphorical, and relate solely to the predictions of the prophet; but it is worth noting that these words have been employed as denoting the literal authority of the Popes of Rome. Among others, an author who dedicated a book to Benedict XIV., the work being intended to show that the Pope had supreme power on earth in all kingdoms, quotes the language of this verse as a description and demonstration of Papal power.

i. 11, 12. There is in the original here a play upon words which

Out of the north an evil shall break forth
Upon all the inhabitants of the land. [north, 15 For, lo, I will call all the families of the kingdoms of the Saith the LORD;
And they shall come,
And they shall set every one his throne
At the entering of the gates of Jerusalem,
And against all the walls thereof round about,
And against all the cities of Judah.
16 And I will utter my judgments against them touching all their wickedness,
Who have forsaken me, and have burned incense unto other gods,
And worshipped the works of their own hands.
17 Thou therefore gird up thy loins, and arise,
And speak unto them all that I command thee:
Be not dismayed at their faces,
Lest I confound thee before them.
18 For, behold, I have made thee this day a defenced city,
and an iron pillar,
And brasen walls against the whole land,
Against the kings of Judah, against the princes thereof, Against the priests thereof, and against the people of the land
19 And they shall fight against thee;
But they shall not prevail against thee;
For I am with thee, saith the LORD, to deliver thee.

Here, First. God gives Jeremiah, in vision, a view of the principal errand he was to go upon, which was to foretell the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, for their sins, especially their idolatry. This was at first represented to him in a way proper to make an impression upon him, that he might have it upon his heart in all his dealings with this people.

1. He intimates to him that the people were ripening apace for ruin, and ruin was hastening apace towards them. God having answered his objection, that he was a child, goes on to initiate him in the prophetical learning and language; and, having promised to enable him to speak intelligibly to the people, he here teaches him to understand what God saith to him; for prophets must have eyes in their heads as well as tongues, must be seers as well as speakers: he therefore asks him, "Jeremiah, what seest thou?" Look about thee, and observe now. And he was soon aware what was presented to him; "I see a rod," noting affliction and chastisement, a correcting rod hanging over us; and it is "a rod of an almond tree," which is one of the forwardest trees in the spring, is in the bud and blossom presently, when other trees are scarce broken out. It flourisheth, saith Pliny, in the month of January, and by March hath ripe fruits; hence it is called in the Hebrew, Shakedh, 'the hasty tree.' Whether this rod that Jeremiah saw had already budded, as some think, or whether it was stripped and dry, as others think, and yet Jeremiah knew it to be of an almond tree, as Aaron's rod was, is uncertain; but God explained it in the next words, ver. 12, "Thou hast well seen." God commended him that he was so observant, and so quick of apprehension, as to be aware, though it was the first vision he ever saw, that it was "a rod of an almond tree," that his mind was so composed as to be able to distinguish. Prophets have need of good eyes; and those that see well shall be commended, and not those only that speak well. Thou hast seen a hasty tree, that signifies that "I will hasten my word to perform it." Jeremiah shall prophesy that which he himself shall live to see accomplished. We have the explication of this, Eze. vii. 10, 11, "The rod hath blossomed, pride hath budded, violence is risen up into a rod of wickedness." The measure of Jerusalem's iniquity fills very fast; and, as if their destruction slumbered too long, they waken it, they hasten it, and I will hasten to perform what I have spoken against them.

2. He intimates to him whence the intended ruin should arise. Jeremiah is a second time asked, "What seest thou?" And he sees a seething pot upon the fire, ver. 13, representing Jerusalem and Judah in a mighty toss and commotion, like boiling water, by reason of the descent which the Chaldean army made upon them; made like a fiery oven, Ps. xxi. 9, all in a heat, wasting away as boiling water doth, and sensibly evaporating and growing less and less; ready to boil over, to be thrown out of their own city and land, as out of the pan into the fire, from bad to worse. Some think those scoffers referred to this who said, Eze. xi. 3, "This city is the caldron, and we be the flesh." Now the mouth or face of the furnace or hearth, over which this pot boiled, was towards the north, for thence the fire and fuel was to come that must make the pot boil thus. So the vision is explained, ver. 14, "Out of the north an evil shall break," or shall be opened. It had been long designed by the justice of God, and long deserved by the sin of the people, and yet hitherto the Divine patience had restrained it, and held it in as it were. The enemies had intended it, and God had checked them; but now all restraints shall be taken off, and the "evil shall break forth;" the direful scene shall open, and the enemy shall come in like a flood. It shall be an universal calamity; it shall come "upon all the inhabitants of the land," from the highest to the lowest, for they have all corrupted their way. Look for this storm to arise out of the north, whence fair weather used to come, Job xxxvii. 22. When there was friendship between Hezekiah and the king of Babylon, they promised themselves many advantages out of the north, but it proved quite otherwise, out of the north their trouble arose. Thence, sometimes, the fiercest tempests come, whence we expected fair weather. This is farther explained, ver. 15, where we may observe, 1st. The raising of the army that shall invade Judah, and lay it waste: "I will call all the families of the kingdoms of the north, saith the Lord." All the northern crowns shall unite under Nebuchadnezzar, and join with him in this expedition. They lie dispersed, but God, that has all men's hearts in his hand, will bring them together: they lie at distance from Judah, but God, that directs all men's steps, will call them, and they shall come, though they be never so far off. God's summons shall be obeyed; they whom he calls shall come. When he has work to do of any kind, he will find instruments to do it, though he send to the utmost parts of the earth for them. And, that the armies brought into the field may be sufficiently numerous and strong, he will call, not only the kingdoms of the north, but all the families of those kingdoms into the service; not one able-bodied man shall be left behind. 2nd. The advance of this army. The commanders of the troops of the several nations shall take their post in carrying on the siege of Jerusalem, and other the cities of Judah. "They shall set every one his throne," or seat. When a city is besieged, we say, the enemy sits down before it. They shall encamp, some at the entering of the gates, others against the walls round about, to cut off both the going out of the mouths and the coming in of the meat, and so to starve them.

3. He tells him plainly what was the procuring cause of all these judgments: it was the sin of Jerusalem, and of the cities of Judah, ver. 16. 'I will pass sentence upon them,' so it may be read, or, give judgment against them, this sentence, this judgment, because of all their wickedness; that is it that plucks up the flood-gates, and lets in this inundation of calamities. They have forsaken God, and revolted from their allegiance to him, and have burnt incense to other gods, new gods, strange gods, and all false gods, pretenders, usurpers, the creatures of their own fancy, and they have "worshipped the works of their own hands." Jeremiah was young, had looked but little abroad into the world, and perhaps did not know, nor could have believed, what abominable idolatries the children of his people were guilty of; but God tells him, that he might know what to level his reproofs against, and what to ground his threatenings upon, and that he might himself be satisfied in the equity of the sentence which in God's name he was to pass upon them.

Secondly. God excites and encourageth Jeremiah to apply himself with all diligence and seriousness to his business. A great trust is committed to him; he is sent in God's name as a herald at arms, to proclaim war against his rebellious subjects; for God is pleased to give warning of his judgments beforehand, that sinners may be awakened to meet him by repentance, and so turn away his wrath, and that if they do not they may be left inexcusable. With this trust Jeremiah has a charge given him, ver. 17, "Thou therefore gird up thy loins;" free thyself from all those things that would disfit thee for, or hinder thee in, this service; buckle to it with readiness and resolution, and be not entangled with doubts about it. He must be quick, Arise, and lose no time; he must be busy, "Arise, and speak unto them," in season, out of season; he must be bold, 'Be not dismayed at their faces," as before, ver. 8. In a word, he must be faithful; it is required of ambassadors that they be so.

1. In two things he must be faithful: 1st. He must speak all that he is charged with; "Speak all that I command thee." He must forget nothing, as minute, or foreign, or not worth mentioning; every word of God is weighty. He must conceal nothing for fear of offending; he must alter nothing under pretence of making it more fashionable or more palatable, but without addition or diminution declare the whole counsel of God. 2nd. He must speak to all that he is charged against. He must not whisper it in a corner to a few particular friends, that will take it well, but he must appear "against the kings of Judah," if they be wicked kings, and bear his testimony against the sins even of "the princes thereof;" for the greatest of men are not exempt from the judgments, either of God's hand or of his mouth. Nay, he must not spare "the priests thereof;" though he himself was a priest, and was concerned to maintain the dignity of his order, yet he must not therefore flatter them in their sins. He must appear "against the people of the land," though they were his own people, as far as they were against the Lord.

2. And two reasons are here given why he should do thus: 1st. Because he had reason to fear the wrath of God, if he should be false; "Be not dismayed at their faces," so as to desert thine office, or balk the duty of it, "lest I confound" and dismay "thee before them," lest I give thee up to thy faintheartedness. Those that consult their own credit, ease, and safety, more than their work and duty, it is just with God to leave them to themselves, and to bring upon them the shame of their own cowardliness. Nay, lest I reckon with thee for thy faintheartedness, and break thee to pieces, so some read it. Therefore, this prophet says, ch. xvii. 17, Lord, "be not a terror to me." Note, The fear of God is the best antidote against the fear of man. Let us always be afraid of offending God, who, after he has killed, has power to cast into hell, and then we shall be in little danger of fearing the faces of men, that can but kill the body, Lu. xii. 4, 5; see Neh. iv. 14. It is better to have all the men in the world our enemies than God our enemy. 2nd. Because he had no reason to fear the wrath of man, if he were faithful, for the God whom he served would protect him, and bear him out, so that they should neither sink his spirits nor drive him off from his work, should neither stop his mouth nor take away his life, till he had finished his testimony, ver. 18. This young stripling of a prophet is made, by the power of God, as an impregnable city, fortified with iron pillars, and surrounded with walls of brass; he sallies out upon them in reproofs and threatenings, and keeps them in awe. They set upon him on every side; the kings and princes batter him with their power, the priests thunder against him with their church censures, and the people of the land shoot their arrows at him, even slanderous and bitter words; but he shall keep his ground, and make his part good with them; he shall still be a curb upon them, ver. 19. "They shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail" to destroy thee, "for I am with thee to deliver thee" out of their hands; nor shall they prevail to defeat the word that God sends them by Jeremiah, nor to deliver themselves; it shall take hold of them, for God is against them to destroy them. Note, Those who are sure they have God with them, as he is if they be with him, they need not, they ought not, to be afraid, whoever is against them.

CHAPTER II.

It is probable this chapter was Jeremiah's first sermon that he preached after his ordination; and a most lively pathetical sermon it is, as any we have in all the books of the Prophets. Let him not say, I cannot speak, for I am child; for God having touched his mouth, and put his words into it, none can speak better. The scope of the chapter is to shew God's people their transgression, even the house of Jacob their sins; it is all by way of reproof and conviction, that they might be brought to repent of their sins, and so prevent the ruin that was coming upon them. The charge drawn up against them is very high, the aggravations black, the arguments used for their conviction very close and pressing, and the expostulations very pungent and affecting. The sin which they are most particularly charged with here is idolatry, forsaking the true God, their own God, for other false gods. Now they are told, I. That this was ungrateful to God, who had been so kind to them, ver. 1—8. II. That it was without precedent, that a nation should change their gods, ver. 9—13. III. That hereby they had disparaged and ruined themselves, ver. 14—19. IV. That they had broken their covenants, and degenerated from their good beginnings, ver. 20, 21. V. That their wickedness was too plain to be concealed, and too bad to be excused, ver. 22, 23, 35. VI. That they persisted wilfully and obstinately in it, and were irreclaimable and indefatigable in their idolatries, ver. 24, 25, 33, 36. VII. That they shamed themselves by their idolatry, and should shortly be made ashamed of it, when they should find their idols unable to help them.

no English translation can imitate—shaked is "an almond tree," and shoked is "hasten," or rather "vigilant." The almond is called shaked because it is the first of the trees to awake from the torpor or slumber of winter. We should render the latter part of verse 12, "for I will be vigilant (or watchful) as to my word, to perform it."

i. 13. "A seething pot" is a pot boiling, literally "a pot blown," i.e., a pot boiling upon a fire which is blown, as Gesenius explains it. The "face" or mouth of the pot was not inclined towards the north, as our version has it, but away from the north, in which direction the wind came.

i. 14, 15. These verses explain verse 13, and directly threaten the invasion of Judea by the Babylonians, as most critics admit.

ii. 2. "I remember thee" would be more correctly rendered, "I remember in regard to thee, the kindness of thy youth," &c. The reference is clearly to the faithful love of Israel to the Lord in earlier days, and especially in the journey through the wilderness.

ver. 28—29, 37. VIII. That they had not been convinced and reformed by the rebukes of providence they had been under, ver. 30. IX. That they had put a great contempt upon God, ver. 31, 32. X. That with their idolatries they had mixed the most unnatural murders, shedding the blood of the poor innocents, ver. 34. And those hearts were hard indeed that were untouched and unhumbled when their sins were thus set in order before them. O that by meditating on this chapter we might be brought to repent of our spiritual idolatries; giving that place in our souls to the world and the flesh which should have been reserved for God only!

MOREOVER the word of the LORD came to me, saying,
2 Go and cry in the ears of Jerusalem, saying,
Thus saith the LORD; I remember thee,
The kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals,
When thou wentest after me in the wilderness,
In a land that was not sown.
3 Israel was holiness unto the LORD
And the firstfruits of his increase
All that devour him shall offend;
Evil shall come upon them, saith the LORD.
4 Hear ye the word of the LORD, O house of Jacob,
And all the families of the house of Israel:
5 Thus saith the LORD,
What iniquity have your fathers found in me,
That they are gone far from me,
And have walked after vanity, and are become vain?
6 Neither said they, Where is the LORD
That brought us up out of the land of Egypt,
That led us through the wilderness,
Through a land of deserts and of pits,
Through a land of drought, and of the shadow of death,
Through a land that no man passed through,
And where no man dwelt?
7 And I brought you into a plentiful country,
To eat the fruit thereof and the goodness thereof;
But when ye entered, ye defiled my land,
And made mine heritage an abomination.
8 The priests said not, Where is the LORD?
And they that handle the law knew me not:
The pastors also transgressed against me,
And the prophets prophesied by Baal,
And walked after things that do not profit.

Here is, First. A command given to Jeremiah to go and carry a message from God to the inhabitants of Jerusalem. He was charged in general, ch. i. 17, to go and speak to them; here he is particularly charged to go and speak this to them. Note, It is good for ministers, by faith and prayer, to take out a fresh commission, when they address themselves solemnly to any part of their work. Let a minister carefully compare what he has to deliver with the word of God, and see that it agrees with it; that he may be able to say not only, The Lord sent me, but, He sent me to speak this. He must go from Anathoth, where he lived in a pleasant retirement, spending his time, it is likely, in diversion and the study of the law, and must make his appearance at Jerusalem, that noisy, tumultuous city, and cry in their ears, as a man in earnest, and that would be heard. Cry aloud, that all may hear, and none may plead ignorance. Go close to them, and cry in the ears of those that have stopped their ears.

Secondly. The message he was commanded to deliver. He must upbraid them with their horrid ingratitude in forsaking a God who had been of old so kind to them, that this might either make them ashamed, and bring them to repentance, or might justify God in turning his hand against them.

1. God here puts them in mind of the favours he had of old bestowed upon them, when they were first formed into a people; ver. 2, "I remember" for thy sake, and would have thee to remember it, and improve the remembrance of it for thy good; I cannot forget "the kindness of thy youth," and "the love of thine espousals." This may be understood,

1st. Of the kindness they had for God. It was not such indeed as they had any reason to boast of, or to plead with God for favour to be shewn them, for many of them were very unkind and provoking; and when they did return and inquire early after God they did but flatter him. Yet God is pleased to mention it and plead it with them; for though it was but little love they shewed him he took it kindly. When they believed the Lord and his servant Moses, when they sang God's praise at the Red sea, when, at the foot of mount Sinai, they promised, "All that the Lord shall say unto us, we will do, and will be obedient," then was "the kindness of their youth," and "the love of their espousals." When they seemed so forward for God he said, "Surely they are my people," and will be faithful to me, "children that will not lie." Note, Those that begin well and promise fair, but do not perform and persevere, will justly be upbraided with their hopeful and promising beginnings. God remembers the kindness of our youth and love of our espousals, the zeal we then seemed to have for him, and the affection wherewith we made our covenants with him, the buds and blossoms that never came to perfection; and it is good for us to remember them, that we may remember whence we are fallen, and return to our first love, Rev. ii. 4, 5; Gal. iv. 15. In two things appeared the kindness of their youth: First. That they followed the conduct of the pillar of cloud and fire in the wilderness, and though sometimes they spoke of returning into Egypt or pushing forward into Canaan, yet they did neither, but for forty years together went after God in the wilderness, and trusted him to provide for them, though it was a land that was not sown. This God took kindly, and took notice of it to their praise long after, that, though much was amiss among them, yet they never forsook the conduct they were under. Thus, though Christ often chid his disciples, yet he commended them at parting for continuing with him, Lu. xxii. 28. It must be the strong affection of the youth and the espousals that will carry us on to follow God in a wilderness with an implicit faith and an entire resignation; and it is pity those that have so followed him should ever leave him. Secondly. That they entertained Divine institutions, set up the tabernacle among them, and attended the service of it. Israel was then holiness to the Lord; they joined themselves to him in covenant as a peculiar people. Thus they began in the spirit; and God puts them in mind of it, that for shame they might not end in the flesh. Or it may be understood,

2nd. Of God's kindness to them; and of that he afterwards speaks largely, "When Israel was a child, then I loved him," Hos. ii. 1. He then espoused that people to himself, with all the affection with which a young man marries a virgin, Isa. lxii. 5, for the time was a time of love, Eze. xvi. 8. First. God appropriated them to himself. Though they were a sinful people, yet, by virtue of the covenant made with them and the church set up among them, they were "holiness to the Lord," dedicated to his honour, and taken under his special tuition. They were the "firstfruits of his increase," the first constituted church he had in the world; they were the firstfruits, but the full harvest was to be gathered from among the Gentiles. The firstfruits of the increase were God's part of it, were offered to him, and he was honoured with them. So were the people of the Jews; what little tribute, rent, and homage God had from the world, he had it chiefly from them; and it was their honour to be thus set apart for God. This honour have all the saints; they are the firstfruits of his creatures, Jas. i. 18. Secondly. Having espoused them he espoused their cause, and became an enemy to their enemies, Ex. xxiii. 22 Being the firstfruits of his increase, all that devoured him (so it should be read, did offend, they trespassed, they contracted guilt, and evil befell them; as those were reckoned offenders that devoured the firstfruits, or anything else that was holy to the Lord, that embezzled them, or converted them to their own use, Lev. v. 15. Whoever offered any injury to the people of God, it was at their peril; their God was ready to avenge their quarrel, and said to the proudest of kings, "Touch not mine anointed," Ps. cv. 14, 15; Ex. xvii. 14. He had in a special manner a controversy with those that attempted to debauch them, and draw them off from being holiness to the Lord; witness his quarrel with the Midianites, about the matter of Peor, Num. xxv. 17, 18. Thirdly. He brought them out of Egypt with a high hand and great terror, Deu. iv. 34, and yet with a kind hand and great tenderness led them through a vast howling wilderness, ver. 6, "a land of deserts and of pits," or of graves; terram sepulchralem,—'a sepulchral land;' where there was ground, not to feed them, but to bury them; where there was no good to be expected, for it was "a land of drought," but all manner of evil to be feared, for it was "the shadow of death." In that darksome valley they walked forty years, but God was with them; his rod, in Moses' hand, and his staff comforted them, and even there God prepared a table for them, Ps. xxiii. 4, 5, gave them bread out of the clouds and drink out of the rocks. It was a land abandoned by all mankind, as yielding neither road nor rest; it was no thoroughfare, for no man passed through it; no settlement, for no man dwelt there; for God will teach his people to tread untrodden paths, to dwell alone, and to be singular. The difficulties of the journey are thus insisted upon, to magnify the power and goodness of God, in bringing them through all safe to their journey's end at last. All God's spiritual Israel must own their obligations to him for a safe conduct through the wilderness of this world no less dangerous to the soul than that was to the body. Fourthly. At length he settled them in Canaan; ver. 7, "I brought you into a plentiful country," which would be the more acceptable, after they had been for so many years in a land of drought. They did "eat the fruit thereof, and the goodness thereof," and were allowed so to do. 'I brought you into a land of Carmel,' so the word is. Carmel was a place of extraordinary fruitfulness; Canaan was as one great fruitful field, Deu. viii. 7. Fifthly. God gave them the means of knowledge, and grace, and communion with him. That is implied, ver. 8; they had priests that handled the law, read it, and expounded it to them; that was part of their business, Deu. xxxiii. 8. They had pastors to guide them and take care of their affairs, magistrates, and judges; they had prophets to consult God for them, and to make known his mind to them.

2. He upbraids them with their horrid ingratitude, and the ill returns they had made him for these favours; let them all come and answer to this charge, ver. 4. It is exhibited in the name of God against all the families of the house of Israel, for they can none of them plead not guilty.

1st. He challenges them to produce any instance of his being unjust and unkind to them. Though he had conferred favours upon them in some things, yet if in other things he had dealt hardly with them, they had not been altogether without excuse. He therefore puts it fairly to them, to shew cause for their deserting him, ver. 5, "What iniquity have your fathers found in me," or you either? Have you, upon trial, found God a hard master? Have his commands put any hardship upon you, or obliged you to any thing unfit, unfair, or unbecoming you? Have his promises put any cheats upon you, or raised your expectations of things, which you were afterwards disappointed of? You that renounce your covenant with God, can you say it was a hard bargain and that which you could not live upon? You that forsake the ordinances of God, can you say it was because they were a wearisome service, or work that there was nothing to be got by? No, what disappointments you have met with, it was long of yourselves, not long of God. The yoke of his commandments is easy, and in keeping of them there is great reward. Note, Those that forsake God cannot say that he has ever given them any provocation to do so. And for this we may safely appeal to the consciences of sinners; the slothful servant, that offered such a plea as this, had it overruled out of his own mouth, Lu. xix. 22. Though he afflicts us we cannot say there is iniquity in him; he doth us no wrong. The ways of the Lord are undoubtedly equal; all the iniquity is in our ways.

2nd. He chargeth them with being very unjust and unkind to him notwithstanding. First. They had quitted his service; They are gone from me; nay, they are gone far from me. They studied how to estrange themselves from God and their duty, and got as far as they could out of the reach of his commandments and their own convictions. Those that have deserted religion commonly set themselves at a greater distance from it, and in greater opposition to it, than those that never knew it. Secondly. They had quitted it for the service of idols, which was so much the greater reproach to God and his service. They went from him, not to mend themselves, but to cheat themselves; "They have walked after vanity," that is, idolatry, for an idol is a vain thing; it is nothing in the world, 1 Cor. viii. 4; Deu. xxxii. 21; ch. xiv. 22. Idolatrous worships are vanities, Acts xiv. 15; idolaters are vain, for they that make idols are like unto them, Ps. cxv. 8; as much stocks and stones as the images they worship, and good for as little. Thirdly. They had with idolatry introduced all manner of wickedness. When they entered into the good land which God gave them, they defiled it, ver. 7, by defiling themselves, and disfitting themselves for the service of God. It was God's land; they were but tenants to him, sojourners in it, Lev. xxv. 23. It was his heritage, for it was a holy land, Immanuel's land, but they made it an abomination, even to God himself, who was wroth, and greatly abhorred Israel. Fourthly. Having forsaken God, though they

ii. 5. Dr. Henderson omits "Thus saith the Lord" from his translation, but gives no reason for doing so. The words are in the Hebrew.

ii. 7. The words "a plentiful country" scarcely convey the force of the original, which is, "a land of gardens," or "a land like a garden."

ii. 8. "They that handle the law" are those who treat of and expound the law, like the scribes and lawyers of the New Testament.

ii. 10. Chittim is usually understood to be either Cyprus or Citium, a city in that island. Kedar is the Arab tribe of the Kedarenes.

ii. 13. A fountain of living waters is one from which water constantly flows. The Israelites had forsaken the perennial spring, and had hewn out or excavated cisterns or tanks for themselves from which the water escaped. The application is obvious.

ii. 14. Israel was not a slave unconnected with the family, nor a servant born in the house, but his Father's child (Exod. iv. 22).

soon found they had changed for the worse, yet they had no thoughts of returning to him again, nor took any steps towards it. Neither the people nor the priests made any inquiry after him, took no thought about their duty to him, nor expressed any desire to recover his favour. 1st. The people said not, "Where is the Lord?" ver. 6. Though they were trained up in observance of him as their God, and had been often told that he brought them out of the land of Egypt, to be a people peculiar to himself, yet they never asked after him, nor desired the knowledge of his ways. 2nd. "The priests said not, Where is the Lord?" ver. 8. They whose office it was to attend immediately upon him were in no concern to acquaint themselves with him, or approve themselves to him. They who should have instructed the people in the knowledge of God took no care to get the knowledge of him themselves. The scribes, that handled the law, did not know God nor his will; either could not expound the Scriptures at all or not aright. The pastors, that should have kept the flock from transgressing, were themselves ringleaders in transgression; They have transgressed against me. The pretenders to prophecy prophesied by Baal, in his name, to his honour, being backed and supported by the wicked kings to confront the Lord's prophets. Baal's prophets joined with Baal's priests, and walked after the things that do not profit, that is, after the idols which can be no way helpful to their worshippers. See how the best characters are usurped, and the best offices liable to corruption; and wonder not at the sin and ruin of a people when the blind are leaders of the blind.

9 Wherefore I will yet plead with you, saith the LORD,
And with your children's children will I plead.
10 For pass over the isles of Chittim, and see;
And send unto Kedar, and consider diligently,
And see if there be such a thing.
11 Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods?
But my people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit.
12 Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this,
And be horribly afraid,
Be ye very desolate, saith the LORD.
13 For my people have committed two evils;
They have forsaken me the fountain of living waters,
And hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns,
That can hold no water.

The prophet, having shewed their base ingratitude in forsaking God, here shews their unparalleled fickleness and folly; ver. 9, "I will yet plead with you." Note, Before God punisheth sinners he pleads with them, to bring them to repentance. And when much hath been said of the evil of sin, yet still there is more to be said. When one article of the charge is made good, there is another to be urged; when we have said a great deal, still we "have yet to speak on God's behalf," Job xxxvi. 2. And those that deal with sinners for their conviction must urge a variety of arguments, and follow their blow. God had before pleaded with their fathers, and asked why they walked after vanity and became vain, ver. 5; now he pleads with them who persisted in that vain conversation received by tradition from their fathers, and with their children's children, that is, with all that in every age tread in their steps. Let those that forsake God know that he is willing to argue the case fairly with them, that he may be justified when he speaks; he pleads that with us which we should plead with ourselves.

First. He shews that they acted contrary to the usage of all nations. Their neighbours were more firm and faithful to their false gods than they were to the true God. They were ambitious of being like the nations, and yet in this they were unlike them; he challengeth them to produce an instance of any nation that had changed their gods, ver. 10, 11, or were apt to change them. Let them survey either the old records or the present state of the isles of Chittim, Greece, and the European islands, the countries that were more polite and learned; and of Kedar, that lay south-east, (as the other north-west from them,) which were more rude and barbarous; and they should not find an instance of a nation that had changed their gods, though they had never done them any kindness, nor could do, for they were no gods. Such a veneration had they for their gods, and so good an opinion of them, and such a respect for the choice their fathers had made, that though they were gods of wood and stone they would not change them for gods of silver and gold,—no, not for the living and true God. Shall we praise them for this? we praise them not. But it may well be urged to the reproach of Israel that they, who were the only people that had no cause to change their God, were yet the only people that had changed him. Note, Men are hardly brought off that religion which they have been brought up in, though never so absurd and grossly false. The zeal and constancy of idolaters should shame Christians out of their coldness and inconstancy.

Secondly. He shews that they acted contrary to the dictates of common sense, in that they not only changed,—it may sometimes be our duty and wisdom to do so,—but they changed for the worse, and made an ill bargain for themselves. 1. They parted from a God that was their glory, that made them truly glorious, and every way put honour upon them; one whom they might with an humble confidence glory in as theirs, who is himself a glorious God, and the glory of those whose God he is. He was particularly the glory of his people Israel, for his glory had often appeared on their tabernacle. 2. They closed with gods that could do them no good, gods that do not profit their worshippers. Idolaters change God's glory into shame, Rom. i. 23, and so they do their own. In dishonouring him they disgrace and disparage themselves, and are enemies to their own interest. Note, Whatever they turn to that forsake God it will never do them any good; it will flatter them and please them, but it cannot profit them. Heaven itself is here called upon to stand amazed at the sin and folly of these apostates from God; ver. 12, 13, "Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this." The earth is so universally corrupt that it will take no notice of it, but let the heavens and heavenly bodies be astonished at it. Let the sun blush to see such ingratitude, and be afraid to shine upon such ungrateful wretches. They that forsook God worshipped the host of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars; but these, instead of being pleased with the adorations that were paid to them, were astonished and horribly afraid, and would rather have been very desolate, utterly exhausted, (as the word is,) and deprived of their light, than that it should have given occasion to any to worship them. Some refer it to the angels of heaven. If they rejoice at the return of souls to God we may suppose they are astonished and horribly afraid at the revolt of souls from him. The meaning is, that the carriage of this people towards God was such as, 1st. We may well admire and wonder at, that ever men that pretend to reason should do a thing so very absurd. 2nd. Such as we ought to have a holy indignation at, as impious, and a high affront to our Maker, whose honour every good man is jealous for. 3rd. Such as we may tremble to think of the consequences of; what will be in the end hereof? Be horribly afraid to think of that wrath and curse which will be the portion of those that thus throw themselves out of God's grace and favour. Now what is it that is to be thought of with all this horror? It is this: My people, whom I have taught and should have ruled, have committed two great evils, ingratitude and folly; they have acted contrary both to their duty and to their interest. First. They have affronted their God by turning their back upon him, as if he were not worthy their notice; "They have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters," in whom they have an abundant and constant supply of all that comfort and relief they stand in need of, and they have it freely; God is their fountain of life, Ps. xxxvi. 9. There is in him an all-sufficiency of grace and strength; all our springs are in him, and our streams from him; to forsake him is in effect to deny this. He has been to us a bountiful benefactor, "a fountain of living waters," overflowing, everflowing in the gifts of his favour; to forsake him is to refuse to acknowledge his kindness, and to withhold that tribute of love and praise which his kindness calls for. Secondly. They have cheated themselves; they forsook their own mercies, but it was for lying vanities. They took a great deal of pains to hew them out cisterns, to dig pits or pools in the earth or rock, which they would carry water to, or which should receive the rain; but they proved broken cisterns, false at the bottom, so that they could hold no water. When they came to quench their thirst there, they found nothing but mud and mire, and the filthy sediments of a standing lake. Such idols were to their worshippers; and such a change did they experience who turned from God to them. If we make an idol of any creature, wealth, or pleasure, or honour, if we place our happiness in it, and promise ourselves that comfort and satisfaction in it which is to be had in God only,—if we make it our joy and love, our hope and confidence,—we shall find it a cistern, which we take a great deal of pains to hew out and fill, and at the best it will hold but a little water, and that dead and flat, and soon corrupting, and become nauseous. Nay, it is a broken cistern, that cracks and cleaves in hot weather, so that the water is gone when we have most need of it, Job vi. 15. Let us therefore, with purpose of heart, cleave to the Lord only; for whither else shall we go? He hath the words of eternal life.

The prophet, farther to evince the folly of their forsaking God, shews them what mischiefs they had already brought upon themselves by it; it had already cost them dear, for to this was owing all the calamities their country was now groaning under; which were but an earnest of more and greater, if they repented not. See how they smarted for their folly!

First. Their neighbours, that were their professed enemies, prevailed against them; and that was long of their sin.

1. They were enslaved, and lost their liberty; ver. 14, "Is Israel a servant?" No; "Israel is my son, my firstborn," Ex. iv. 22. They are children, they are heirs; nay, their extraction is noble, they are the seed of Abraham, God's friend, and of Jacob his chosen. "Is he a home-born slave?" No, he is not the son of the bondwoman, but of the free. Every thing in their constitution carried on it the marks of freedom and honour. "Why then is he spoiled" of his liberty? Why is he used as a servant, as a home-born slave? Why doth he make himself a slave to his lusts, to his idols, to that which doth not profit?" ver. 11. What a thing is this, that such a birthright should be sold for a mess of pottage? Such a crown profaned, and laid in the dust? Why is he made a slave to the oppressor? God provided that a Hebrew servant should be free the seventh year, and that their slaves should be of the heathen, not of their brethren, Lev. xxv. 44, 46. But, notwithstanding this, the princes made slaves of their subjects, and masters of their servants, ch. xxxiv. 11, and so made their country mean and miserable, which God had made happy and honourable. The neighbouring princes and powers broke in upon them, and made some of them slaves even in their own country, and perhaps sold others for slaves into foreign countries. And how came they thus to lose their liberties? Why, for their iniquities they sold themselves, Isa. l. 1. We may apply this spiritually: Is the soul of man a servant? Is it a home-born slave? No, it is not. Why then is it spoiled? It is because it has sold its own liberty, and enslaved itself to divers lusts and passions, which is a lamentation, and should be for a lamentation.

2. They were impoverished, and had lost their wealth. God brought them into a plentiful country, ver. 7, but all their neighbours made a prey of it; ver. 15, Young lions roar aloud over him, and yell; they are a continual terror to him; sometimes one potent enemy, and sometimes another, and sometimes many in confederacy, fall upon him, and triumph over him. They carry off the fruits of his land, and make that waste; burn his cities, when first they have plundered them; so that they remain without inhabitant, either because there

ii. 16. "The children of Noph and Tahapanes" are the people of those cities. Noph is the city of Memphis, in the delta of the Nile. Tahapanes is supposed to be the Daphne of the Greeks, a city near Pelusium, on one of the lower branches of the Nile. Instead of "have broken the crown of thy head" we may understand, "have depastured," i.e., have made it bare, have taken away its glory.

ii. 18. "Sihor" is the Nile, and "the river" is the Euphrates. Israel ought not to resort to Egypt and Assyria, to form alliances with them. The word Sihor means the "black river," as the Greeks also called it. The word Nile itself is said to have the same primary meaning in Sanscrit, from which Von Bohlen and others have derived it. The name was given to the stream because of its dark and turbid water. Notwithstanding the black mud or earthy matter held in solution by the Nile, the water has always been regarded as both sweet and wholesome, and if allowed to stand, it clears itself, as is true of the water of some other rivers. That the Euphrates is are no houses to dwell in or because those that should dwell in them are carried into captivity.

3. They were abused and insulted over, and beaten by every body; ver. 16, even "the children of Noph and Tahapanes," despicable people, not famed for military courage or strength, "have broken the crown of thy head," or fed upon it. In all their struggles with thee they have been too hard for thee, and thou hast always come off with a broken head. The principal part of thy country, that which lay next Jerusalem, has been, and is, a prey to them. How calamitous the condition of Judah had been of late in the reign of Manasseh, we find, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 11; and perhaps it had not now much recovered itself.

4. All this was owing to their sin; ver. 17, "Hast thou not procured this unto thyself?" By their sinful confederacies with the nations, and especially their conformity to them in their idolatrous customs and usages, they had made themselves very mean and contemptible; as all those do that have made a profession of religion and afterwards throw it off. Nothing now appeared of that which, by their constitution, made them both honourable and formidable; and therefore nobody either respected them, or feared them. But this was not all; they had provoked God to give them up into the hands of their enemies, and to make them a scourge to them, and give them success against them. And thus "thou hast procured it to thyself, in that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God," revolted from thine allegiance to him, and so thrown thyself out of his protection; for protection and allegiance go together. Whatever trouble we are in at any time we may thank ourselves for it, for we bring it upon our own head by our forsaking God: 'Thou hast forsaken thy God at the time that he was leading thee by the way;' so it should be read. Then when he was leading thee on to a happy peace and settlement, and thou wast within a step of it; then thou forsookest him, and so didst put a bar in thine own door.

Secondly. Their neighbours, that were their pretended friends, deceived them, distressed them, and helped them not; and this also was owing to their sin.

1. They did in vain seek to Egypt and Assyria for help; ver. 18, "What hast thou to do in the way of Egypt?" When thou art under apprehensions of danger, thou art running to Egypt for help, Isa. xxx. 1; xxxi. 1. Thou art for drinking the waters of Sihor, that is, Nilus. Thou reliest upon their multitude, and refreshest thyself with the fair promises they make thee. At other times thou art in the way of Assyria, sending or going with all speed to fetch recruits from thence, and thinkest to satisfy thyself with the waters of the river Euphrates. But what hast thou to do there? What wilt thou get by applying thyself to them? They shall help in vain, shall be broken reeds to thee; and what thou thoughtest would be to thee as a river will be but a broken cistern.

2. This also was because of their sin. The judgment shall unavoidably come upon them which their sin has deserved; and then to what purpose is it to call for help against it? ver. 19, "Thine own wickedness shall correct thee," and then it is impossible for them to save thee. "Know and see" therefore, upon the whole matter, "that it is an evil thing that thou hast forsaken God," for that is it that makes thine enemies enemies indeed, and thy friends friends in vain. Observe here, 1st. The nature of sin. It is forsaking the Lord as our God; it is the soul's alienation from him, and aversion to him. Cleaving to sin is leaving God. 2nd. The cause of sin. It is because his fear is not in us. It is for want of a good principle in us, particularly for want of the fear of God, that is at the bottom of our apostacy from him. Therefore men forsake their duty to God, because they stand in no awe of him, nor have any dread of his displeasure. 3rd. The malignity of sin. "It is an evil thing, and bitter." Sin is an evil thing, an only evil; an evil that has no good in it; an evil that is the root and cause of all other evil. It is an evil indeed, for it is not only the greatest contrariety to the Divine nature, but the greatest corruption of the human nature. It is bitter. A state of sin is the gall of bitterness; and every sinful way will be bitterness in the latter end. The wages of it is death, and death is bitter. 4th. The fatal consequences of sin. As it is in itself evil and bitter, so it has a direct tendency to make us miserable. "Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee;" not only destroy and ruin thee hereafter, but correct and reprove thee now; that is, it will certainly bring trouble upon thee. The punishment will so inevitably follow the sin, that the sin shall itself be said to punish thee. Nay, the punishment, in the kind and circumstances of it, shall so directly answer the sin, that thou mayest read the sin in the punishment; and the justice of the punishment shall be so plain, that thou shalt not have a word to say for thyself; thy own wickedness shall convince thee, and stop thy mouth for ever, and thou shalt be forced to own that the Lord is righteous. 5th. The use and application of all this. "Know, therefore, and see" it, and repent of thy sin, that so the iniquity, that is thy correction, may not be thy ruin.

20 For of old time I have broken thy yoke,
And burst thy bands; and thou saidst, I will not transgress;
When upon every high hill
And under every green tree
Thou wanderest, playing the harlot.
21 Yet I had planted thee a noble vine,
Wholly a right seed:
How then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto me?
22 For though thou wash thee with nitre,
And take thee much sope,
Yet thine iniquity is marked before me,
Saith the Lord GOD.
23 How canst thou say, I am not polluted,
I have not gone after Baalim?
See thy way in the valley,
Know what thou hast done:
Thou art a swift dromedary traversing her ways,
24 A wild ass used to the wilderness,
That snuffeth up the wind at her pleasure;
In her occasion who can turn her away?
All they that seek her will not weary themselves;
In her month they shall find her.
25 Withhold thy foot from being unshod,
And thy throat from thirst:
But thou saidst,
There is no hope:
No; for I have loved strangers,
And after them will I go.
26 As the thief is ashamed when he is found,
So is the house of Israel ashamed;
They, their kings, their princes,
And their priests, and their prophets,
27 Saying to a stock, Thou art my father;
And to a stone, Thou hast brought me forth: [face:
For they have turned their back unto me, and not their
But in the time of their trouble they will say, Arise, and save us.
28 But where are thy gods that thou hast made thee?
Let them arise, if they can save thee in the time of thy trouble:
For according to the number of thy cities
Are thy gods, O Judah.

In these verses the prophet goes on with his charge against this backsliding people. Observe here,

First. The sin itself that he charges them with, and that is idolatry, that great provocation which they were so notoriously guilty of. 1. They frequented the places of idol worship; ver. 20, "upon every high hill, and under every green tree;" in the high places and the groves, such as the heathen had a foolish fondness and veneration for. Thou wanderest first to one, and then to another, like one unsettled, and still uneasy and unsatisfied; but in all playing the harlot, worshipping false gods, which is spiritual whoredom, and was commonly accompanied with corporal whoredom too. Note, They that leave God wander endlessly, and a vagrant lust is insatiable. 2. They made images for themselves, and gave Divine honour to them, ver. 26, 27. Not only the common people, but even the kings and princes, that should have restrained the people from doing ill, and the priests and prophets, that should have taught them to do well, were themselves so wretchedly sottish and stupid, and under the power of such a strong delusion, as to say to a stock, "Thou art my father," that is, thou art my god, the author of my being, to whom I owe duty, and on whom I have a dependence; saying to a stone, to an idol made of stone, "Thou hast begotten me," or "brought me forth," therefore protect me, provide for me, and bring me up. What greater affront could men put upon God, who is our Father that has made us? It was a downright disowning of their obligations to him. What greater affront could men put upon themselves and their own reason, to acknowledge that which is in itself absurd and impossible; and, by making stocks and stones their parents, to make themselves no better than stocks and stones? When these were first made the objects of worship, they were supposed to be animated by some celestial power or spirit; but by degrees the thought of this was lost, and so vain did idolaters become in their imagination, even the princes and priests themselves, that the very idol, though made of wood and stone, was supposed to be their father, and adored accordingly. 3. They multiplied their dunghill deities endlessly; ver. 28, "According to the number of thy cities are thy gods, O Judah." When they had forsaken that God, who is one, and all-sufficient for all, 1st. They were not satisfied with any gods they had, but still desired more. That idolatry being in this respect of the same nature with covetousness, which is spiritual idolatry, that the more men have the more they would have; which is a plain evidence that what men make an idol of, they find to be insufficient and unsatisfying, and that it cannot make the comers thereunto perfect. 2nd. They could not agree in the same god. Having left the centre of unity, they fell into endless discord; one city fancied one deity, and another another, and each was fond to have one of its own, to be near them, and to take special care of them. Thus did they in vain seek that in many gods which is to be found in one God only.

Secondly. The proof of this upon them. No witnesses need be called, it is proved by the notorious evidence of the facts.

1. They went about to deny it, and were ready to plead not guilty. They pretended they would acquit themselves from this guilt, washed themselves with nitre, and took much soap; offered many things in excuse and extenuation of it, ver. 22. They pretended they did not worship these as gods, but as demons, and mediators between the immortal God and mortal men; or that it was not Divine honour that they gave them, but civil respect; thus they sought to evade the convictions of God's word, and to screen themselves from the dread of his wrath. Nay, some of them had the impudence to deny the thing itself; they said, "I am not polluted, I have not gone after Baalim," ver. 23. Because it was done secretly, and industriously concealed, Eze. viii. 12, they thought it could never be proved upon them, and they had front enough to deny it. In this, as in other things, their way was like that of the adulterous woman, that saith, "I have done no wickedness," Pr. xxx. 20.

2. Notwithstanding all their evasions, they are convicted of it, and found guilty. How canst thou deny the fact, and say, "I have not gone after Baalim?" How canst thou deny the fault, and say, "I am not polluted?" The prophet speaks with wonder at their impudence. How canst thou put on a face to say so, when it is certain: 1st. God's omniscience is a witness against thee? "Thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God." It is laid up, and hidden, to be produced against thee in the day of judgment; sealed up among his treasures, Deu. xxxii. 34; Job xxi. 9; Hos. xiii. 12. It is imprinted deep, and stained before me, so some read it. Though thou endeavour to wash it out, as murderers to get the stain of the blood of the person slain out of their clothes, yet it will never be got out; God's eye is upon it, and we are sure that his judgment is according to truth. 2nd. Thine own conscience is a witness against thee. "See thy way in the valley." They had worshipped idols not only on the high hills, but in the valleys, Isa. lvii. 5, 6. In the valley over against Beth-peor, so some, where they worshipped Baal-peor, Deu. xxiv. 6; Num. xxv. 3; as if the prophet looked as far back as the iniquity of Peor. But if it mean any particular valley, surely it is the valley of the son of Hinnom; for that was the place where they sacrificed their children to Moloch, and which therefore witnessed against them more than simply called "the river" will surprise no one who remembers that it was the only great watercourse between Judea and Assyria. Even the Tigris, which lies much farther east, falls into the Euphrates long before it reaches the ocean.

ii. 22. "Nitre" here is not what we mean by the word, viz., saltpetre, but natron, an alkali found plentifully in Egypt and elsewhere, and used for cleansing purposes. "Sope," also, is not our soap, but a kali obtained from various plants by burning, and employed like natron for washing linen, &c. Mixed with oil, it did form a sort of soap.

ii. 23. "Baalim" is the plural of Baal, and alludes to the numerous Baals recognised by Eastern idolaters. Not a few of them seem to have been local deities, as may be inferred from divers names of places mentioned in the Bible. The popular worship led to the name of Baal being incorporated also in the proper names of persons, as found in Scripture and in other ancient records. The any other. Look into that valley, and thou canst not but know what thou hast done.

Thirdly. The aggravations of this sin with which they are charged, which speak it exceeding sinful.

1. God had done great things for them, and yet they revolted from him, and rebelled against him; ver. 20, "Of old time I have broken thy yoke, and burst thy bonds." This refers to the bringing of them out of the land of Egypt and the house of bondage, which they would not remember, ch. ii. 6, but God did; for when he told them they should have no other gods before him, he prefixed this as a reason, "I am the Lord thy God, that brought thee out of the land of Egypt;" and these bonds of theirs, which God had loosed, should have bound them for ever to him; but they had ungratefully broken the bonds of duty to that God who had broken the bonds of their slavery.

2. They had promised fair, but had not made good their promise; "Thou saidst, I will not transgress." Then, when the mercy of thy deliverance was fresh, thou wast so sensible of it that thou wast willing to lay thyself under the most sacred ties to continue faithful to thy God, and never to forsake him. Then they said, "Nay, but we will serve the Lord," Jos. xxiv. 21. How often have we said we would not transgress, we would not offend any more, and yet we have started aside like a deceitful bow, and repeated and multiplied our transgressions.

3. They had wretchedly degenerated from what they were when God first formed them into a people; ver. 21, "I had planted thee a noble vine." The constitution of their government, both in church and state, was excellent, their laws righteous, and all the ordinances instructive and very significant; and a generation of good men there was amongst them when they first settled in Canaan; "Israel served the Lord," and kept close to him, "all the days of Joshua, and the elders that outlived Joshua," Jos. xxiv. 31; they were then wholly a right seed, likely to replenish the vineyard they were planted in with choice vines. But it proved otherwise; the very next generation "knew not the Lord, nor the works which he had done," Jud. ii. 10; and so they were worse and worse, till they became "the degenerate plants of a strange vine." They were now the reverse of what they were at first; their constitution was quite broken, and there was nothing in them of that good which one might have expected from a people so happily formed; nothing of the purity and piety of their ancestors. "Their vine is as the vine of Sodom," Deu. xxxii. 32. This may fitly be applied to the nature of man; it was planted by its great Author a noble vine, a right seed. God made man upright; but it is so universally corrupt, that it is become "the degenerate plant of a strange vine," that bears gall and wormwood; and it is so to God, it is highly distasteful and offensive to him.

4. They were violent and eager in the pursuit of their idolatries, doated on their idols, and were fond of new ones; and they would not be restrained from them either by the word of God or by his providences, so strong was the impetus with which they were carried out after this sin. They are here compared to "a swift dromedary traversing her ways;" a female of that species of creature hunting about for a male, ver. 23; and to the same purpose, "a wild ass used to the wilderness," ver. 24, not tamed by labour, and therefore very wanton; "snuffing up the wind at her pleasure," when she comes near the he ass, and on such an "occasion who can turn her away?" who can hinder her from that which she lusteth after? "They that seek her then will not weary themselves for her," for they know it is to no purpose; but will have a little patience until she is big with young, until that month comes which is the last of the months which she fulfils, Job xxxix. 2; when she is heavy and unwieldy, and then they shall find her, and she cannot outrun them. Note, 1st. Eager lust is a brutish thing, and those that will not be turned away from the gratifying and indulging of it by reason, and conscience, and honour, are to be reckoned as brute beasts, and no better; such as were born, and still are, like the wild ass's colt. Let them not be looked upon as rational creatures. 2nd. Idolatry is strangely intoxicating, and those that are addicted to it will very hardly be cured of it. That lust is as headstrong as any other. 3rd. There are some so violently set upon the prosecution of their lusts, that it is to no purpose to attempt to give check to them. They that do it weary themselves in vain. "Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone." 4th. The time will come when the most fierce will be tamed, and the most wanton will be manageable; when distress and anguish comes upon them, then their ears will be open to discipline; that is the month in which you may find them, Ps. cxli. 5, 6.

5. They were obstinate in their sin, and, as they could not be restrained, so they would not be reformed, ver. 25. Here is, 1st. Fair warning given them of the ruin that this wicked course of life would certainly bring them to at last, with a caution therefore not to persist in it, but to break off from it. He would certainly bring them into a miserable captivity when their feet should be unshod, and they should be forced to travel barefoot; and when they would be denied fair water by their oppressors, so that their throat should be dried up with thirst; this will be in the end hereof. They that affect strange gods, and strange ways of worship, will justly be made prisoners to a strange king in a strange land. Take up in time therefore; thy running after thy idols will run the shoes off thy feet, and thy panting after them will bring thy throat to thirst; and therefore withhold thy foot from these violent pursuits, and thy throat from these violent desires. One would think it should effectually check us in the career, to consider what it will bring us to at last. 2nd. Their rejecting this fair warning. They said to those that would have persuaded them to repent and reform, "There is no hope;" no, never expect to work upon us, or prevail with us to cast away our idols, for "we have loved strangers, and after them we will go;" we are resolved we will, and therefore trouble not yourselves or us any more with your admonitions; it is to no purpose. There is no hope that we should ever break this corrupt habit and disposition we have got, and therefore we had as good yield to it as go about to get the mastery of it. Note, Their case is very miserable who have brought themselves to such a pass that their corruptions triumph over their convictions; they know they should reform, but own they cannot, and therefore resolve they will not. But, as we must not despair of the mercy of God, but believe that sufficient for the pardon of our sins, though never so heinous, if we repent and sue for that mercy; so neither must we despair of the grace of God, but believe that able to subdue our corruption, though never so strong, if we pray for and improve that grace. A man must never say there is no hope as long as he is on this side hell.

6. They had shamed themselves by their sin, in putting confidence in that which would certainly deceive them in the day of their distress, and putting him away that would have helped them; ver. 26—28, "As the thief is ashamed when," notwithstanding all his arts and tricks to conceal his theft, "he is found," and brought to punishment, "so is the house of Israel ashamed," not with a penitent shame for the sin they had been guilty of, but with a penal shame for the disappointment they met with in that sin. They will be ashamed when they find,

1st. That they are forced to cry to the God whom they had put contempt upon. In their prosperity they had turned the back to God, and not the face; they had slighted him; took on them they had forgotten him, or did what they could to forget him; would not look towards him, but looked another way. They went from him as fast and as far as they could: but in the time of their trouble they will find no satisfaction but in applying themselves to him; then they will say, "Arise, and save us." Their fathers had many a time taken this shame to themselves, Jud. iii. 9; iv. 3; x. 10, yet they would not be persuaded to cleave to God, that they might have come to him in their trouble with the more confidence.

2nd. That they have no relief from the gods they have made their court to. They will be ashamed when they perceive that the gods they have made cannot serve them, and the God that made them will not serve them. To bring them to this shame, if so be they might hereby be brought to repentance, they are here sent to the gods whom they served, as Jud. x. 14. They cried to God, "Arise, and save us." God saith of the idols, "Let them arise and save thee," for thou hast no reason to expect that I should. Let them arise if they can from the places where they are fixed; let them try whether they can save thee. But thou wilt be ashamed when thou findest that they can do thee no good; for though thou hadst a god for every city, yet thy cities are burnt without inhabitant, ver. 15. Thus it is the folly of sinners to please themselves with that which will certainly be their grief, and pride themselves in that which will certainly be their shame.

29 Wherefore will ye plead with me?
Ye all have transgressed against me, saith the LORD.
30 In vain have I smitten your children;
They received no correction:
Your own sword hath devoured your prophets,
Like a destroying lion.
31 O generation, see ye the word of the LORD
Have I been a wilderness unto Israel?
A land of darkness?
Wherefore say my people,
We are lords;
We will come no more unto thee?
32 Can a maid forget her ornaments, or a bride her attire?
Yet my people have forgotten me days without number.
33 Why trimmest thou thy way to seek love?
Therefore hast thou also taught the wicked ones thy ways.
34 Also in thy skirts is found the blood
Of the souls of the poor innocents:
I have not found it by secret search, but upon all these 35 Yet thou sayest,
Because I am innocent,
Surely his anger shall turn from me.
Behold, I will plead with thee,
Because thou sayest, I have not sinned.
36 Why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way?
Thou also shalt be ashamed of Egypt,
As thou wast ashamed of Assyria
37 Yea, thou shalt go forth from him,
And thine hands upon thine head:
For the LORD hath rejected thy confidences,
And thou shalt not prosper in them.

The prophet here goes on in the same strain, aiming to bring a sinful people to repentance, that their destruction might be prevented.

First. He avers the truth of the charge. It was evident beyond contradiction, it was the greatest absurdity imaginable in them to think of denying it; ver. 29, "Wherefore will ye plead with me," and put me upon the proof of it? Or wherefore will ye go about to plead any thing in excuse of the crime, or to obtain a mitigation of the sentence? Your plea will certainly be overruled, and judgment given against you. You know you have all transgressed, one as well as another; why then do you quarrel with me for contending with you?

Secondly. He aggravates it, from the consideration both of their incorrigibleness and of their ingratitude.

1. They had not been wrought upon by the judgments of God which they had been under; ver. 30, "In vain have I smitten your children;" that is, the children, or people, of Judah. They had been under Divine rebukes of many kinds. God therein designed to bring them to repentance, but it was in vain; they did not answer God's end in afflicting them. Their consciences were not awakened, nor their hearts softened and humbled, nor were they driven to seek unto God; they received no instruction by the correction, were not made the better by it. And it is a great loss thus to lose an affliction. They did not receive, that is, they did not submit to, or comply with, the correction; but their hearts fretted against the Lord, and so they were smitten in vain. Even the children, the young people among them, (so it may be taken,) were smitten in vain; they were so soon prejudiced against repentance, that they were as untractable as the old ones, that had been long accustomed to do evil.

2. They had not been wrought upon by the word of God which he had sent them in the mouth of his servants the prophets; nay, they had killed the messengers for the sake of the message. "Your own sword hath devoured your prophets, like a destroying lion;" you have put them to death for their faithfulness with as much rage and fury, and with as much greediness and pleasure, as a lion devours his prey. Their prophets, who were their greatest blessings, were treated by them as if they had been the plagues of their generation; and this was their measure-filling sin, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 16. They killed their own prophets, 1 Thes. ii. 15.

3. They had not been wrought upon by the favours God had bestowed upon them; ver. 31, "O generation." He doth not call them, as he might, "O faithless and perverse generation, O generation of vipers;" but speaks them fair; O ye men of this generation, "see the word of the Lord;" do not only hear it, ordinary sense of the word is "lord" when it occurs in other connections. As examples of the idolatrous bearings of the word, we give the following: Baal-berith, Judges viii. 33; Baal-gad, Josh. xi. 17; Baal-zebub, 2 Kings i. 2; Baal-peor, Psa. cvi. 28; Baal-perazim, 1 Chron. xiv. 11; Baal-zephon, Exod. xiv. 2; Esh-baal, 1 Chron. viii. 33. To these many others could be added. The associations of allusions to licentiousness with reference to Baal-worship here and elsewhere are justified by many well-known facts. The valley meant here is supposed to be the Valley of Hinnom, where idolatrous rites were practised. For "dromedary" read "young she-camel." The pagan proclivities of Israel are compared with the conduct of she-camels and wild asses in the breeding season.

ii. 25. Israel is enjoined not to continue going barefoot, and not to cherish insatiable thirst. The latter may point to the eager pursuit of evil, but the former is not so evident. Dr. A. Clarke thinks, with much probability, that the being unshod alludes to the conduct but consider it diligently; apply your minds closely to it. As we are bid to hear the rod, Mic. vi. 9, for that has its voice, so we are bid to see the word, for that has its visions, its views. It intimates that what is here said is plain and undeniable. You may see it very evident; it is written as with a sunbeam, so that he that runs may read it; "Have I been a wilderness to Israel, a land of darkness?" Note, Those that have had any dealings with God never had reason to complain of him as a wilderness, or a land of darkness. He has blessed us with the fruits of the earth, and therefore we cannot say that he hath been a wilderness to us, a dry and barren land; that (as Mr. Gataker expresses it,) he hath held us to hard meat, as cattle fed upon the common. No, his sheep have been led into green pastures. He has also blessed us with the lights of heaven, and has not withheld them; so that we cannot say he hath been to us a land of darkness. He hath caused his sun to shine, as well as his rain to fall, upon the evil and unthankful. Or, the meaning is in general, that the service of God hath not been to any either an unpleasant or an unprofitable service. God sometimes hath led his people through a wilderness, and a land of darkness; but he himself was then to them all that which they needed. He so fed them with manna, and led them by a pillar of fire, that it was to them a fruitful field and a land of light. The world is to those who make it their home and portion, a wilderness, and a land of darkness, vanity, and vexation of spirit; but those that dwell in God have their lines fallen to them in pleasant places.

4. Instead of being wrought upon by these, they were grown intolerably insolent and imperious. They say, "We are lords, we will come no more unto thee." Now they were become a potent kingdom, or thought themselves such they set up for themselves, and shook off their dependence upon God. This is the language of presumptuous sinners; and it is not only very impious and profane, but very unreasonable and foolish. 1st. It is absurd for us, that are subjects, to say, "We are lords;" that is, rulers, and we will come no more to God to receive commands from him; for, as he is King of old, so he is King for ever, and we can never pretend to be from under his authority. 2nd. It is absurd for us, that are beggars, to say, "We are lords," that is, we are rich; and we will come no more to God, to receive favours from him, as if we could live without him, and need not be beholden to him. God justly takes it ill of those to whom he has been a bountiful benefactor, and yet they care not either for hearing from him, or speaking to him.

Thirdly. He lays the blame of all their wickedness upon their forgetting God; ver. 22, "They have forgotten me;" they have industriously banished the thoughts of God out of their minds, jostled those thoughts out with thoughts of their idols, and avoided all those things that would put them in mind of God. 1. Though they were his own people, in covenant with him, and professing relation to him, and had the tokens of his presence in the midst of them, and his favour to them; yet they forgot him. 2nd. They had long neglected him, days without number, time out of mind, as we say. They had not for a great while entertained any serious thoughts of him, so that they seem quite to have forgotten him, and resolved never to remember him again. How many days of our lives have passed without suitable remembrance of God? Who can number those empty days? 3. They had not had such a regard and affection to him as young ladies generally have to their fine clothes. "Can a maid forget her ornaments, or a bride her attire?" No, their hearts are upon them; they value them so much, and themselves by them, that they are ever and anon thinking and speaking of them. When they are to appear in public, they do not forget any of their ornaments, but put every one in its place, as they are described, Isa. iii. 18. And yet "my people have forgotten me." It is sad that any should be more in love with their fine clothes than with their God, and should rather leave their religion behind them, or part with that, than leave any of their ornaments behind them, or part with them. Is not God our ornament? Is he not a crown of glory, and a diadem of beauty to his people? Did we look upon him to be so, and upon our religion as an ornament of grace to our head, and chains about our neck, Pr. i. 9, we should be as mindful of them as ever any maid was of her ornaments, or a bride of her attire; should be as careful to preserve them, and as fond to appear in them.

Fourthly. He shews them what an ill influence their sins had upon others. The sins of God's professing people harden and encourage those about them in their evil ways, especially when they appear forward and ringleaders in sin; ver. 33, "Why trimmest thou thy way to seek love?" alluding to the practice of lewd women, that strive to recommend themselves by their ogling looks and garish dress, as Jezebel, that painted her face, and tired her head. Thus had they courted their neighbours into sinful confederacies with them, and communion in their idolatries; and had taught the wicked ones their ways, their ways of mixing God's institutions with their idolatrous customs and usages, which was a great profanation of that which was sacred, and made the ways of their idolatry worse than that of others. Those have a great deal to answer for, that, by their fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, make wicked ones more wicked than otherwise they would be.

Fifthly. He chargeth them with the guilt of murder, added to the guilt of their idolatry; ver. 34, "Also in thy skirts is found the blood of the souls;" that is, the life-blood of the poor innocents, which cried to heaven, and for which God was now making inquisition. Either the children that were offered in sacrifice to Moloch; or, it may be taken more generally, for all the innocent blood which Manasseh shed, and with which he had filled Jerusalem, 2 Kin. xxi. 16: the righteous blood, especially the blood of prophets and others that witnessed against their impieties. This blood was found, "not by secret search," not 'by digging,' so the word is, "but upon all these;" it was above ground. This intimates that the guilt of this kind they had contracted was certain and evident, not doubtful, or which would bear a dispute; and that it was avowed and barefaced, and which they had not so much sense either of shame or fear as to endeavour to conceal, which was a great aggravation of it.

Sixthly. He overrules their plea of not guilty. Though this matter be so plain, yet thou sayest, "Because I am innocent, surely his anger shall turn from me;" and again, "Thou sayest, I have not sinned," ver. 35; therefore "I will plead with thee," and will convince thee of thy mistake. Because they deny the charge, and stand upon their own justification, therefore God will join issue with them and plead with them, both by his word and by his rod. Those shall be made to know how much they deceive themselves, 1. That say they have not offended God, that they are innocent, though they have been guilty of the grossest enormities. 2. That expect God will be reconciled to them though they do not repent and reform. They own they had been under the tokens of God's anger, but they think it was causeless; and that they, by pleading innocency, had proved it to be so; and therefore conclude God will immediately let fall his action, and his anger shall be turned from them. This is very provoking; and God will plead with them, and convince them that his anger is just, for they have sinned, and he will never cease his controversy till they, instead of justifying themselves thus, humble, and judge, and condemn themselves.

Seventhly. He upbraids them with the shameful disappointments they met with in making creatures their confidence, while they made God their enemy, ver. 36, 37. It was a piece of spiritual idolatry they were often guilty of, that they trusted in an arm of flesh, and their hearts therein departed from the Lord; now here he shews them the folly of it. 1. They were restless and unsatisfied in the choice of their confidences. "Why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way?" Doubtless it is because thou meetest not with that in those thou didst confide in which thou promisedst thyself. Those that make God their hope, and walk in a continual dependence upon him, need not gad about to change their way; for their souls may return to him, and repose in him as their rest. But they that trust in creatures will be perpetually uneasy, like Noah's dove, that found no rest for the sole of her foot. Every thing they trust to fails them, and then they think to change for the better, but will be still disappointed. They first trusted to Assyria, and, when that proved a broken reed, they depended upon Egypt, and that proved no better. Creatures being vanity, they will be vexation of spirit to all those that put their confidence in them; they gad about, seeking rest and finding none. 3. They were quite disappointed in the confidences they made choice of; so the prophet tells them they should be. "Thou shalt be ashamed of Egypt," which thou now trustest in, "as" formerly "thou wast of Assyria," who distressed them, and helped them not, 2 Chr. xxviii. 20. The Jews were a peculiar people in their profession of religion, and for that reason none of the neighbour nations cared for them, or could heartily love them; and yet they were still courting them, and confiding in them, and were well enough served when they deceived them. See what will come of it; ver. 37, "Thou shalt go forth from him," thine ambassadors, or envoys, shall return from Egypt 'disappointed,'—re infecta; and therefore, "with their hands upon their heads," condoling the desperate condition of their people. Or, "Thou shalt go forth from hence," namely, into captivity in a strange land, "with thine hands upon thine head," holding it because it aches, (ubi dolor ibi digitus,—'where the pain is, the finger will be applied,') or as a people ashamed; for Tamar, in the height of her confusion, laid her hand on her head, 2 Sam. xiii. 19. And Egypt, that thou reliedst on, shall not be able to prevent it, or to rescue thee out of captivity. They that will not lay their hand on their heart in godly sorrow, which worketh life, shall be made to lay their hand on their head in the sorrow of the world, which worketh death. And no wonder that Egypt cannot help them, when God will not. If the Lord do not help thee, whence should I? The Egyptians are broken reeds, for "the Lord hath rejected thy confidences;" he will not make use of them for thy relief; will neither so far honour them nor so far give countenance to thy confidence in them as to appoint them to be the instruments of any good to thee, and therefore "thou shalt not prosper in them;" they shall not stand thee in any stead, nor give thee any satisfaction. As there is no counsel or wisdom that can prevail against the Lord, so there is none that can prevail without him. Some read it, 'The Lord hath rejected thee for thy confidences,' because thou hast dealt so unfaithfully with him as to trust in his creatures, nay, in his enemies, when thou shouldest have trusted in him only; he has abandoned thee to that destruction from which thou thoughtest thus to have sheltered thyself: and then thou canst not prosper, for none ever either hardened himself against God or estranged himself from God, and prospered.

CHAPTER III.

The foregoing chapter was wholly taken up with reproofs and threatenings against the people of God for their apostacies from him; but in this chapter gracious invitations and encouragements are given them to return and repent, notwithstanding the multitude and greatness of their provocations, which are here aggravated, to magnify the mercy of God, and to shew, that as sin abounded grace did much more abound. Here, I. It is farther shewed how bad they had been, and how well they had deserved to be quite abandoned, and yet how ready God was to receive them into his favour upon their repentance, ver. 1—5. II. The impenitency of Judah, and their persisting in sin, is aggravated from the judgments of God upon Israel, which they should have taken warning by, ver. 6—11. III. Great encouragements are given to these backsliders to return and repent; and promises made of great mercy which God had in store for them, and which he should prepare them for by bringing them home to himself, ver. 12—19. IV. The charge renewed against them for their apostacy from God, and the invitation repeated to return and repent, to which are here added the words that are put in their mouth which they should make use of in their return to God, ver. 20—25.

THEY say, If a man put away his wife,
And she go from him, and become another man's,
Shall he return unto her again?
Shall not that land be greatly polluted?
But thou hast played the harlot with many lovers;
Yet return again to me, saith the LORD.

2 Lift up thine eyes unto the high places,
And see where thou hast not been lien with
In the ways hast thou sat for them,
As the Arabian in the wilderness;
And thou hast polluted the land
With thy whoredoms and with thy wickedness.

3 Therefore the showers have been withholden,
And there hath been no latter rain;
And thou hadst a whore's forehead,
Thou refusedst to be ashamed.

4 Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me,
My father, thou art the guide of my youth?

5 Will he reserve his anger for ever?
Will he keep it to the end?
Behold, thou hast spoken and done evil things as thou couldest.

These verses some make to belong to the sermon in the foregoing chapter, and they open a door of hope to those who receive the conviction of the reproofs we had there; God wounds that he may heal. Now observe here,

First. How basely this people had forsaken God, and gone a whoring from him. The charge runs very high here. 1. They had multiplied their idols, and their idolatries. To have admitted one strange god among them had been bad enough, but they were insatiable in their lustings after false worships; "Thou hast played the harlot with many lovers," ver. 1. She was become a common of harlots, who uncover or expose their feet, and that the thirst points to longing after heathen libations. This explanation is simple, natural, and in agreement with the context. The expression "there is no hope" is peculiar, and very likely has the force either of "your efforts are hopeless" or "I am desperate."

ii. 27. The stocks and stones here spoken of are the idols before which homage was paid. The term "father" and the honour of paternity were very commonly ascribed to some of the old pagan gods, as Jupiter. In accordance with this idea, the heathen called themselves children and offspring of various divinities—e.g., Ben-Hadad is "son of Hadad," Hadad being a Syrian idol.

ii. 28. The prevalence of local divinities has been mentioned in the note upon verse 23, and the idea is here strongly suggested by the text; they had as many gods as cities—Baal-hamon, Baal-hazor, Baal-hermon, Baal-meon, Baal-shalishah, &c. The Greeks and many ancient peoples dedicated cities to particular deities, put them under prostitute to idols; not a foolish deity was set up in all the neighbourhood, but the Jews would have it presently. Where was a high place in the country, but they had had an idol in it? ver. 2. Note, In repentance it is good to make sorrowful reflections upon the particular acts of sin we have been guilty of, and the several places and companies where it has been committed, that we may give glory to God, and take shame to ourselves, by a particular confession of it. 2. They had sought opportunity for their idolatries, and had sent about to inquire for new gods. "In the highways hast thou sat for them," as Tamar, when she put on the disguise of a harlot, Gen. xxxviii. 14; and as the foolish woman, that sits to call passengers, who go right on their way, Pr. ix. 14, 15. "As the Arabian in the wilderness." The Arabian huckster, so some, that courts customers, or waits for the merchants, to get a good bargain, or forestall the market. Or, the Arabian thief, so others, that watches for his prey; so had they waited either to court new gods to come among them, the newer the better, and the more fond they were of them; or to court others to join with them in their idolatries. They were not only sinners, but Satans; not only traitors themselves, but tempters to others. 3. They were grown very impudent in sin. They not only polluted themselves, but their land, with their whoredoms, and with their wickedness, ver. 2; for it was universal and unpunished, and so became a national sin. And yet, ver. 3, "Thou hadst a whore's forehead," a brazen face of thy own; "Thou refusedest to be ashamed;" thou didst enough to shame thee for ever, and yet wouldest not take shame to thyself. Blushing is the colour of virtue, or at least a relic of it; but those that are past shame, we say, are past hope. Those that have an adulterous heart, if they indulge that, will come at length to have a whore's forehead, void of all shame and modesty. 4. They abounded in all manner of sin. They polluted the land not only with their whoredoms, that is, their idolatries, but with their wickedness, or malice, ver. 2. Sins against the second table; for how can we think those should be true to their neighbour that are false to their God? Nay, ver. 5, "Thou hast spoken and done evil things as thou couldest;" and wouldest have spoken and done worse, if thou hadst known how; thy will was to do it, but thou lackedst opportunity. Note, Those are wicked indeed that sin to the utmost of their power; that never refuse to comply with a temptation because they should not, but because they cannot.

Secondly. How gently God had corrected them for their sins. Instead of raining fire and brimstone upon them, because like Sodom they had avowed their sin, and had gone after strange gods, as Sodom after strange flesh, he only withheld the showers from them, and that only one part of the year. "There has been no latter rain;" which might serve as an intimation to them of their continual dependence upon God; when they had the former rain, that was no security to them for the latter, but they must still look up to God. But it had not this effect.

Thirdly. How justly God might have abandoned them utterly, and refused ever to receive them again, though they should return. This would have been but according to the known rule of divorces; ver. 1, "They say," that is, it is an adjudged case, nay, it is a case in which the law is very express, and it is what every body knows and speaks of, Deu. xxiv. 4, that if a woman be once put away for whoredom, and be joined to another man, her first husband shall never, upon any pretence whatsoever, take her again to be his wife; such playing fast and loose with the marriage-bond would be a horrid profanation of that ordinance, and would greatly pollute that land. Observe, What the law saith in this case. "They say." Every one will say, and subscribe to the equity of the law in it; for every man finds something in himself that forbids him to entertain one that is another man's. And, in like manner, they had reason to expect, that God should refuse ever to take them to be his people again who had not only been joined to one strange god, but had played the harlot with many lovers. If we had to do with a man like ourselves, after such provocations as we have been guilty of, he would have been implacable, and we might have despaired of his being reconciled to us.

Fourthly. How graciously he not only invites them, but directs them to return to him.

1. He encourageth them to hope that they shall find favour with him upon their repentance. Though thou hast been bad, yet "return again to me," ver. 1; which implies a promise that he will receive them: return, and thou shalt be welcome. God has not tied himself by the laws which he made to us, nor has he the peevish resentments that men have. He will be more kind to Israel, for the sake of his covenant with them, than ever any injured husband was to an adulterous wife; for in receiving penitents, as much as in any thing, he is God and not man.

2. He therefore kindly expects they will repent, and return to him, and directs them what to say to him; ver. 4, "Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me? Wilt not thou, who hast been in such relation to me, and on whom I have laid such obligations, "wilt not thou cry to me?" Though thou hast gone a whoring from me, yet when thou findest the folly of it sure thou wilt think of returning to me; now at least, now at last in this thy day. "Wilt thou not at this time," nay, wilt thou not from this time and forward "cry unto me?" Whatever thou hast said or done hitherto, wilt thou not from this time apply thyself to me? from this time of conviction and correction; now thou hast been made to see thy sins, ver. 2, and to smart for them, ver. 3, wilt thou not now forsake them, and return to me, saying, "I will go and return to my first husband, for then it was better with me than now?" Hos. ii. 7. Or, from this time that thou hast had so kind an invitation to return, and assurance that thou shalt be well received, will not this grace of God overcome thee? Now pardon is proclaimed wilt thou not come in and take the benefit of it? Sure thou wilt.

1st. He expects they will claim relation to God, as theirs. "Wilt thou not cry unto me, My Father, thou art the guide of my youth?" First. They will surely come towards him as a father, to beg his pardon for their undutiful carriage to him, ("Father, I have sinned,") and will hope to find in him the tender compassions of a father towards a returning prodigal. They will come to him as a father, to whom they will make their complaints, and in whom they will put their confidence for relief and succour. They will now own him as their father, and themselves fatherless without him; and therefore hoping to find mercy with him, as those penitents, Hos. xiv. 3. Secondly. They will come to him as the guide of their youth; that is, as their husband, for so that relation is described, Mal. ii. 14. Though thou hast gone after many lovers, surely thou wilt at length remember the love of thine espousals, and return to the husband of thy youth. Or, it may be taken more generally; as, "My Father, thou art the guide of my youth." Youth needs a guide. In our return to God we must thankfully remember that he was the guide of our youth, in the way of comfort; and we must faithfully covenant that he shall be our guide from henceforward in the way of duty; and that we will follow his guidance, and give up ourselves entirely to his conduct; that in all doubtful cases we will be determined by our religion.

2nd. He expects they will appeal to the mercy of God, and crave the benefit of that mercy, ver. 5, that they will reason thus with themselves, for their encouragement to return to him: "Will he reserve his anger for ever?" Sure he will not; for he hath proclaimed his name gracious and merciful. Repenting sinners may encourage themselves with this, that though God chide, he will not always chide; though he be angry, he will not keep his anger to the end; but, "though he cause grief, he will have compassion;" and may thus plead for reconciliation. Some understand this as describing their hypocrisy, and the impudence of that. Though thou hast a whore's forehead, ver. 3, and art still doing evil as thou canst, ver. 5, yet art thou not ever and anon crying to me, My Father? Even when they were most addicted to idols they pretended a regard to God and his service, and kept up the forms of godliness and devotion. It is a shameful thing for men thus to call God Father, and yet do the works of the devil, as the Jews, Jno. viii. 44; to call him the guide of their youth, and yet give up themselves to walk after the flesh; and to flatter themselves with expectations that his anger shall have an end, while they are continually treasuring up unto themselves wrath against the day of wrath.

6 The LORD said also unto me in the days of Josiah the king, Hast thou seen that which backsliding Israel hath done? she is gone up upon every high mountain and under every green tree, and there hath played the harlot. 7 And I said after she had done all these things, Turn thou unto me. But she returned not. And her treacherous sister Judah saw it. 8 And I saw, when for all the causes whereby backsliding Israel committed adultery I had put her away, and given her a bill of divorce; yet her treacherous sister Judah feared not, but went and played the harlot also. 9 And it came to pass through the lightness of her whoredom, that she defiled the land, and committed adultery with stones and with stocks. 10 And yet for all this her treacherous sister Judah hath not turned unto me with her whole heart, but feignedly, saith the LORD. 11 And the LORD said unto me, The backsliding Israel hath justified herself more than treacherous Judah.

The date of this sermon must be observed, in order to the right understanding of it. It was "in the days of Josiah," who set on foot a blessed work of reformation; in which he was hearty, but the people were not sincere in their compliance with it. To reprove them for that, and warn them of the consequences of their hypocrisy, is the scope of that which God here said to the prophet, and which he delivered to them. The case of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah is here compared; the ten tribes that revolted from the throne of David and the temple at Jerusalem, and the two tribes that adhered to both. The distinct history of those two kingdoms we have in the two books of the Kings; and here we have an abstract of both, as far as relates to this matter.

First. Here is a short account of Israel, the ten tribes. Perhaps the prophet had been just reading the history of that kingdom when God came to him, and said, "Hast thou seen what backsliding Israel has done?" ver. 9. For he could not see it otherwise than in history, they having been carried into captivity long before he was born. But what we read in the histories of Scripture should instruct us and affect us as if we ourselves had been eyewitnesses of it. She is called backsliding Israel, because that kingdom was first founded in an apostacy from the Divine institutions, both in church and state. Now he had seen concerning them,

1. That they were wretchedly addicted to idolatry. They had "played the harlot upon every high mountain, and under every green tree," ver. 6; that is, they had worshipped other gods in their high places and groves; and no marvel, when from the first they had worshipped God by the images of the golden calves at Dan and Bethel. The way of idolatry is downhill. They that are in love with images, and will have them, soon become in love with other gods, and will have them too. For how should they stick at the breach of the first commandment who make no conscience of the second?

2. That God, by his prophets, had invited and encouraged them to repent and reform; ver. 7, "After she had done all these things," (for which she might justly have been abandoned) "yet I said unto her, Turn thou unto me," and I will receive thee. Though they had forsaken both the house of David and the house of Aaron, who both had their authority jure divino,—'from God,' without dispute, yet God sent his prophets among them, to call them to return to him, to the worship of him only; not insisting so much as one would have expected upon their return to the house of David as that of Aaron. We read not that Elijah, that great reformer, ever mentioned that; but, return to the faithful service of the true God, according as they had it among them. It is serious piety that God stands upon more than even his own rituals.

3. That notwithstanding this they had persisted in their idolatries. "But she returned not," and God saw it. He took notice of it, and was much displeased with it, ver. 7, 8. Note, God keeps account, whether we do or no, how often he has called to us to turn to him, and we have refused.

4. That he had therefore cast them off, and given them up into the hands of their enemies; ver. 8, 'When I saw it' (so it may be read) 'that for all the actions wherein she had committed adultery, I must dismiss her, I gave her a bill of divorce.' God divorced them when he threw them out of his protection, and left them an easy prey to any that would lay hands on them; when he scattered all their synagogues and schools of the prophets, and excluded them from laying any farther claim to the covenant made with their fathers. Note, Those will justly be divorced from God that join themselves to such as are rivals with him. For proof of this, go and see what God did to Israel

Secondly. Let us now see what was the case of Judah, the kingdom of the two tribes. She is called, treacherous sister Judah; a sister, because descended from the same common stock, Abraham and Jacob. But as Israel had the character of a backslider, so Judah is called treacherous, because, though she professed to keep close to God, when Israel was backslidden, (she adhered to the kings and priests that were of God's own appointing, and did not withdraw their protection, and adopted names to indicate the fact. The practice has been imitated among professed Christians, who dedicate churches, cities, &c., to particular saints, one result of which is that some saints have a vast number of subordinate names, and appear in the most opposite characters. Thus the mother of Jesus appears as both black and white, pacific and warlike, according to the local aspect of the idolatry paid to her. The correspondences between the paganism condemned in Jeremiah and the saint-worship which has succeeded it are too numerous to be overlooked, and too serious not to fill us with shame. On the summit of one of the loftiest churches at Lyons is a gigantic gilt statue of Mary, with inscriptions at the base, as "O Mary, this city belongs to you; protect it," &c.; there are also declarations that St. Mary of Fourvières, as she is called, had on sundry occasions delivered the city from cholera, &c. The chief features of this note are very well illustrated by Acts xix.

ii. 32. The word for "attire" here is explained to mean "a from her allegiance, so that it was expected she should deal faithfully,) yet she proved treacherous, and false, and unfaithful to her professions and promises. Note, The treachery of those who pretend to cleave to God will be reckoned for, as well as the apostacy of those that openly revolt from him. Judah saw what Israel did, and what came of it, and should have taken warning. Israel's captivity was intended for Judah's admonition, but it had not the designed effect. Judah feared not, but thought herself safe, because she had Levites to be her priests, and sons of David to be her kings. Note, It is an argument of great stupidity and security, when we are not awakened to a holy fear by the judgments of God upon others. It is here charged on Judah,

1. That when they had a wicked king that debauched them, they heartily concurred with him in his debaucheries. Judah was forward enough to play the harlot, to worship any idol that was introduced among them, and to join in any idolatrous usage, so that "through the lightness" (or, as some read it, the vileness and baseness) "of her whoredom," or (as the margin reads it) by the fame and report of her whoredom, that is, her notorious whoredom, for which she was become infamous, "she defiled the land," and made it an abomination to God; for she "committed adultery with stones and stocks," that is, with the most scoundrel idols, those made of wood and stone. In the reigns of Manasseh and Amon, when they were disposed to idolatry, the people were so too; and all the country was corrupted with it, and none feared the ruin which Israel by this means had brought upon themselves.

2. That when they had a good king that reformed them, they did not heartily concur with him in the reformation. And that was the present case. God tried whether they would be good in a good reign, but the evil disposition was still the same. They "returned not to me with their whole heart, but feignedly," ver. 10. Josiah went farther in destroying idolatry than the best of his predecessors had done; and, for his own part, he "turned to the Lord with all his heart and with all his soul," so it is said of him, 2 Kin. xxiii. 25. The people were forced to an external compliance with him, and joined with him in keeping a very solemn passover, and in renewing their covenants with God, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 32; xxxv. 17. But they were not sincere in it, nor were their hearts right with God; for which reason God at that very time said, "I will remove Judah out of my sight, as I removed Israel," 2 Kin. xxiii. 27, because Judah was not removed from their sin by the sight of Israel's removal from their land. Hypocritical reformations, and ineffectual ones, bode ill to a people. We deceive ourselves if we think to deceive God by a feigned return to him. I know no religion without sincerity.

Thirdly. The case of these sister kingdoms is compared, and judgment given upon the comparison, that of the two Judah was the worse; ver. 11, "Israel hath justified herself more than Judah," that is, is not so bad as Judah is. This comparative justification will stand Israel in little stead. What will it avail us to say, we are not so bad as others, when yet we are not really good ourselves? But it will serve as an aggravation of the sin of Judah, which was in two respects worse than that of Israel: 1. That more was expected from Judah than from Israel, so that Judah dealt treacherously; they vilified a more sacred profession, and falsified a more solemn promise than Israel did. 2. That Judah might have taken warning by the ruin of Israel for their idolatry, and would not. God's judgments upon others, if they be not the means of our reformation, will help to aggravate our destruction. The prophet Ezekiel, ch. xxiii. 11, makes the same comparison between Jerusalem and Samaria that this prophet here makes between Judah and Israel; nay, and between Jerusalem and Sodom, and Jerusalem is made the worst of the three, Eze. xvi. 48.

12 Go and proclaim these words toward the north, and say,
Return, thou backsliding Israel, saith the LORD;
And I will not cause mine anger to fall upon you:
For I am merciful, saith the LORD,
And I will not keep anger for ever.
13 Only acknowledge thine iniquity,
That thou hast transgressed against the LORD thy God,
And hast scattered thy ways to the strangers
Under every green tree,
And ye have not obeyed my voice, saith the LORD.
14 Turn, O backsliding children, saith the LORD;
For I am married unto you:
And I will take you one of a city, and two of a family,
And I will bring you to Zion:
15 And I will give you pastors according to mine heart,
Which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding.
16 And it shall come to pass, when ye be multiplied and increased in the land,
In those days, saith the LORD, [LORD:
They shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Neither shall it come to mind:
Neither shall they remember it; neither shall they visit it;
Neither shall that be done any more. [LORD;
17 At that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the
And all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the LORD, to Jerusalem:
Neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil heart.
18 In those days the house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel,
And they shall come together out of the land of the north
To the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers.
19 But I said, How shall I put thee among the children,
And give thee a pleasant land,
A goodly heritage of the hosts of nations?
And I said, Thou shalt call me, My father;
And shalt not turn away from me.

Here is a great deal of Gospel in these verses, both that which was always Gospel, God's readiness to pardon sin, and to receive and entertain returning, repenting sinners; and those blessings which were in a special manner reserved for gospel times, the forming and founding of the gospel church, by the bringing of the children of God into it that were scattered abroad; the superseding of the ceremonial law, and the uniting of Jews and Gentiles, typified by the uniting of Israel and Judah in their return out of captivity. The prophet is directed to "proclaim these words towards the north," for they are a call to backsliding Israel, the ten tribes that were carried captive into Assyria, which lay north from Jerusalem. That way he must look, to shew that God had not forgotten them, though their brethren had; and to upbraid the men of Judah with their obstinacy, and refusing to answer the calls given them. As good call to them who lay many hundred miles off in the land of the north; they will as soon hear as these unbelieving and disobedient people. Backsliding Israel will sooner accept of mercy, and have the benefit of it, than treacherous Judah. And perhaps the proclaiming of these words towards the north looks as far forward as the preaching of repentance and remission of sins unto all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, Lu. xxiv. 47. A call to Israel in the land of the north is a call to others in that land, even as many as belong to the election of grace. When it was suspected that Christ would go to the dispersed Jews among the Gentiles, it was concluded he would teach the Gentiles, Jno. vii. 35; so here,

First. Here is an invitation given to backsliding Israel, and in them to the backsliding Gentiles, to return unto God, the God from whom they had revolted; ver. 12, "Return, thou backsliding Israel." And again, ver. 14, "Turn, O backsliding children," repent of your backslidings, return to your allegiance; come back to that good way which you have missed, and out of which you have turned aside. Pursuant to this invitation, 1. They are encouraged to return; "Repent, and be converted, and your sins shall be blotted out," Acts iii. 19. You have incurred God's displeasure, but return to me, and "I will not cause mine anger to fall upon you." God's anger is ready to fall upon sinners, as a lion falls on his prey, and there is none to deliver; as a mountain of lead falling on them, to sink them past recovery into the lowest hell. But if they repent, it shall be turned away; Isa. xii. 1, "I will not keep mine anger for ever," but will be reconciled, "for I am merciful." We that are sinful were for ever undone if God were not merciful; but the goodness of his nature encourageth us to hope that, if we by repentance undo what we have done against him, he will by a pardon unsay what he has said against us. 2. They are directed how to return; ver. 13, "Only acknowledge thine iniquity;" own thyself in a fault, and thereby take shame to thyself, and give glory to God. "I will not keep my anger for ever;" that is a previous promise. You shall be delivered from that anger of God which is everlasting, from the wrath to come. But upon what terms? Very easy and reasonable ones; "Only acknowledge thy sins." "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive them." This will aggravate the condemnation of sinners, that the terms of pardon and peace were brought so low, and yet they would not come up to them. "If the prophet had bid thee do some great thing wouldest thou not have done it? How much more when he saith," "Only acknowledge thine iniquity," 2 Kin. v. 13. In confessing sin, 1st. We must own the corruption of our nature; "acknowledge thine iniquity," the perverseness and irregularity of thy nature. 2nd. We must own our actual sins; "that thou hast transgressed against the Lord thy God," hast affronted him, and offended him. 3rd. We must own the multitude of our transgressions, that "thou hast scattered thy ways to the strangers;" run hither and thither in pursuit of thine idols, "under every green tree." Wherever thou hast rambled, thou hast left behind thee the marks of thy folly. 4th. We must aggravate our sin from the disobedience that there is in it to the Divine law. The sinfulness of sin is the worst thing in it. "Ye have not obeyed my voice;" acknowledge that, and let that humble you more than any thing else.

Secondly. Here are precious promises made to these backsliding children, if they do return, which were in part fulfilled in the return of the Jews out of their captivity; many that belonged to the ten tribes having perhaps joined themselves to those of the two tribes, in the prospect of their deliverance and returning with them. But it is to have its full accomplishment in the gospel church, and the gathering together of the children of God, that were scattered abroad, to that; "Return," for though you are backsliders, yet you are children; nay, though a treacherous wife, yet a wife; "for I am married to you," ver. 14, and will not disown the relation. Thus God remembers his covenant with their fathers, that marriage covenant; and, in consideration of that, he remembers their land, Lev. xxvi. 42.

1. He promises to gather them together from all places whither they are dispersed and scattered abroad, Jno. xi. 52. "I will take you one of a city, and two of a family," or clan, "and I will bring you to Zion." All those that by repentance return to their duty shall return to their former comfort. Observe, 1st. God will graciously receive those that return to him; nay, it is he that by his distinguishing grace takes them out from among the rest that persist in their backslidings; and if he had left them they had been undone. 2nd. Of the many that have backslidden from God there are but few, very few in comparison, that return to him, like the gleanings of the vintage, one of a city, and two of a country. Christ's flock is a little flock; and few there be that find the strait gate. 3rd. Of those few, though dispersed, yet not one shall be lost. Though there be but one in a city, God will find out that one; he shall not be overlooked in a crowd, but shall be brought safe to Zion, safe to heaven. The scattered Jews shall be brought to Jerusalem, and those of the ten tribes shall be as welcome there as those of the two. God's chosen, scattered all the world over, shall be brought to the gospel church, that mount Zion, that heavenly Jerusalem, that holy hill on which Christ reigns.

2. He promiseth to set those over them that shall be every way blessings to them; ver. 15, "I will give you pastors after my heart;" alluding to the character given of David when God pitched upon him to be king; 1 Sam. xiii. 14, "The Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart." Observe, 1st. When a church is gathered, it must be governed. "I will bring them to Zion;" not to live as they list, but to be under discipline; not as wild beasts, that range at pleasure, but as sheep that are under the direction of a shepherd. "I will give them pastors," that is, both magistrates and ministers; both are God's ordinance, for the support of his kingdom. 2nd. It is well with a people when their pastors are after God's own heart; such as they should be, such as we would have them be; that shall make his will their rule in all their administrations, and such as endeavour in some measure to conform to his example; that rule for him, and, as they are capable, rule like him. 3rd. Those are pastors girdle," which is said to have been a special part of the bridal array.

ii. 37. "Yea, thou shalt go forth from him" is in the Hebrew "Yea, from this thou shalt go forth," and the allusion is to Egypt just before mentioned; some, therefore, translate "Yea, thou shalt depart thence," or to the same effect—the alliance with Egypt would end in sorrow. The hands were clasped upon the head, and still are by Orientals in time of trouble, as is shown abundantly by Roberts.

iii. 1. It is correctly observed that for "they say" here, the Hebrew is simply "saying." Hence it has been inferred that something has been left out, or that the chapter is in the wrong place, like some others in this book. As the text is the same in the old versions and copies, with one exception, where "saying" is omitted, it is probable that at a very early date such a heading as occurs at the commencement of chapter ii. was dropped—"Moreover, the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, If a man," &c.

after God's own heart, that make it their business to feed the flock, not to feed themselves, and fleece the flocks, but to do all they can for the good of those that are under their charge; that feed them with wisdom and understanding: that is, wisely and understandingly, as David fed them, in the integrity of his heart, and by the skilfulness of his hands, Ps. lxxviii. 72. Those that are not only pastors but teachers must feed them with the word of God, which is wisdom and understanding, which is able to make us wise unto salvation.

3. He promiseth that there should be no more occasion for the ark of the covenant, which had been so much the glory of the tabernacle first, and afterwards of the temple, and was the token of God's presence with them; that shall be set aside, and there shall be no more inquiry after, nor inquiring of it; ver. 16, "When ye be multiplied and increased in the land," that is, when the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up, which, by the accession of the Gentiles, will bring into the church a vast increase, (and the days of the Messiah the Jewish masters themselves acknowledge to be here intended,) then "they shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Lord." They shall have it no more among them to value, or value themselves by, because they shall have a pure spiritual way of worship set up, in which there shall be no occasion for any of those external ordinances. With the ark of the covenant, the whole ceremonial law shall be set aside, and all the institutions of it; for Christ, the truth of all those types, exhibited to us in the word and sacraments of the New Testament, will be to us instead of all. It is very likely, whatever the Jews suggest to the contrary, that the ark of the covenant was in the second temple; being restored by Cyrus, with other "the vessels of the house of the Lord," Ezr. i. 7; but in the gospel temple Christ is the ark; he is the propitiatory, or mercy-seat. And it is the spiritual presence of God in his ordinances that we are now to expect. Many expressions are here used concerning the setting aside of the ark,—that it shall not come to mind, that they shall not remember it, they shall not visit it, that none of these things shall be any more done; for the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth, Jno. iv. 24. But this variety of expression is used to shew, that the ceremonies of the law of Moses should be totally and finally abolished, never to be used any more; but that it would be with difficulty that those who had been so long wedded to them should be weaned from them; and that they would not quite let them go till their holy city and holy house should both be levelled with the ground.

4. He promiseth that the gospel church, here called Jerusalem, shall become eminent and conspicuous, ver. 17. Two things shall make it famous: 1st. God's special residence and dominion in it. It shall be called "the throne of the Lord," the throne of his glory, for that shines forth in the church; the throne of his government, for that also is erected there; there he rules his willing people by his word and Spirit, and brings every thought into obedience to himself. As the Gospel got ground, this throne of the Lord was set up there where Satan's seat had been. It is especially the throne of his grace; for they that by faith come to this Jerusalem come "to God the judge of all, and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant," Heb. xii. 22, 23. 2nd. The accession of the Gentiles to it. All the nations shall be discipled, and so gathered to the church, and shall become subjects to that throne of the Lord which is there set up, and devoted to the honour of that name of the Lord which is there both manifested and called upon.

5. He promiseth that there shall be a wonderful reformation wrought in those that are gathered to the church; "They shall not walk any more after the imagination of their evil hearts." They shall not live as they list, but live by rules; not do according to their own corrupt appetites, but according to the will of God. See what leads in sin, "the imagination of our own evil hearts;" and what sin is,—it is walking after that imagination, being governed by fancy and humour; and what converting grace doth,—it takes us off from walking after our own inventions, and brings us to be governed by religion and right reason.

6. That Judah and Israel shall be happily united in one body, ver. 18. They were so in their return out of captivity, and their settlement again in Canaan; "The house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel," as being perfectly agreed, and become one stick in the hand of the Lord, as Ezekiel also foretold, ch. xxxvii. 16. Both Assyria and Chaldea fell into the hands of Cyrus, and his proclamation extended to all the Jews in all his dominions; and therefore we have reason to think that many of the house of Israel came with those of Judah out of the land of the north; though at first there returned but forty-two thousand, whom we have an account of Ezr. ii., yet Josephus saith, Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 4, that some few years after, under Darius, Zerubbabel went and fetched up above four millions of souls, "to the land that was given for an inheritance to their fathers." And we never read of such animosities and enmities between Israel and Judah as had been formerly. And this happy coalescence between Israel and Judah in Canaan was a type of the uniting of Jews and Gentiles in the gospel church, when, all enmities being slain, they should become one sheepfold, under one shepherd.

Thirdly. Here is some difficulty started, that lies in the way of all this mercy, but an expedient is found to get over it.

.. God asks, How shall I do this for thee? not as if God shewed favour with reluctancy, as he punisheth with a "How shall I give thee up?" Hos. xi. 8, 9. No, though he is slow to anger, he is swift to shew mercy. But it intimates, that we are utterly unworthy of his favours, that we have no reason to expect them, that there is nothing in us to deserve them, and we can lay no claim to them. And that he contrives how to do it in such a way as may save the honour of his justice and holiness in the government of the world. Means must be devised "that his banished be not for ever expelled from him," 2 Sam. xiv. 14. How shall I do it! 1st. Even backsliders, if they return and repent, shall be put among the children. And who could ever have expected that? "Behold, what manner of love is this!" 1 Jno. iii. 1. How should we that are so mean and weak, so worthless and unworthy, and so provoking, ever be put among the children? 2nd. Those whom God puts among the children, to them he will give the pleasant land, the land of Canaan, that glory of all lands, that goodly heritage of the hosts of nations, which nations and their hosts wish for, and prefer before their own country; or which the hosts of the nations have now got possession of. It was a type of heaven, where there are pleasures for evermore. Now who could expect a place in that pleasant land, that has so often despised it, Ps. cvi. 24, and is so unworthy of it, and unfit for it? Is this the manner of men?

2. He doth himself return answer to this question; "But I said, Thou shalt call me, My Father." God doth himself answer all the objections that are taken from our unworthiness, or they would never be got over. 1st. That he may put returning penitents among the children, he will give them the spirit of adoption, teaching them to cry, Abba, Father, Gal. iv. 6. "Thou shalt call me my Father," shalt return to me, and resign thyself to me, as a father, and that shall recommend thee to my favour. 2nd. That he may give them the pleasant land, he will put his fear in their hearts, that they may never turn from him, but may persevere to the end.

20 Surely as a wife treacherously departeth from her husband,
So have ye dealt treacherously with me,
O house of Israel, saith the LORD.
21 A voice was heard upon the high places,
Weeping and supplications of the children of Israel:
For they have perverted their way,
And they have forgotten the LORD their God
22 Return, ye backsliding children,
And I will heal your backslidings.
Behold, we come unto thee;
For thou art the LORD our God.
23 Truly in vain is salvation hoped for from the hills,
And from the multitude of mountains:
Truly in the LORD our God is the salvation of Israel.
24 For shame hath devoured the labour of our fathers from our youth;
Their flocks and their herds, their sons and their daughters.
25 We lie down in our shame,
And our confusion covereth us:
For we have sinned against the LORD our God,
We and our fathers, from our youth even unto this day,
And have not obeyed the voice of the LORD our God

Here is, First. The charge God exhibits against Israel for their treacherous departures from him, ver. 20. As an adulterous wife elopes from her husband, so have they gone a whoring from God. They were joined to God by a marriage covenant; but they broke that covenant; they dealt treacherously with God, who had always dealt kindly and faithfully with them. Treacherous dealing with men like ourselves is bad enough; but to deal treacherously with God is to deal treasonably.

Secondly. Their conviction and confession of the truth of this charge, ver. 21. When God reproved them for their apostacy, there were some among them, even such as God would take and bring to Zion whose "voice was heard upon the high places, weeping and" praying, humbling themselves before the God of their fathers, lamenting their calamities, and their sins, the procuring cause of them; for this is that which they lament; for this they bemoan themselves, that "they have perverted their way, and forgotten the Lord their God." Note, 1. Sin is the perverting of our way, it is turning aside to crooked ways, and perverting that which is right. 2. Forgetting the Lord our God is at the bottom of all sin. If men would remember God, his eye upon them, and their obligation to him, they would not transgress as they do. 3. By sin we embarrass ourselves, and bring ourselves into trouble, for that also is the perverting of our way, Lam. iii. 9. 4. Prayers and tears well become those whose consciences tell them that they have perverted their way, and forgotten their God. When the foolishness of man perverteth his way, his heart is apt to fret against the Lord, Pr. xix. 3, whereas it should be melted and poured out before him.

Thirdly. The invitation God gives them to return to him; ver. 22, "Return, ye backsliding children." He calls them children in tenderness and compassion to them; foolish and froward as children, yet his sons; whom, though he corrects, he will not disinherit; for though they are refractory children, (so some render it,) yet they are children. God bears with such children, and so must parents. When they are convinced of sin, ver. 21, and humbled for that, then they are prepared, and then they are invited to return; as Christ invites those to him that are weary and heavy laden. The promise to those that return is, "I will heal your backslidings;" I will comfort you under the grief you are in for your backslidings; deliver you out of the troubles you have brought yourselves into by your backslidings, and cure you of your refractoriness and bent to backslide. God will heal our backslidings by his pardoning mercy, his quieting peace, and his renewing grace.

Fourthly. The ready consent they give to this invitation, and their cheerful compliance with it: "Behold we come unto thee." This is an echo to God's call; as a voice returned from broken walls, so this from broken hearts. God saith, "Return;" they answer, "Behold, we come." It is an immediate speedy answer, without delay; not, We will come hereafter, but, We do come now; we need not take time to consider of it. Not, We come towards thee, but, We come to thee; we will make a thorough turn of it. Observe how unanimous they are We come; one and all.

1. They come devoting themselves to God as theirs; "Thou art the Lord our God," we take thee to be ours, we give up ourselves to thee to be thine; whither shall we go but to thee? for it is our sin and folly that we have gone from thee. It is very comfortable in our returns to God, after our backslidings, to look up to him as ours in covenant.

2. They come, disclaiming all expectations of relief and succour but from God only; "In vain is salvation hoped for from the hills and from the multitude of the mountains;" we now see our folly in relying upon creature confidences, and will never so deceive ourselves any more. They worshipped their idols upon hills and mountains, ver. 6, and they had a multitude of idols upon their mountains, which they had sought unto, and put a confidence in, but now they will have no more to do with them. In vain do we look for any thing that is good from them; while from God we may look for every thing that is good; even salvation itself. Therefore,

3. They come depending upon God only as their God: "In the Lord our God is the salvation of Israel." He is the Lord, and he only can save; he can save when all other succours and saviours fail. And he is our God, and will in his own way and time work salvation for us. It is very applicable to the great salvation from sin which Jesus Christ wrought out for us; that is the salvation of the Lord, his great salvation.

4. They come justifying God in their troubles, and judging themselves for their sins, ver. 24, 25.

1st. They impute all the calamities they had been under to their idols. They had not only done them no good, but done them abundance of mischief, all the mischief that had been done them. "Shame" (that is, the idol, that shameful thing,) "has devoured the labour of our fathers." Note, First. True penitents have learned to call sin shame, even the beloved sin that has been as an idol to them, which they have been most pleased with, and proud of, even that they shall call a scandalous thing, shall put contempt upon, and be ashamed of. Secondly. True penitents have learned to call sin, death and ruin, and to charge upon it all the mischiefs they suffer. It has devoured all those good things iii. 2. Israel watched for chances to sin as an Arab watched for opportunities for plunder, and does so at the present day. It might not be then, any more than now, that all Arab tribes were professional thieves and robbers, but they were famous as such. This allusion is a good illustration of the unchanged habits of Orientals, even in some of their worst features.

iii. 6. This commences a new division, and indicates that the prophetic message was given in Josiah's time. The year is not mentioned, but it is thought by Blayney to have been after Josiah's eighteenth year, though some think it must have been earlier.

iii. 9. "Stones" and "stocks" here (literally, "stones" and "wood") show that the adultery was figurative—in other words, idolatry.

iii. 13. "Under every green tree" is another phrase describing heathenish practices, which were very commonly carried on under trees.

iii. 14. "For I am married unto you" is by many explained, "I have rejected you," because such would be the sense in Arabic.

which our fathers laboured for, and left to us; we have found from our youth that our idolatry hath been the destruction of our prosperity. Children often throw away upon their lusts that which their fathers took a great deal of pains for; and it is well if at length they are brought (as these here) to see the folly of it, and to call those vices their shame which have wasted their estates, and devoured the labour of their fathers. They instance in the labour of their fathers, which their idols had "devoured, their flocks and their herds, their sons and their daughters." 1st. Their idolatries had provoked God to bring these desolating judgments upon them, which had ruined their country and families, and made their estates a prey, and their children captives to the conquering enemy. They had procured these things to themselves. Or rather, 2nd. These had been sacrificed to their idols, had been separated unto that shame, Hos. ix. 10; and they had devoured them without mercy, did "eat the fat of their sacrifices," Deu. xxxii. 38, even their human sacrifices.

2nd. They take to themselves the shame of their sin and folly; ver. 25, "We lie down in our shame," being unable to bear up under it; "our confusion covereth us," that is, both our penal and our penitential shame. Sin has laid us under such rebukes of God's providence, and such reproaches of our own consciences, as surround us and fill us with shame. "For we have sinned," and shame came in with sin, and still attends upon it. We are sinners by descent; guilt and corruption are entailed upon us: "We and our fathers have sinned;" we were sinners betimes; we began early in a course of sin; we have sinned "from our youth;" we have continued in it, have sinned "even unto this day," though often called to repent and forsake our sins. And that which is the malignity of sin, the worst thing in it, is the affront we have put upon God by it; "We have not obeyed the voice of the Lord our God," forbidding us to sin, and commanding us, when we have sinned, to repent. Now all this seems to be the language of the penitents of the house of Israel, ver. 20, of the ten tribes: either of those that were in captivity or those of them that remained in their own land. And the prophet takes notice of their repentance, to provoke the men of Judah to a holy emulation. David used it as an argument with the elders of Judah, that it would be a shame for them, that were his bone and his flesh, to be the last in bringing the king back, when the men of Israel appeared forward in it, 2 Sam. xix. 11, 12. So the prophet excites Judah to repent, because Israel did. And well it were if the zeal of others, less likely, would provoke us to strive to get before them, and go beyond them in that which is good.

CHAPTER IV.

It should seem that the first two verses of this chapter might better have been joined to the close of the foregoing chapter, for they are directed to Israel, the ten tribes, by way of reply to their compliance with God's call, directing and encouraging them to hold their resolution, ver. 1, 2. The rest of the chapter concerns Judah and Jerusalem. I. They are called to repent and reform, ver. 3, 4. II. They are warned of the advance of Nebuchadnezzar and his forces against them, and are told it is for their sins, from which they are again exhorted to wash themselves, ver. 5—18. III. To affect them the more with the greatness of the desolation that was coming, the prophet doth himself bitterly lament it, and sympathize with his people in the calamities it brought upon them, and the plunge it brought them to, representing it as a reduction of the world to its first chaos, ver. 19—31.

IF thou wilt return, O Israel,
Saith the LORD, return unto me:
And if thou wilt put away thine abominations out of my sight,
Then shalt thou not remove.
2 And thou shalt swear, The LORD liveth,
In truth, in judgment, and in righteousness;
And the nations shall bless themselves in him,
And in him shall they glory.

When God called to backsliding Israel to return, ch. iii. 22, they presently answered, Lord, we return; now God here takes notice of their answer, and by way of reply to it,

First. He directs them how to pursue their good resolutions. Dost thou say thou wilt return? 1. Then thou must return unto me; make a thorough work of it. Do not only turn from thine idolatries, but return to the instituted worship of the God of Israel. Or, Thou must return speedily, and not delay; as Isa. xxi. 12, "If ye will enquire, enquire ye;" so, if you will return unto me, return ye; do not talk of it, but do it. 2. Thou must utterly abandon all sin, and not retain any of the relics of idolatry; "Put away thine abominations out of my sight," that is, out of all places, for every place is under the eye of God; especially out of the temple, the house which he had in a particular manner his eye upon, to see that it was kept clean. It intimates that their idolatries were not only obvious, but offensive to the eye of God; they were abominations which he could not endure the sight of: therefore, Put them away out of my sight; that is, put them away for this reason, because they are a provocation to the pure eyes of God's glory. Sin must be put away out of the heart, else it is not put away out of God's sight, for the heart, and all that is in it, lies open before his eye. 3. They must not return to sin again, so some understand that, "Thou shalt not remove," reading it, Thou shalt not, or must not wander. "If thou wilt put away thine abominations, and wilt not wander" after them again, as thou hast done, all shall be well. 4. They must give unto God the glory due unto his name; ver. 2, "Thou shalt swear, The Lord liveth." His being shall be with thee the most sacred truth, than which nothing can be more sure; and his judgment the supreme court to which thou shalt appeal, and than which nothing can be more awful. Swearing is an act of religious worship, in which we are to give honour to God three ways: 1st. We must swear by the true God only, and not by creatures, or any false gods; by the God that liveth, not by the gods that are deaf, and dumb, and dead; by him only, and not by the Lord and by Malcham, as Zeph. i. 5. 2nd. We must swear that only which is true, "in truth and in righteousness;" not daring to assert that which is false, or which we do not know to be true, or to assert that as certain which is doubtful, or to promise that which we mean not to perform, or to violate the promise we have made. To say that which is untrue, or to do that which is unrighteous, is bad; but to back either with an oath is much worse. 3rd. We must do it solemnly, swear in judgment, that is, when thou art judicially called to it, and not in common conversation. Rash swearing is as great a profanation of God's name as solemn swearing is an honour to it: see Deu. x. 20; Mat. v. 34, 37.

Secondly. He encourageth them to keep in this good mind, and adhere to their resolutions. If the scattered Israelites will thus return to God, 1. They shall be blessed themselves; for to that sense the first words may be read: 'If thou wilt return to me, then thou shalt return,' that is, thou shalt be brought back out of thy captivity into thy own land again, as was of old promised, Deu. iv. 29; xxx. 2. Or, then thou shalt rest in me, shalt return to me as thy rest, even while thou art in the land of thy captivity. 2. They shall be blessings to others; for their returning to God again will be a means of others turning to him that never knew him. If thou wilt own the living Lord thou wilt thereby influence the nations among whom thou art, to bless themselves in him, to place their happiness in his favour, and to think themselves happy in being brought to the fear of him: see Isa. lxv. 16, "They shall bless themselves in the God of truth," and not in false gods; shall do themselves the honour, and give themselves the satisfaction, to join themselves to him, and then "in him shall they glory;" they shall make him their glory; and shall please, nay, shall pride themselves in the blessed change they have made. Those that part with their sins to return to God, however they scrupled the bargain at first, when they go away, then they boast.

3 For thus saith the LORD
To the men of Judah and Jerusalem,
Break up your fallow ground,
And sow not among thorns.
4 Circumcise yourselves to the LORD,
And take away the foreskins of your heart,
Ye men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem:
Lest my fury come forth like fire,
And burn that none can quench it,
Because of the evil of your doings.

The prophet here turns his speech in God's name to the men of the place where he lived. We have heard what words he proclaimed towards the north, ch. iii. 12, for the comfort of those that were now in captivity, and were humbled under the hand of God. Let us now see what he saith "to the men of Judah and Jerusalem," who were now in prosperity, for their conviction and awakening. In these two verses he exhorts them to repentance and reformation, as the only way left them to prevent the desolating judgments that were ready to break in upon them. Observe,

First. The duties required of them, which they are concerned to do.

1. They must do by their hearts as they do by their ground, that they expect any good of, they must plough it up; ver. 3, "Break up your fallow-ground." 'Plough to yourselves a ploughing,' or 'plough up your plough land,' that you sow not among thorns; that is, that you may not labour in vain for your own safety and welfare, as those do that sow good seed among thorns, and as you have been doing a great while. Put yourselves into a frame fit to receive mercy from God, and put away all that which keeps it from you, and then you may expect to receive mercy, and to prosper in your endeavours to help yourselves. Note, 1st. An unconvinced, unhumbled heart, is like fallow ground, ground untilled, unoccupied. It is ground capable of improvement; it is our ground, let out to us, and we must be accountable for it; but it is fallow, it is unfenced, and lies common; it is unfruitful, and of no advantage to the owner and (which is principally intended) it is overgrown with thorns and weeds, which are the natural product of the corrupt heart, if it be not renewed with grace. Rain and sunshine are lost upon it, Heb. vi. 7, 8. 2nd. We are concerned to get this fallow ground ploughed up; we must search into our hearts, let the word of God divide (as the plough doth) between the joints and the marrow, Heb. iv. 12. We must rend our hearts, Joel ii. 13. We must pluck up those corruptions by the root that, as thorns, choke both our endeavours and our expectations, Hos. x. 11.

2. They must do that to their souls which was done to their bodies, when they were taken into covenant with God; ver. 4, "Circumcise yourselves to the Lord, and take away the foreskins of your heart." Mortify the flesh and the lusts of it. Pare off that superfluity of naughtiness, which hinders your receiving with meekness the engrafted word, Jas. i. 21. Boast not of, and rest not in, the circumcision of the body; for that is but a sign, and will not serve without the thing signified. It was a dedicating sign. Do that in sincerity which was done in profession by your circumcision; devote and consecrate yourselves unto the Lord, to be to him a peculiar people. Circumcision was an obligation to keep the law; lay yourselves afresh under that obligation. It was a seal of the righteousness of faith; lay hold then of that righteousness, and so circumcise yourselves to the Lord.

Secondly. The danger they are threatened with, which they are concerned to avoid. Repent and reform, "lest my fury come forth like fire," which it is now ready to do, as that fire which came forth from the Lord, and consumed the sacrifices, and which was always kept burning upon the altar, and none might quench it; such is God's wrath against impenitent sinners, "because of the evil of their doings." Note, 1. That which is to be dreaded by us more than any thing else is the wrath of God; for that is the spring and bitterness of all present miseries, and will be the quintessence and perfection of everlasting misery. 2. It is the evil of our doings that kindles the fire of God's wrath against us. 3. The consideration of the imminent danger we are in, of falling and perishing under this wrath, should awaken us with all possible care to sanctify ourselves to God's glory, and to see to it that we be sanctified by his grace.

5 Declare ye in Judah,
And publish in Jerusalem; and say,
Blow ye the trumpet in the land:
Cry, gather together, and say,
Assemble yourselves, and let us go into the defenced cities.
6 Set up the standard toward Zion:
Retire, stay not:
For I will bring evil from the north,
And a great destruction.
7 The lion is come up from his thicket,
And the destroyer of the Gentiles is on his way;
He is gone forth from his place to make thy land desolate;
And thy cities shall be laid waste, without an inhabitant.
8 For this gird you with sackcloth, lament and howl:

iii. 15. Dr. Henderson says, "By shepherds or pastors in the Old Testament are not meant religious teachers, but civil rulers, as kings, princes, &c."

iii. 16. When Israel was restored, it would no longer possess the sacred ark, and would experience no disadvantage in consequence.

iii. 18. "The land of the north" is the region into which the tribes of Israel were taken captives, and over which they were spread.

iii. 21. The repentance of the people would begin upon those very high places where they had been guilty of their vile idolatries.

iv. 1. This verse and the next must be closely connected with the preceding. There are different opinions as to the sense. The Hebrew is literally, "If thou wilt return, O Israel, saith the Lord, to me thou wilt return;" i.e., say some, "If you will return to your own land, you will return first to me by repentance." Others say it is, 'If you will return to me, you shall return to your land and

For the fierce anger of the LORD is not turned back from us.

9 And it shall come to pass at that day, saith the LORD,
That the heart of the king shall perish, and the heart of the princes;
And the priests shall be astonished, and the prophets shall wonder.

10 Then said I, Ah, Lord GOD!
Surely thou hast greatly deceived this people and Jerusalem,
Saying, Ye shall have peace; whereas the sword reacheth unto the soul.

11 At that time shall it be said to this people and to Jerusalem,
A dry wind of the high places in the wilderness
Toward the daughter of my people, not to fan, nor to cleanse,

12 Even a full wind from those places shall come unto me:
Now also will I give sentence against them.

13 Behold, he shall come up as clouds,
And his chariots shall be as a whirlwind:
His horses are swifter than eagles.
Woe unto us! for we are spoiled.

14 O Jerusalem, wash thine heart from wickedness,
That thou mayest be saved.
How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?

15 For a voice declareth from Dan,
And publisheth affliction from mount Ephraim

16 Make ye mention to the nations; behold,
Publish against Jerusalem,
That watchers come from a far country,
And give out their voice against the cities of Judah.

17 As keepers of a field, are they against her round about;
Because she hath been rebellious against me, saith the LORD.

18 Thy way and thy doings have procured these things unto thee;
This is thy wickedness, because it is bitter, because it reacheth unto thine heart.

God's usual method is to warn before he wounds. In these verses, accordingly, God gives notice to the Jews of the general desolation that would shortly be brought upon them by a foreign invasion. This must be declared and published in all the cities of Judah and streets of Jerusalem, that all might hear and fear; and, by this loud alarm, be either brought to repentance, or left inexcusable. The prediction of this calamity is here given very largely, and in lively expressions, which one would think should have awakened and affected the most stupid. Observe,

First. The war proclaimed, and general notice given of the advance of the enemy. It is published now, some years before, by the prophet; but, since this will be slighted, it shall be published after another manner, when the judgment is actually breaking in, ver. 5, 6. The trumpet must be blown, the standard must be set up. Summons must be issued out to the people to gather together, and to draw towards Zion, either to guard that, or expecting to be guarded by it. There must be a general rendezvous; the militia must be raised, and all the forces mustered. Those that are able men, and fit for service, must go into the defenced cities, to garrison them. Those that are weak, and would lessen their provisions but not increase their strength, must retire, and away, and not stay.

Secondly. An express arrived with intelligence of the approach of the king of Babylon and his army. It is an evil that God will bring from the north, as he had said, ch. i. 15, "even a great destruction," beyond all that had yet come upon the nation of the Jews. The enemy is here compared,

1. To a lion that comes up from his thicket, when he is hungry, to seek his prey, ver. 7. The helpless beasts are so terrified with his roaring, (as some report,) that they cannot flee from him, and so become an easy prey to him. Nebuchadnezzar is this roaring, tearing lion, "the destroyer of the nations," that has laid many countries waste, and now "is on his way," on full speed towards the land of Judah. The destroyer of the Gentiles shall be the destroyer of the Jews too, when they have by their idolatry made themselves like the Gentiles. He is gone forth from his place, from Babylon, or the place of the rendezvous of his army, on purpose against this land; that is the prey he has now his eye upon, not to plunder it only, but to make it desolate; and herein he shall succeed to that degree, that the cities shall be laid waste without inhabitants, shall be overgrown with grass as a field, so some read it.

2. To a drying, blasting wind, (ver. 11,) a parching, scorching wind, which spoils the fruits of the earth, and withers them. Not a wind that brings rain, but such as useth to come out of the north, which drives away rain, Pr. xxv. 23, but brings something worse instead of it; such shall this evil out of the north be to this people. A black, freezing wind, which they can neither fence against nor flee from; but wherever they go it shall surround and pursue them; and they cannot see it before it comes, but when it comes they shall feel it. It is a "wind of the high places in the wilderness," or plain, or that beats upon the tops of the hills, or that carries all before it in the plain, where there is no shelter, but the ground is all champaign. It shall come in its full force "towards the daughter of my people," that have been brought up so tenderly and delicately that they could not endure to have the wind blow upon them. Now this fierce wind shall come against them, not to fan or cleanse them; not such a gentle wind, as is used in winnowing corn; but a full wind, ver. 12, a strong and violent wind, blowing full upon them. This shall come to me, or rather for me; it shall come with commission from God, and shall accomplish that for which he sends it. For this, as other stormy winds, fulfils his word.

3. To clouds and whirlwinds for swiftness, ver. 13. The Chaldean army shall come up as clouds driven with the wind; so thick shall they stand, so fast shall they march, and it shall be to no purpose to offer to stop them, or to make head against them, no more than to arrest a cloud, or give check to a whirlwind. The horses are swifter than eagles, when they fly upon their prey; it is vain to think either of opposing them or of outrunning them.

4. To watchers, and the keepers of a field; ver. 15—17, "The voice declares from Dan," a city which lay farthest north of all the cities of Canaan, and therefore received the first tidings of this evil from the north, and hastened it to mount Ephraim, that part of the land of Israel which lay next to Judea. They received the news of the affliction, and transmitted it to Jerusalem. Ill news flies apace; and an impenitent people, that hates to be reformed, can expect no other but ill news. Now, what is the news? tell the nations, those mixed nations that now inhabit the cities of the ten tribes; mention it to them, that they may provide for their own safety; but publish it against Jerusalem, that is the place aimed at, the game shot at. Let them know that "watchers are come from a far country," that is, soldiers, that will watch all opportunities to do mischief. Private soldiers we call private sentinels, or watchmen. They are coming on a full career, and "give out their voice against the cities of Judah;" they design to invest them, and make themselves masters of them, and then to attack them with loud shouts, as sure of victory. As keepers of a field surround it, to keep all out from it, so shall they surround the cities of Judah, to keep all in them, till they be constrained to surrender at discretion; they "are against her round about, compassing her in on every side:" see Lu. xix. 43. As formerly the good angels, those watchers and holy ones, were like keepers of a field to Jerusalem watching about it, that nothing might go in to its prejudice, so now their enemies were as watchers and keepers of a field, surrounding it, that nothing might go in to its relief and succour.

Thirdly. The lamentable cause of this judgment. How is it that Judah and Jerusalem come to be thus abandoned to ruin? See how it came to this. 1. They sinned against God. It was all long of themselves; "She has been rebellious against me, saith the Lord," ver. 17. Their enemies surrounded them as keepers of a field, because they had taken up arms against their rightful lord and sovereign, and were to be seized as rebels. The Chaldeans are breaking in upon them, and it was sin that opened the gap at which they entered; "Thy ways and thy doings have procured these things unto thee," ver. 18; thy evil way, and thy doings that have not been good. It was not a false step or two that did them this mischief, but their way and course of living was bad. Note, Sin is the procuring cause of all our troubles. Those that go on in sin, while they are endeavouring to ward off mischiefs with one hand, are at the same time pulling them upon their own heads with the other. 2. God was angry with them for their sin. It is the fierce anger of the Lord that makes the army of the Chaldeans thus fierce, thus furious; that is kindled against us, and is not turned back from us, ver. 8. Note, In men's anger against us, and the violence of that, we must see and own God's anger, and the power of that. If that were turned back from us, our enemies should not come forward against us. 3. In his just and holy anger he condemned them to this dreadful punishment; "Now also will I give sentence against them," ver. 12. The execution was done, not in a heat, but in pursuance of a sentence solemnly passed, according to equity, and upon mature deliberation. Some read it, 'Now will I do execution upon them, according to the doom formerly passed; and "we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth," and the execution of that judgment.

Fourthly. The lamentable effects of this judgment, upon the first alarm given of it. 1. The people that should fight shall quite despair, and shall not have a heart to make the least stand against the enemy; ver. 8, "For this gird you with sackcloth, lament and howl;" that is, you will do so when the cry is made through the kingdom, "Arm, arm." All will be seized with a consternation, and all put into confusion. Instead of girding on the sword, they will gird on the sackcloth; instead of animating one another to a vigorous resistance, they will lament and howl, and so dishearten one another. While the enemy is yet at a distance, they will give up all for gone, and cry, "Woe unto us! for we are spoiled," ver. 13. We are all undone; the spoilers will certainly carry the day, and it is in vain to make head against them. Judah and Jerusalem had been famed for valiant men; but see what is the effect of sin: by depriving men of their confidence towards God, it deprives them of their courage towards men. 2. Their great men, that should contrive for the public safety, shall be at their wit's end; ver. 9, "At that day the heart of the king shall perish;" both his wisdom and his courage. Despairing of success, he shall have no spirit to do any thing; and if he had he will not know what to do. His princes and privy-counsellors, that should animate and advise him, shall be as much at a loss and as much in despair as he. See how easily, how effectually God can bring ruin upon a people that are doomed to it, purely by dispiriting them, "taking away the heart of the chief" of them, Job xii. 20, 24; "cutting off the spirit of princes," Ps. lxvi. 12. The business of the priests was to encourage the people in time of war. They were to say to the people, "Fear not, and let not your hearts faint," Deu. xx. 2, 3. They were to blow the trumpets, for an assurance to them that in the day of battle they should be "remembered before the Lord their God," Num. x. 9. But now the priests themselves shall be astonished, and shall have no heart themselves to do their office, and therefore not likely to put spirit into the people. The prophets too, the false prophets that had cried peace to them, shall be put into the greatest amazement imaginable; seeing their own guilty blood ready to be shed by that sword which they had many a time told the people there was no danger of. Note, God's judgments come with the greatest terror upon those that have been most secure. Our Saviour foretells that, at the last destruction of Jerusalem, men's hearts should fail them for fear, Lu. xxi. 26; and it is common for those who have cheated and flattered people into a carnal security, not only to fail them, but to discourage them, when the trouble comes.

Fifthly. The prophet's complaint of the people's being deceived, ver. 10. It is expressed strangely, as we read it: "Ah, Lord God, surely thou hast greatly deceived this people, saying, Ye shall have peace." We are sure God deceives none. "Let no man say, when he is tempted," or deluded, that God has tempted or deluded him. But, 1. The people deceived themselves with the promises that God had made in general of his favour to that nation, and the many peculiar privileges with which they were dignified, building upon them, though they took no care to perform the conditions on which the accomplishment of those promises, and the continuance of those privileges did depend; and had no regard to the threatenings which in the law were set over against those promises. Thus they cheated themselves, and then wickedly complained that God had cheated them. 2. The false prophets deceived them with promises of peace, which they made them in God's name, ch. xxiii 17; xxvii. 9. If God had sent them, he had indeed greatly deceived the people; but he did not. It was the people's fault that they gave them credit; and here also they deceived themselves. 3. God had permitted the false prophets to deceive, and the former prosperity." Others suggest further differences, but all agree that the words involve a promise to the repenting.

iv. 3. Instead of "break up your fallow ground," the Syriac here has "light for yourselves a lamp," but modern critics agree with our version.

iv. 5. The words rendered "cry, gather together" may simply mean "cry aloud" or "cry abundantly;" so Castalio, Henderson, &c.

iv. 6. "Evil" here is misfortune. Calmet says that "Babylonia, Chaldea, Assyria, and Media are constantly represented in Scripture as being to the north of Judea. Probably the prophets speak of the kings of Babylonia and Chaldea, not so much with a view to their geographical situation, which is rather to the east of Palestine, as to the course which they took in their expeditions against Judea. The deserts of Arabia being not practicable for an army, they commonly crossed the Euphrates at Tiphsah or Thapsacus, and approached Judea on the north side, by way of Damascus and Syria."

people to be deceived by them: giving both up to strong delusions, to punish them for not receiving the truth in the love of it. Herein the Lord was righteous; but the prophet complains of it as the sorest judgment of all, for by this means they had been hardened in their sins. 4. It may be read with an interrogation, 'Hast thou indeed thus deceived this people?' It is plain they are greatly deceived, for they expect peace, whereas "the sword reacheth unto the soul;" that is, it is a killing sword, abundance of lives are lost, and more like to be. Now, was it God that deceived them? No; he had often given them warning of judgments in general, and of this in particular; but their own prophets deceive them, and cry peace to them to whom the God of heaven doth not speak peace. It is a piteous thing, and that which every good man greatly laments, to see people flattered into their own ruin, and promising themselves peace when war is at the door; and this we should complain of to God, who alone can prevent such a fatal delusion.

Secondly. The prophet's endeavour to undeceive them. When the prophets they loved and caressed dealt falsely with them, he whom they hated and persecuted dealt faithfully.

1. He shews them their wound. They were loath to see it, very loath to have it searched into; but if they will allow themselves the liberty of a free thought they might discover their punishment in their sin; ver. 18, "This is thy wickedness, because it is bitter." Now thou seest that it is a bitter thing to depart from God, and will certainly be bitterness in the latter end, ch. ii. 19. It produceth bitter effects, and grief that reacheth unto the heart, toucheth to the quick, and in the most tender part; The sword reacheth to the soul, ver. 10. God can make trouble reach the heart, even of those that would lay nothing to heart; and by this thou mayest see what is thy wickedness; that it is a bitter thing, "a root of bitterness, that bears gall and wormwood;" and that it has reached to the heart,—it is the corruption of the soul, of the imagination of the thought of the heart. If the heart were not polluted with sin, it would not be disturbed and disquieted as it is with trouble.

2. He shews them the cure, ver. 14. Since "thy wickedness reacheth to the heart," there the application must be made; "O Jerusalem, wash thine hands from wickedness, that thou mayest be saved." By Jerusalem, he means each one of the inhabitants of Jerusalem; for every man has a heart of his own to take care of; and it is personal reformation that must help the public. Every one must return from his own evil way, and, in order to that, cleanse his own evil heart; and let the heart of the city too be purified, not the suburbs only, as the outskirts of it. The vitals of a state must be amended, by the reformation of those that have the commanding influence upon it. Note, 1st. Reformation is absolutely necessary to salvation. There is no other way of preventing judgments, or turning them away when we are threatened with them, but taking away the sin by which we have procured them to ourselves. 2nd. No reformation is saving but that which reacheth the heart. There is heart-wickedness, that is defiling to the soul, from which we must wash ourselves. By repentance and faith we must wash our hearts from the guilt we have contracted by spiritual wickedness, by those sins which begin and end in the heart, and go no farther; and by mortification and watchfulness we must suppress and prevent this heart-wickedness for the future. The tree must be made good, else the fruit will not. Jerusalem was all overspread with the leprosy of sin. Now, as it is with the body in such a case, (the physicians agree that external applications will do no good, unless a great deal of purging physic be taken inwardly, to change the mass of the humours that lurk there, and to change the mass of the blood,) so it is with the soul, so it is with the state; there will be no effectual reformation of the manners without a reformation of the mind. The mistakes must be rectified; the corruptions there must be mortified, and the evil dispositions there changed. Though thou art Jerusalem, called a holy city; that will not save thee, unless thou wash thine heart from wickedness. In the latter part of the verse he reasons with them, "How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?" Where he complains, First. Of the delays of their reformation; How long shall that filthy heart of thine continue unwashed? When shall it once be? Note, The God of heaven thinks the time long that his room is usurped, and his interest opposed in our souls, ch. xiii. 27. Secondly. Of the root of their corruption, the vain thoughts that lodged within them, and defiled their hearts, from which they must wash their hearts. Thoughts of iniquity, or mischief; these are the evil thoughts that are the spawn of the evil heart, from which all other wickedness is produced, Mat. xv. 19; these are our own, the conceptions of our own lusts, Jas. i. 15; and they are most dangerous, when they lodge within us, when they are admitted and entertained as guests, and are suffered to continue. Some read it, thoughts of afflictions; such thoughts as will bring nothing but affliction and misery upon thee. Some, by the vain thoughts here understand all those frivolous pleas and excuses with which they turned off the reproofs and calls of the word, and rendered them ineffectual, and bolstered themselves up in their wickedness. "Wash thy heart from wickedness;" and think not to say, "We are not polluted," ch. ii. 23; or, We are Jerusalem; "We have Abraham to our father," Mat. iii. 8, 9.

19 My bowels, my bowels! I am pained at my very heart;
My heart maketh a noise in me; I cannot hold my peace,
Because thou hast heard, O my soul,
The sound of the trumpet, the alarm of war
20 Destruction upon destruction is cried;
For the whole land is spoiled:
Suddenly are my tents spoiled,
And my curtains in a moment.
21 How long shall I see the standard,
And hear the sound of the trumpet?
22 For my people is foolish,
They have not known me;
They are sottish children,
And they have none understanding:
They are wise to do evil,
But to do good they have no knowledge
23 I beheld the earth, and, lo, it was without form, and
And the heavens, and they had no light. [void;
24 I beheld the mountains, and, lo, they trembled,
And all the hills moved lightly.
25 I beheld, and, lo, there was no man,
And all the birds of the heavens were fled.
26 I beheld, and, lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness,
And all the cities thereof were broken down
At the presence of the LORD,
And by his fierce anger.
27 For thus hath the LORD said,
The whole land shall be desolate;
Yet will I not make a full end.
28 For this shall the earth mourn,
And the heavens above be black:
Because I have spoken it, I have purposed it,
And will not repent, neither will I turn back from it.
29 The whole city shall flee
For the noise of the horsemen and bowmen;
They shall go into thickets,
And climb up upon the rocks:
Every city shall be forsaken,
And not a man dwell therein.
30 And when thou art spoiled, what wilt thou do?
Though thou clothest thyself with crimson,
Though thou deckest thee with ornaments of gold,
Though thou rentest thy face with painting,

WOMAN WITH PAINTED EYES.

In vain shalt thou make thyself fair;
Thy lovers will despise thee, they will seek thy life.
31 For I have heard a voice as of a woman in travail,
And the anguish as of her that bringeth forth her first child,
The voice of the daughter of Zion,
That bewaileth herself, that spreadeth her hands,
Saying, Woe is me now!
For my soul is wearied because of murderers.

The prophet is here in a mighty agony, and cries out like one upon the rack of pain, with the colic or gripes, or some such acute distemper, or as a woman in travail. The expressions are very pathetical and moving, enough to melt a heart of stone into compassion; "My bowels, my bowels! I am pained at my very heart;" and yet well and in health himself, and nothing ails him. Note, A good man, in such a bad world as this is, cannot but be a man of sorrows. "My heart makes a noise in me," through the tumult of my spirits, and "I cannot hold my peace." Note, The grievance and the grief sometimes may be such as that the most prudent, patient man cannot forbear complaining. Now what is the matter? What is it that puts this good man into such a toss? It is not for himself, or any affliction in his family, that he grieves thus; but it is purely upon the public account, it is his people's case that he lays to heart thus.

First. They are very sinful, and will not be reformed, ver. 22. These are the words of God himself, for so the prophet chose to give this character of the people, rather than in his own words, or as from himself. "My people is foolish." God calls them his people though they are foolish. They have cast him off, but he has not cast them off, Rom. xi. 1. They are my people whom I have been in covenant with, and still have mercy in store for. They are foolish, for "they have not known me." Note, Those are foolish indeed that have not known God, especially that call themselves his people, and have the advantages of coming into acquaintance with him and yet have not known him. They are sottish children, stupid and senseless, and have no understanding. They cannot distinguish between truth and falsehood, good and evil; they cannot discern the mind of God, either in his word or in his providence; they do not understand what their true interest is, nor on which side it lies. They are wise to do evil, to plot mischief against the quiet in the land; wise to contrive the gratification of their lust, and then to conceal and palliate it. But "to do good they have no knowledge," no contrivance, no application of mind; they know not how to make a good use either of the ordinances or of the providences of God, nor how to bring about any design for the good of their country. Contrary to this should be our character, Rom. xvi. 19, "I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil."

Secondly. They are very miserable, and cannot be relieved. He cries out thus, "Because thou hast heard, O my soul, the sound of the trumpet," and

iv. 7. "The lion" is the Babylonian monarch, also styled "the destroyer of Gentiles." This last shows that Jew and Gentile were one to him.

iv. 9. When it is said here that the heart of king and princes would perish or fail, "heart" is used in the sense of courage.

iv. 10. When Jeremiah says God has deceived the people, he says what is not altogether correct. God had promised them peace and prosperity, and yet he now menaces them with conquest and ruin. They expected only the former, and therefore were deceived. But surely as a fact they deceived themselves, by not observing the conditions and terms on which the promise depended. We should say that God had disappointed the people. It may be observed that the Hebrew word for "deceived" here more nearly answers to our word "misled." It seldom occurs, but is the "beguiled" of Gen. iii. 13.

iv. 11. "A dry wind of the high places," &c., is by some under-seen the standard, both giving the alarm of war, ver. 19, 21. He doth not say, Thou hast heard, O my ear, but O my soul, because the event was yet future; and it is by the spirit of prophecy that he sees it, and receives the impression of it. His soul heard it from the words of God, and therefore he was as well assured of it, and as much affected with it, as if he had heard it with his bodily ears. He expresseth this exceeding concern, 1. To shew that, though he foretold this calamity, yet he was far from desiring the woful day; for a woful day it would be to him. It becomes us to tremble at the thoughts of the misery that sinners are running themselves into, though we have good hopes, through grace, that we ourselves are delivered from the wrath to come. 2. To awaken them to a holy fear, and so to a care to prevent so great judgment, by a true and timely repentance. Note, Those that would affect others with the word of God should evidence that they are themselves affected with it. Now let us see what there is in the destruction here foreseen and foretold that is so very affecting.

1st. It is a swift and sudden destruction. It comes upon Judah and Jerusalem ere they are aware, and pours in so fast upon them that they have not the least breathing time. They have no time to recollect their thoughts, much less to recruit or recover their strength, "destruction upon destruction is cried," ver. 20, "breach upon breach," one sad calamity, like Job's messengers, treading upon the heels of another. The death of Josiah breaks the ice, and plucks up the floodgates; within three months after that his son and successor Jehoahaz is deposed by the king of Egypt; within two or three years after, Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem and took it, and from thenceforward he was continually making descents upon the land of Judah with his armies during the reigns of Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah, till about nineteen years after he completed their ruin in the destruction of Jerusalem. But "suddenly were their tents spoiled, and their curtains in a moment." Though the cities held out for some time, yet the country was laid waste at the very first. The shepherds, and all that lived in tents, were plundered presently, they and their effects fell into the enemies' hands; therefore we find the Rechabites that used to dwell in tents, upon the first coming of the army of the Chaldees into the land, retiring into Jerusalem, ch. xxxv. 11. The inhabitants of the villages soon ceased; "suddenly were the tents spoiled." The plain men that dwelt in tents were first made a prey of.

2nd. This dreadful war continued a great while, not in the borders, but in the bowels of the country; for the people were very obstinate, and would not submit to, but took all opportunity to rebel against, the king of Babylon, which did but lengthen out the calamity; they might as good have yielded at first as at last. This is complained of, ver. 21, "How long shall I see the standard?" Shall the sword devour for ever? Good men are none of those that delight in war, for they know not how to fish in troubled waters; they are for peace, Ps. cxx. 7, and will heartily say Amen to that prayer, 'Give peace in our time, O Lord.' "O thou sword of the Lord, when wilt thou be quiet?"

3rd. The desolations made by it in the land were general and universal. "The whole land is spoiled" or plundered, ver. 20, so it was at first, and at length it became a perfect chaos. It was such a desolation as amounted in a manner to a dissolution; not only the superstructure, but even the foundations, were all out of course. The prophet in vision saw the extent and extremity of this destruction, and he here gives a most lively description of it; which, one would think, might have made those uneasy in their sins who dwelt in a land doomed to such a ruin, which might yet have been prevented by their repentance. First. The earth is without form, and void, as it was, Gen. i. 2; it is Tohu and Bohu, the words there used, as far as the land of Judea goes. It is confusion and emptiness, stripped of all its beauty, void of all its wealth; and, compared with what it was, every thing out of place, and out of shape. To a worse chaos than this will the earth be reduced at the end of time, when it and "all the works that are therein shall be burnt up." Secondly. The heavens too are without light, as the earth without fruits. This alludes to the darkness that was upon the face of the deep, Gen. i. 2, and represents God's displeasure against them, as the eclipse of the sun did at our Saviour's death. It was not only the earth that failed them, but heaven also frowned upon them; and with their trouble they had darkness, for they could not see through their troubles. The smoke of their houses and cities which the enemy burned, and the dust which their army raised in its march, even darkened the sun, so that the heavens had no light. Or, it may be taken figuratively: the earth, that is the common people, were impoverished, and in confusion; and the heavens, that is the princes and rulers, had no light, no wisdom in themselves, nor were any comfort to the people, nor a guide to them: compare Mat. xxiv. 29. Thirdly. The mountains trembled, and the hills moved lightly, ver. 24, so formidable were the appearances of God against his people, as in the days of old they had been for them, that "the mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs," Ps. cxiv. 4. The everlasting mountains seemed to be scattered, Hab. iii. 6. The mountains on which they had worshipped their idols, the mountains over which they had looked for succours, all trembled as if they had been conscious of the people's guilt. The mountains, those among them that seemed to be highest and strongest, and of the firmest resolution, yet trembled at the approach of the Chaldean army. The hills moved lightly, as being eased of the burthen of a sinful nation, Isa. i. 24. Fourthly. Not the earth only, but the air was dispeopled and left uninhabited, ver. 25. I beheld the cities, the countries that used to be populous, and lo, there was no man to be seen; all the inhabitants were either killed or fled, or taken captives, such a ruining, depopulating thing is sin. Nay, even "the birds of the heavens," that used to fly about, and "sing among the branches," were now fled away, and no more to be seen or heard. The land of Judah is now become like the lake of Sodom, over which, they say, no bird flies: see Deu. xxix. 23. The enemies shall make such havoc of the country that they shall not so much as leave a bird alive in it. Fifthly. Both the ground and the houses shall be laid waste; ver. 26, "Lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness," being deserted by the inhabitants that should cultivate it, and then soon overgrown with thorns and briars. Or, being trodden down by the destroying army of the enemy. The cities also and their gates and walls are broken down, and levelled with the ground. Those that look no farther than second causes impute it to the policy and fury of the invaders; but the prophet, who looked to the first cause, saith it is "at the presence of the Lord," at his face, that is, the anger of his countenance, even "by his fierce anger," that this was done. Even angry men cannot do us any real hurt, unless God be angry with us. If our ways please him all is well. Sixthly. The meaning of all this is that the nation shall be entirely ruined, and every part of it shall share in the destruction; neither town nor country shall escape. 1*st.* Not the country, for "the whole land shall be desolate;" corn land, and pasture land, both common and enclosed, it shall all be laid waste, ver. 27; the conquerors will have occasion for it all. 2*nd.* Not the men; for, ver. 29, "the whole city shall flee," all the inhabitants of the towns shall quit their habitations by consent, "for fear of the horsemen and bowmen." Rather than lie exposed to their fury they shall "go into the thickets," where they are in danger to be torn by briars, nay, to be torn in pieces by wild beasts; and they shall "climb up upon the rocks," where their lodging will be hard and cold, and the precipice dangerous. Let us not be over fond of our houses and cities, for the time may come when rocks and thickets may be preferable, and chosen rather. This shall be the common case, for "every city shall be forsaken," and not a man shall be left that dares dwell therein. Both government and trade shall be at an end, and all civil societies and incorporations dissolved. It is a very dismal idea which this gives of the approaching desolation; but in the midst of all these threatenings comes in one comfortable word, ver. 27, "Yet will not I make a full end:" not a total consumption, for God will reserve a remnant to himself, that shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger; not a final consumption, for Jerusalem shall again be built, and the land inhabited. This comes in here in the midst of the threatenings, for the comfort of those that trembled at God's word; and it speaks to us the changeableness of God's providence, as it breaks down so it raiseth up again. Every end of our comforts is not a full end, however we may be ready to think it so. And it speaks the unchangeableness of God's covenant, which stands so firm that though he may correct his people very severely, yet he will not cast them off, ch. xxx. 11.

4. Their case was helpless, and without remedy. 1. God would not help them; so he tells them plainly, ver. 28. And if the Lord do not help them, who can? This is that which makes their case deplorable; for this "the earth mourns, and the heavens above are black." There are no prospects but what are very dismal, "because I have spoken it," I have given the word, which shall not be called back; "I have purposed it," it is a consumption decreed, determined, and I will not repent," not change this way, but proceed in it, and will not turn back from it. They would not repent and turn back from the way of their sins, ch. ii. 25, and therefore God will not repent and turn back from the way of his judgments. 2. They could not help themselves, ver. 30, 31. When the thing appeared at a distance they flattered themselves with hopes that, though God should not appear for them as he had done for Hezekiah against the Assyrian army, yet they should find some means or other to secure themselves, and give check to the forces of the enemy. But the prophet tells them that when it comes to the setting to they will be quite at a loss. "When thou art spoiled, what wilt thou do?" What course wilt thou take? Sit down now, and consider this in time. He assures them that, whatever were now their contrivances and confidences,

1st. They will then be despised by their allies whom they depended upon for assistance. He had often compared the sin of Jerusalem to whoredom, not only her idolatry, but her trust in creatures, in the neighbouring powers. Now here he compares her to a harlot, abandoned by all the lewd ones that used to make court to her. She is supposed to do all she can to keep up her interest in their affections; she doth what she can to make herself appear considerable among the nations, and a valuable ally; compliments them by her ambassadors to the highest degree, to engage them to stand by her now in her distress. She clothes herself with crimson, as if she were rich; and decks herself with ornaments of gold, as if her treasures were still as full as ever they had been. She rents her face with painting, puts the best colours she can upon her present distresses, and doth her utmost to palliate and extenuate her losses; sets a good face upon it. But this painting, though it beautifies the face for the present, really rents it; the frequent use of paint spoils the skin, cracks it, and makes it rough; so the case, which by false colours has been made to appear better than really it was, when truth comes to light will look so much the worse. And, after all, "in vain shalt thou make thyself fair;" all thy neighbours are sensible how low thou art brought; the Chaldeans will strip thee of thy crimson and ornaments, and then thy confederates will not only slight thee, and refuse to give thee any succour, but they will join with those that seek thy life, that they may come in for a share in the prey of so rich a country. Here seems to be an allusion to the story of Jezebel, who thought, by making herself look fair and fine, to have outfaced her doom; but in vain, 2 Kin. ix. 33. See what creatures prove when we confide in them, how treacherous they are; instead of saving the life they seek the life; they often change so as that they will sooner do us an ill turn than any service. And see to how little purpose it is for those that have by sin deformed themselves in God's eyes to think by any arts they can use to beautify themselves in the eye of the world.

2nd. They will then be themselves in despair; will find their troubles to be like the pains of a woman in travail, which she cannot escape. "I have heard the voice of the daughter of Zion," her groans echoing to the triumphant shouts of the Chaldean army which he heard, ver. 15; it is "like the voice of a woman in travail," whose pain is exquisite, and the fruit of sin, and the curse too, Gen. iii. 16; and extorts lamentable outcries, especially of a woman in travail of her first child, who, having never known before what that pain is, is the more terrified by it. Troubles are most grievous to those that have not been used to them. Zion, in this distress, since her neighbours refuse to pity her, bewaileth herself, fetching deep sighs, so the word signifies; and she spreads her hands, either wringing them for grief or reaching them forth for succour; and all the cry is, "Woe is me now," now the decree is gone forth against her, and is past recall, for "my soul is wearied because of murderers." The Chaldean soldiers put all to the sword that gave them any opposition, so that the land was full of murders. Zion was weary of hearing tragical stories from all parts of the country, and cried out, Woe is me. It was well if their sufferings put them in mind of their sins, the murders committed upon them, of the murders committed by them; for God was now making inquisition for the innocent blood shed in Jerusalem, which the Lord would not pardon, 2 Kin. xxiv. 4. Note, As sin will find out the sinner, so sorrow will sooner or later find out the secure.

CHAPTER V.

Reproofs for sin and threatenings of judgment are intermixed in this chapter, and are set the one over against the other; judgments are threatened, that the reproofs of sin might be the more effectual to bring them to repentance; sin is discovered, that God might be justified in the judgments threatened. I. The sins they are charged with are, very great injustice, ver. 1; hypocrisy in religion, ver. 2; incorrigibleness, ver. 3; both poor and rich, corrupt and debauched, ver. 4, 5; idolatry and adultery, ver. 7, 8; treacherous departures from God, ver. 11; and an impudent defiance of him, ver. 12, 13; and that which is at the bottom of all this, want of the fear of God, notwithstanding the frequent calls given them to fear him, ver. 20—24; and in the close of the chapter they are charged with violence and oppression, ver. 26—28; and a combination of those to debauch the nation that should have been active to reform it, ver. 30, 31. II. The judgments they are threatened with are very terrible: in general they shall be reckoned with, ver. 9, 29; a foreign enemy shall be brought in upon them, ver. 15—17; shall set guards upon them, ver. 6; shall destroy their fortifications, ver. 10; shall carry them away into captivity, ver. 19; and keep all good things from them, ver. 25; and herein the words of God's prophets shall be fulfilled, ver. 14. But, III. Here is an intimation, twice given, that God would in the midst of wrath remember mercy, and not utterly destroy them, ver. 10, 18. This was the scope and purport of Jeremiah's preaching in the latter end of Josiah's reign, and the beginning of Jehoiakim's, but the success did not answer expectation.

stood of a hot wind, and by others of a strong blast from the hills of the wilderness. This northern blast would come upon Israel, not to winnow, but to scatter. It is of course a figure for the Babylonian invasion.

iv. 15. The tribe of Dan was on the northern part of the land, and would first raise the alarm. Mount Ephraim was nearer Jerusalem.

iv. 16. The "watchers" here are the besiegers, who will keep ward round Jerusalem, as the keepers of a field watch over it.

iv. 19—21. "Most interpreters consider these words to be the language of the prophet," says Dr. Henderson; "but they may more appropriately be regarded as those of the Jewish state personified, which is introduced as experiencing the most acute anguish on receiving the painful intelligence of the near approach of the enemy. Not only does the mention of tents and tent-curtains suggest the idea of more than one person, but the comparison of the language here employed with that found in the strictly parallel passage (chap.

RUN ye to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem,
And see now, and know, and seek in the broad places thereof,
If ye can find a man,
If there be any that executeth judgment,
That seeketh the truth; and I will pardon it.
2 And though they say, The LORD liveth;
Surely they swear falsely.
3 O LORD, are not thine eyes upon the truth?
Thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved;
Thou hast consumed them, but they have refused to receive correction:
They have made their faces harder than a rock;
They have refused to return.
4 Therefore I said,
Surely these are poor; they are foolish:
For they know not the way of the LORD,
Nor the judgment of their God.
5 I will get me unto the great men,
And will speak unto them;
For they have known the way of the LORD,
And the judgment of their God:
But these have altogether broken the yoke, and burst the bonds.
6 Wherefore a lion out of the forest shall slay them,
And a wolf of the evenings shall spoil them,
A leopard shall watch over their cities:
Every one that goeth out thence shall be torn in pieces:
Because their transgressions are many,
And their backslidings are increased.
7 How shall I pardon thee for this?
Thy children have forsaken me,
And sworn by them that are no gods:
When I had fed them to the full, they then committed adultery,
And assembled themselves by troops in the harlots' houses.
8 They were as fed horses in the morning:
Every one neighed after his neighbour's wife.
9 Shall I not visit for these things? saith the LORD:
And shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?

Here is, First. A challenge to produce any one right honest man, or at least any considerable number of such, in Jerusalem, ver. 1. Jerusalem was become like the old world, in which all flesh had corrupted their way. There were some, perhaps, who flattered themselves with hopes that there were yet many good men in Jerusalem that would stand in the gap to turn away the wrath of God; and others that boasted of its being the holy city, and thought that would save it; but God bids them search the town, and they should scarce find a man in it that executes judgment, that makes conscience of what he saith and doth. Look in the streets, where they made their appearance, and conversed together, and in the broad places where they kept their markets; see if you can find a man, that is, a magistrate, (so some,) that executes judgment, and administers justice impartially; that will put the laws in execution against vice and profaneness. When the faithful thus cease and fail, it is time to cry, "Woe is me," Mic. vii. 1, 2, high time to cry, "Help, Lord," Ps. xii. 1. Or if there be here and there a man that is truly conscientious, and doth at least seek the truth, yet you shall not find him in the streets and broad places; he dares not appear publicly, for he shall be abused and run down; "Truth is fallen in the street," Isa. lix. 14, and is forced to seek for corners. So pleasing would it be to God to find any such, that for their sake he would pardon the city, if there were but ten righteous men in Sodom; if but one of a thousand, of ten thousand, in Jerusalem, it should be spared. See how ready God is to forgive, how swift to shew mercy. But it might be said, What do you make of those in Jerusalem that continue to make profession of religion, and relation to God? Are not those men for whose sakes Jerusalem may be spared? No, for they are not sincere in their profession; ver. 2, "They say the Lord liveth," and will swear by his name only, but they swear falsely; that is, 1. They are not sincere in the profession of respect they make to God, but are false to him; they honour him with their lips, but their hearts are far from him. 2. Though they appeal to God only, they make no conscience of calling him to witness to a lie; though they do not swear by idols, they forswear themselves, which is no less an affront to God, as the God of truth, than the other is as the only true God.

Secondly. A complaint which the prophet makes to God of the obstinacy and wilfulness of these people. God had appealed to their eyes, ver. 1, but here the prophet appeals to his eyes; ver. 3, "Are not thine eyes upon the truth?" Dost thou not see every man's true character? And is not this the truth of their character, that "they have made their faces harder than a rock?" Or, "Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward part;" but where is it to be found among the men of this generation? for though they say, "The Lord liveth," yet they never regard him. Thou hast stricken them with one affliction after another, but they have not grieved for the affliction; they have been as stocks and stones under it, much less have they grieved for the sin by which they have brought it upon themselves. Thou hast gone farther yet, hast consumed them, hast corrected them yet more severely; but they have refused to receive correction, to accommodate themselves to thy design in correcting them, and to answer it. They would not receive instruction by the correction; they have set themselves to outface the Divine sentence, and to outbrave the execution of it; for "they have made their faces harder than a rock." They cannot change countenance, neither blush for shame, nor look pale for fear; cannot be beaten back from the pursuit of their lusts, whatever check is given them; for though often called to it, they have refused to return, and would go forward, right or wrong, as the horse into the battle.

Thirdly. The trial made both of rich and poor, and the ill character given of both.

1. The poor were ignorant, and therefore they were wicked. He found many that refused to return, for whom he was willing to make the best excuse their case would bear, and it was this; ver. 4, "Surely, these are poor, they are foolish," they never had the advantage of a good education, nor have they wherewithal to help themselves now with the means of instruction; they are forced to work hard for their living, and have no time or capacity for reading or hearing, so that they "know not the way of the Lord, nor the judgments of their God;" they understand neither the way in which God by his precept will have them walk towards him nor the way in which he by his providence is walking towards them. Note, 1st. Prevailing ignorance is the lamentable cause of abounding impiety and iniquity. What can one expect but works of darkness from brutish, sottish people, that know nothing of God and religion, but choose to sit in darkness. 2nd. This is commonly a reigning sin among poor people. There are the devil's poor, as well as God's, who, notwithstanding their poverty, might know the way of the Lord so as to walk in it, and do their duty, without being book-learned; but they are willingly ignorant, and therefore their ignorance will not be their excuse.

2. The rich were insolent and haughty, and therefore they were wicked; ver. 5, "I will get me to the great men," and see if I can find them more pliable to the word and providence of God. I will speak to them, preach at court, in hopes to make some impression upon men of polite literature, but all in vain; for though they "know the way of the Lord, and the judgment of their God," yet they are too stiff to stoop to his government; "These have altogether broken the yoke, and burst the bonds;" they know their Master's will, but are resolved to have their own will, "to walk in the way of their heart, and in the sight of their eyes." They think themselves too goodly to be controlled, too big to be corrected, even by the sovereign Lord of all himself. They are for breaking even his bands in sunder, Ps. ii. 3. The poor are weak, the rich are wilful, and so neither do their duty.

Fourthly. Some particular sins instanced which they were most notoriously guilty of, and which cried most loudly to Heaven for vengeance. "Their transgressions," indeed, "were many," of many kinds, and oft repeated, "and their backslidings were increased;" they added to the number of them, and grew more and more impudent in them, ver. 6. But two sins especially were justly to be looked upon as unpardonable crimes: 1. Their spiritual whoredom; giving that honour to idols which is due to God only; "Thy children have forsaken me," to whom they were born and dedicated, and under whom they have been brought up, and they have "sworn by them that are no gods;" have made their appeals to them, as if they had been omniscient, and their proper judges. This is here put for all acts of religious worship due to God only, but with which they had honoured their idols. They have sworn to them, so it may be read; have joined themselves to them, and covenanted with them. They that forsake God make an ill change for those that are no gods. 2. Their corporal whoredom. Because they had forsaken God, and served idols, he gave them up to vile affections; and they that dishonoured him were left to dishonour themselves and their own families. They committed adultery most scandalously, without sense of shame or fear of punishment; for they "assembled themselves by troops in the harlots' houses," and did not blush to be seen by one another in the most scandalous places. So impudent and violent was their lust, so impatient of check, and so eager to be gratified, that they became perfect beasts, ver. 8, like high-fed horses, they "neighed every one after his neighbour's wife," ver. 8. Unbridled lusts make men like natural brute beasts, such monstrous, odious things are they. And that which aggravated their sin was, that it was the abuse of God's favours to them; when they were fed to the full, then their lusts grew thus furious. Fulness of bread was fuel to the fire of Sodom's lusts. Sine Cerere et Baccho friget Venus,—'Luxurious living feeds the flame of lust.' Fasting would help to tame the unruly evil that is so full of deadly poison, and bring the body into subjection.

Fifthly. A threatening of God's wrath against them for their wickedness, and the universal debauchery of their land.

1. The particular judgment that is threatened, ver. 6. A foreign enemy shall break in upon them, and get dominion over them, and shall lay all waste. Their country shall be as if it were overrun and perfectly mastered by wild beasts. This enemy shall be, 1st. Like a lion of the forest, so strong, so furious, so irresistible; and he shall slay them. 2nd. Like a wolf of the evening, that comes out at night when he is hungry to seek his prey, and is very fierce and ravenous. And the noise both of the lions' roaring and the wolves' howling is very hideous. 3rd. Like a leopard, that is very swift and very cruel, and withal careful not to miss his prey. The army of the enemy shall watch over their cities so strictly as to put the inhabitants to this sad dilemma: if they stay in, they are starved; if they stir out, they are stabbed; "Every one that goeth out thence shall be torn in pieces;" which intimates, that in many places the enemy gave no quarter. And all this bloody work is owing to the multitude of their transgressions. It is sin that makes the great slaughter.

2. An appeal to themselves concerning the equity of it; ver. 9, "Shall I not visit for these things?" Can you yourselves think that the God whose name is Jealous will let such idolatries go unpunished? or that a God of infinite purity will connive at such abominable uncleanness? These are things that must be reckoned for, else the honour of God's government cannot be maintained, nor his laws saved from contempt; but sinners will be tempted to think him altogether such a one as themselves, contrary to that conviction of their own consciences concerning the judgment of God which it is necessary should be supported, that they which do such things are worthy of death, Rom. i. 32. Observe, When God punisheth sin, he is said to visit for it, or inquire into it; for he weighs the cause before he passeth sentence. Sinners have reason to expect punishment upon the account of God's holiness, to which sin is highly offensive, as well as upon the account of his justice, to which it renders us obnoxious; which is intimated in that, "Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?" It is not only the word of God, but his soul, that takes vengeance; and he has national judgments wherewith to take vengeance for national sins. Such nations as this was cannot long go unpunished; "How shall I pardon thee for this?" ver. 7. Not but that those who have been guilty of these sins have found mercy with God as to their eternal state—Manasseh himself did, though so much accessory to the iniquity of those times; but nations, as such, being only rewardable and punishable in this life, it would not be for the glory of God to let a nation so very wicked as this pass without some manifest tokens of his displeasure.

x. 19, 20), where unquestionably the Jewish state is personified, leads to the same conclusion." That the prophet here speaks in the person of the state was thought by some of the older critics. The language of verse 22 may fairly form part of the same boldly poetic language.

iv. 23. "The earth" here may mean "the land," but not "the world." The prophet in his vision contemplated the ruin and havoc caused by war, and describes it in most forcible terms. He quotes from Gen. i. 2 the peculiar phrase, "without form and void," as our translators render it, but which should be rather "a desolation and a waste." The literal sense of verses 23—25 is given in verse 26.

iv. 30. Scarlet or its kindred hues, crimson and purple, seem to have been coveted as much by the Jewish women as by those of other nations. Yet tissues of that colour were very costly, and only the wealthy or the extravagant procured them. As a further detail of costly splendour, ornaments of gold are mentioned. These, like the robes of crimson, scarlet, &c., were no doubt usually of foreign

10 Go ye up upon her walls, and destroy;
But make not a full end:
Take away her battlements;
For they are not the LORD's.
11 For the house of Israel and the house of Judah
Have dealt very treacherously against me, saith the LORD.
12 They have belied the LORD,
And said, It is not he;
Neither shall evil come upon us;
Neither shall we see sword nor famine:
13 And the prophets shall become wind,
And the word is not in them:
Thus shall it be done unto them.
14 Wherefore thus saith the Lord GOD of hosts,
Because ye speak this word,
Behold, I will make my words in thy mouth fire,
And this people wood, and it shall devour them
15 Lo, I will bring a nation upon you from far,
O house of Israel, saith the LORD:
It is a mighty nation, it is an ancient nation,
A nation whose language thou knowest not,
Neither understandest what they say.
16 Their quiver is as an open sepulchre,
They are all mighty men.
17 And they shall eat up thine harvest, and thy bread,
Which thy sons and thy daughters should eat:
They shall eat up thy flocks and thine herds:
They shall eat up thy vines and thy fig trees:
They shall impoverish thy fenced cities,
Wherein thou trustedst, with the sword.
18 Nevertheless in those days, saith the LORD,
I will not make a full end with you.
19 And it shall come to pass, when ye shall say, [us?
Wherefore doeth the LORD our God all these things unto
Then shalt thou answer them,
Like as ye have forsaken me,
And served strange gods in your land,
So shall ye serve strangers in a land that is not your's.

We may observe in these verses, as before,

First. The sin of this people, upon which the commission signed against them is grounded. God disowns them, and dooms them to destruction, ver. 10. But is there not a cause? Yes; for, 1. They have deserted the law of God; ver. 11, "The house of Israel, and the house of Judah," though at variance with one another, yet both agreed to deal very treacherously against God. They forsook the worship of him, and therein violated their covenants with him; they revolted from him, and played the hypocrites with him. 2. They have defied the judgments of God, and given the lie to his threatenings in the mouth of his prophets, ver. 12, 13. They were often told that evil would certainly come upon them; they must expect some desolating judgments, sword or famine; but they were secure, and said, "We shall have peace, though we go on." For, 1st. They did not fear what God is. They belied him, and confronted the dictates even of natural light concerning him; for they said, It is not he; that is, he is not such a one as we have been made to believe he is; he doth not see, or not regard, or will not requite it; and therefore no evil shall come upon us. Multitudes are ruined by this; they are made to believe that God will not be so strict with them as his word saith he will. Nay, by this artifice Satan undid us all; "Ye shall not surely die;" ye shall not see sword or famine. Vain hopes of impunity are the deceitful support of all impiety. 2nd. They did not fear what God said. The prophets gave them fair warning, but they turned it off with a jest; they do but talk so because it is their trade. They are words of course, and words are but wind. It is not the word of the Lord that is in them, it is only the language of their melancholy fancy, or their ill-will to their country, because they are not preferred. Note, Impenitent sinners are not willing to own any thing to be the word of God that makes against them; that tends either to part them from or disquiet them in their sins. They threaten the prophets, "They shall become wind," shall pass away unregarded. And thus shall it be done unto them; what they threatened against us we will inflict upon them. Do they frighten us with famine? Let them be fed with the bread of affliction; so Micaiah was, 1 Kin. xxii. 27. Do they tell us of the sword? Let them perish by the sword, ch. ii. 30. Thus their mocking and misusing God's messengers filled the measure of their iniquity.

Secondly. The punishment of this people for their sin.

1. The threatenings they laughed at shall be executed; ver. 14, "Because ye speak this word" of contempt concerning the prophets, and the word in their mouths, therefore God will put honour upon them and their words; for not one iota or tittle of them shall fall to the ground, 1 Sam. iii. 19. Here God turns to the prophet Jeremiah, who had been thus bantered, and perhaps had been a little uneasy at it; "Behold, I will make my words in thy mouth fire." God owns them for his words, though men denied them; and will as surely make them to take effect as the fire consumes combustible matter that is in its way; "The word shall be fire, and the people wood." Sinners, by sin, make themselves fuel to that wrath of God which is "revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men," in the Scripture. The word of God will certainly be too hard for those that contend with it; they shall break that will not bow before it.

2. The enemy they thought themselves in no danger of shall be brought upon them. God gives them their commission; ver. 10, "Go ye up upon her walls;" mount them, trample upon them, tread them down. Walls of stone, before the Divine commission, shall be but mud walls. Having made yourselves masters of the walls, you may destroy at pleasure; you may "take away her battlements," and leave the fenced, fortified cities to lie open; for her battlements are not the Lord's; he doth not own them, and therefore will not protect and fortify them. They were not erected in his fear, nor with a dependence upon him. The people have trusted to them more than to God, and therefore they are not his. When the city is filled with sin, God will not patronize the fortifications of it, and then they are paper walls. What can defend us, when he who is our defence, and the defender of all our defences, is departed from us? Num. xiv. 9. What is not of God cannot stand, not stand long, not stand us in any stead.

3. What dreadful work these invaders should make is here described; ver. 15, "Lo, I will bring a nation upon you, O house of Israel." Note, God has all nations at his command, doth what he pleaseth with them, and makes what use he pleaseth of them. And sometimes he is pleased to make the nations of the earth, the heathen nations, a scourge to the house of Israel, when that is become a hypocritical nation. This nation of the Chaldeans is here said to be a remote nation; it is brought upon them from afar, and therefore will make the greater spoil, and the longer stay, that they may pay themselves well for so long a march. A nation that thou hast had no commerce with by reason of their distance, and therefore canst not expect to find favour with. God can bring trouble upon us from places and causes very remote. It is a mighty nation, that there is no making head against; an ancient nation, that value themselves upon their antiquity, and will therefore be the more haughty and imperious; it is "a nation whose language thou knowest not." They spoke the Syriac tongue, which the Jews at that time were not acquainted with; as appears, 2 Kin. xviii. 26. The difference of language would make it the more difficult to treat with them of peace: compare this with the threatening, Deu. xxviii. 49, which it seems to have a reference to; for the law and the prophets exactly agree. They are well armed; "Their quiver is as an open sepulchre;" that is, their arrows shall fly so thick, hit so sure, and wound so deep, that they shall be reckoned to breathe nothing but death and slaughter. They are able-bodied, all effective, mighty men, ver. 16; and when they have made themselves masters of the country they shall devour all before them, and reckon all their own that they can lay their hands on, ver. 17. 1st. They shall strip the country, shall not only sustain, but surfeit their soldiers with the rich products of this fruitful land. "They shall" not store up, (then it might possibly have been retrieved,) but "eat up thine harvest" in the field, "and thy bread" in the house, "which thy sons and thy daughters should eat." Note, What we have we have for our families, and it is a comfort to see our sons and daughters eating that which we have taken care and pains for; but a grievous vexation to see it devoured by strangers and enemies; to see their camps victualled with our stores, while those that are dear to us are perishing for want of it. This also is according to the curse of the law; Deu. xxviii. 33, "They shall eat up thy flocks and thy herds," out of which thou hast taken sacrifices for thine idols. They shall not leave thee the fruit of "thy vines and thy fig-trees." 2nd. They shall starve the towns; "They shall impoverish thy fenced cities," (and what fence against poverty when it comes like an armed man?) those cities wherein thou trustedst to be a protection to the country. Note, It is just with you to impoverish that which we make our confidence. They shall impoverish them with the sword, cutting off all provisions from coming to them, and intercepting trade and commerce, which will impoverish even fenced cities.

Thirdly. An intimation of the tender compassion God has yet for them. The enemy is commissioned to destroy and lay waste, but must not make a full end, ver. 10. Though they make a great slaughter, yet some must be left to live; and a great spoil, yet something must be left to live upon, for God hath said it, ver. 18, with a non obstante,—'a nevertheless,' to the present desolation; even in those days, as dismal as they are, "I will not make a full end with you;" and if God will not, the enemy shall not. God has mercy in store for this people, and therefore sets bounds to this desolating judgment; "Hitherto it shall come, and no farther."

Fourthly. The justification of God in these proceedings against them. As he will appear to be gracious in not making a full end with them, so he will appear to be righteous in coming so near it, and will have it acknowledged that he has done them no wrong, ver. 19. Observe, 1. A reason demanded, insolently demanded, by the people for these judgments. They will say, "Wherefore doth the Lord our God do all this unto us?" What provocation have we given him, or what quarrel has he with us? As if against such a sinful nation there did not appear cause enough of action. Note, Unhumbled hearts are ready to charge God with injustice in their afflictions, and pretend they are to seek for the cause of them, when it is written in the forehead of them. But, 2. Here is a reason presently assigned. The prophet is instructed what answer to give them, for God will be justified when he speaks, though he speaks with never so much terror. He must tell them that God doth this against them for what they have done against him, and they may, if they please, read their sin in their punishment. Do not they know very well that they have forsaken God, and therefore can they think it strange if he has forsaken them? Have they forgot how often they served strange gods in their own land, that good land, in the abundance of the fruits of which they ought to have served God with gladness of heart? and therefore is it not just with God to make them serve strangers in a strange land, where they can call nothing their own, as he had threatened to do? Deu. xxviii. 47, 48. They that are fond of strangers, to strangers let them go.

20 Declare this in the house of Jacob,
And publish it in Judah, saying, [ing;
21 Hear now this, O foolish people, and without understand-
Which have eyes, and see not;
Which have ears, and hear not:
22 Fear ye not me? saith the LORD:
Will ye not tremble at my presence,
Which have placed the sand for the bound of the sea
By a perpetual decree, that it cannot pass it:
And though the waves thereof toss themselves, yet can they not prevail;
Though they roar, yet can they not pass over it?
23 But this people hath a revolting and a rebellious heart;

make, for not only was gold not found in Palestine, but workers in gold seem to have been few. The expression, "rentest thy face (or rather eyes) with painting," refers to the custom still prevalent in the East, and not unknown in the West, of painting or staining the edges of the eyelids, to give the eyes a large and lustrous look. This is what Jezebel did (2 Kings ix. 30). The Hebrew term for "rentest," i.e., didst rend, is correctly translated, its meaning being to divide, [illegible] or widen. The general sense of the whole verse is that Jerusalem will employ all her arts in vain to retain her friends when the day of her calamity arrives. Who the friends are is not stated, but doubtless the Egyptians were among them, and the last words would include even the Babylonian invaders.

v. 1. "I will pardon it" means will pardon Jerusalem. The language of the verse reminds us of that which preceded the fall of Sodom, in Gen. xviii. 23, &c.

v. 6. For "wolf of the evenings," i.e., the wolf which comes forth

They are revolted and gone.
24 Neither say they in their heart,
Let us now fear the LORD our God, [season:
That giveth rain, both the former and the latter, in his
He reserveth unto us the appointed weeks of the harvest.

The prophet, having reproved them for sin, and threatened the judgments of God against them, is here sent to them again upon another errand, which he must publish in Judah. The purport of it is to persuade them to fear God, which would be an effectual principle of their reformation, as the want of that fear had been at the bottom of their apostacy.

First. He complains of the shameful stupidity of this people, and their bent to backslide from God, speaking as if he knew not what course to take with them. For,

1. Their understandings were darkened, and unapt to admit the rays of the Divine light. They are a "foolish people, and without understanding," they apprehend not the mind of God, though never so plainly discovered to them by the written word, by his prophets, and by his providence, ver. 21, "They have eyes but they see not, ears but they hear not," like the idols which they made and worshipped, Ps. cxv. 5, 6, 8. One would have thought they took notice of things, but really they did not; they had intellectual faculties and capacities, but they did not employ and improve them as they ought. Herein they disappointed the expectations of all their neighbours, who, observing what excellent means of knowledge they had, concluded, "Surely they are a wise and an understanding people," Deu. iv. 6, and yet really they are a "foolish people, and without understanding." Note, We cannot judge of men by the advantages and opportunities they enjoy. There are those that sit in darkness in a land of light, and live in sin even in a holy land; that are bad in the best places.

2. Their wills were stubborn and unapt to submit to the rules of the Divine law; ver. 23, "This people hath a revolting and a rebellious heart;" and no wonder, when they were "foolish and without understanding," Ps. lxxxii. 5. Nay, it is the corrupt bias of the will that bribes and besots the understanding; none so blind as those that will not see. The character of this people is the true character of all people by nature, till the grace of God has wrought a change: we are foolish, slow of understanding, and apt to mistake and forget; yet that is not the worst, we have "a revolting and a rebellious heart," a carnal mind, that is enmity against God, and is not in subjection to his law; not only revolting from him by a rooted aversion to that which is good, but rebellious against him by a strong inclination to that which is evil. Observe, The revolting heart is a rebellious one; they that withdraw from their allegiance to God stick not there, but, by siding in with sin and Satan, take up arms against him. "They are revolted and gone." The revolting heart will produce a revolting life; they are gone, and they will go, (so it may be read,) now nothing will be restrained from them, Gen. xi. 6.

Secondly. He ascribed this to the want of the fear of God. When he observes them to be without understanding, he asks, "Fear ye not me, saith the Lord, and will ye not tremble at my presence?" ver. 22. If you would but keep up an awe of God, you would be more observant of what he saith to you; and did you but understand yourselves better you would be more under the commanding rule of God's fear. When he observes that "they are revolted and gone," he adds this as the root and cause of their apostacy, ver. 24, "Neither say they in their hearts, Let us now fear the Lord our God." Therefore so many bad thoughts come into their minds, and hurry them to that which is evil, because they will not admit and entertain good thoughts, and particularly not this good thought, "Let us now fear the Lord our God." It is true it is God's work to put his fear into our hearts, but it is our work to stir up ourselves to fear him, and to fasten upon those considerations which are proper to affect us with a holy awe of him; and it is because we do not do this that our hearts are so destitute of his fear as they are, and so apt to revolt and rebel.

Thirdly. He suggests some of those things which are proper to possess us with a holy fear of God.

1. We must fear the Lord and his greatness, ver. 22. Upon this account he demands our fear: shall we not tremble at his presence, and be afraid of affronting him, or trifling with him, who in the kingdom of nature and providence gives such incontestable proofs of his almighty power and sovereign dominion. Here is one instance given of very many that might be given: he keeps the sea within compass; though the tides flow with a mighty strength twice every day, and if they should flow on a while would drown the world; though in a storm the billows rise high and dash to the shore with incredible force and fury, yet they are under check; they return, they retire, and no harm is done. "This is the Lord's doing," and it would be marvellous if it were not common in our eyes. He has "placed the sand for the bound of the sea," not only for a mere-stone to mark out how far it may come and where it must stop, but as a bound or fence to put a stop to it. A wall of sand shall be as effectual as a wall of brass to check the flowing waves, when God is pleased to make it so; nay, that is chosen rather to teach us that a soft answer, like the soft sand, turns away wrath, and quiets the foaming rage, when grievous words, like hard rocks, do but exasperate and make the waters cast forth so much the more mire and dirt. This bound is placed "by a perpetual decree," 'by an ordinance of antiquity,' so some read it; and then it sends us as far back as the creation of the world, when God divided between the sea and the dry land, and fixed marches between them, Gen. i. 9, 10; which is elegantly described, Ps. civ. 6, &c., and Job xxxviii. 8, &c.; or to the period of Noah's flood, when God promised that he would never drown the world again, Gen. ix. 11; an ordinance of perpetuity, so our translation takes it. It is a perpetual decree; it has had its effect all along to this day, and shall still continue, till day and night come to an end. This perpetual decree the waters of the sea cannot pass over or break through. "Though the waves thereof toss themselves," as the troubled sea doth when it cannot rest, "yet can they not prevail;" "though they roar" and rage as if they were vexed at the check given them, "yet can they not pass over it." Now this is a good reason why we should fear God; for, 1st By this we see that he is a God of almighty power and universal sovereignty, and therefore to be feared and had in reverence. 2nd. This shews us how easily he could drown the world again, and how much we continually lie at his mercy, and therefore we should be afraid of making him our enemy. 3rd. Even the unruly waves of the sea observe his decree, and retreat at his check; and shall not we then? Why are our hearts revolting and rebellious, when the sea neither revolts nor rebels?

2. We must fear the Lord and his goodness, Hos. iii. 5. The instances of this, as of the former, are fetched from God's common providence, ver. 24; we must fear the Lord our God, that is, we must worship him and give him glory, and be always in care to keep ourselves in his love, because he is continually doing us good. He gives us "both the former and the latter" rain; the former a little after seedness, the latter a little before harvest, and both in their season; and by this means "he reserves to us the appointed weeks of harvest." Harvest is reckoned by weeks, because in a few weeks enough is gathered to serve for sustenance the year round. The weeks of harvest are appointed us by the promise of God, that seedtime and harvest shall not fail; and in performance of that promise they are reserved to us by the Divine providence, otherwise we should come short of them. In harvest mercies, therefore, God is to be acknowledged, his power, and goodness, and faithfulness, for they all come from him. And it is a good reason why we should fear him, that we may keep ourselves in his love, because we have such a necessary dependence upon him. The fruitful seasons were witnesses for God, even to the heathen world, sufficient to leave them inexcusable in their contempt of him, Acts xiv. 17; and yet the Jews, who had the written word to explain their testimony by, were not wrought upon to fear the Lord, though it appears how much it is our interest to do so.

25 Your iniquities have turned away these things,
And your sins have withholden good things from you.
26 For among my people are found wicked men:
They lay wait, as he that setteth snares;
They set a trap, they catch men
27 As a cage is full of birds,
So are their houses full of deceit:
Therefore they are become great, and waxen rich.
28 They are waxen fat, they shine:
Yea, they overpass the deeds of the wicked:
They judge not the cause,
The cause of the fatherless, yet they prosper;
And the right of the needy do they not judge.
29 Shall I not visit for these things? saith the LORD:
Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?
30 A wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land;
31 The prophets prophesy falsely,
And the priests bear rule by their means;
And my people love to have it so:
And what will ye do in the end thereof?

Here, First. The prophet shews them what mischief their sins had done them; they "have turned away these things," ver. 25, namely, the former and the latter rain, which they used to have in due season, ver. 24, but had of late been withheld, ch. iii. 3, by reason of which the appointed weeks of harvest had sometimes disappointed them. It is your sin that has withholden good from you, when God was ready to bestow it upon you. Note, It is sin that stops the current of God's favour to us, and deprives us of the blessings we used to receive. It is that that makes the heavens as brass, and the earth as iron.

Secondly. He shews them how great their sins were, how heinous and very provoking. When they had forsaken the worship of the true God, even moral honesty was lost among them; "Among my people are found wicked men," ver. 26; some of the worst of men, and so much the worse they were, in that they were found among God's people.

1. They were spiteful and malicious. Such are properly wicked men, men that delight in doing mischief; they were found, that is, caught in the very act of their wickedness. As hunters or fowlers lay snares for their game, so did they lie in wait to catch men, and made a sport of it, and took as much pleasure in it as if they had been entrapping beasts or birds. They contrived ways of doing mischief to good people, whom they hated for their goodness, especially to those that faithfully reproved them, Isa. xxix. 21; or to those that stood in the way of their preferment, or that they apprehended had affronted them, or done them a diskindness, or to those whose estates they coveted; so Jezebel ensnared Naboth for his vineyard; nay, they did mischief for mischief sake.

2. They were false and treacherous; ver. 27, "As a cage" or coop "is full of birds," and of food for them, to fatten them for the table, "so are their houses full of deceit," that is, of wealth gotten by fraudulent practices, or of arts and methods of defrauding. All the business of their families is done with deceit; whoever deals with them they will cheat them if they can, which is easily done by those who make no conscience of what they say and do. Herein "they overpass the deeds of the wicked," ver. 28. Those that act by deceit, with a colour of law and justice, do more mischief perhaps than those wicked men, ver. 26, that carried all before them by open force and violence; or, they are worse than the heathen themselves, yea, the worst of them. And, would you think it, they prosper in these wicked courses? and therefore their hearts are hardened in them. They are greedy of the world, because they find it flows in upon them, and they stick not at any wickedness in pursuit of it, because they find it is so far from hindering their prosperity, that it furthers it. "They are become great" in the world, "they are waxen rich," and thrive upon it. They have wherewithal to make provision for the flesh, to fulfil all the lusts of it, to which they are very indulgent, so that they are waxen fat with living at ease, and bathing themselves in all the delights of sense; they are sleek and smooth, and shine; they look fair and gay, and every body admires them. And they pass by matters of evil, (so some read the following words,) that is, they escape the evils which one would expect their sins should bring upon them, "They are not in trouble as other men," much less as ill men, Ps. lxxiii. 5, &c.

3. When they were grown great, and had got power in their hands, they did not do that good with it which they ought to have done, "They judge not the cause, the cause of the fatherless, and the right of the needy." The fatherless are often needy, always need assistance and advice, and advantage is taken of their helpless condition to do them an injury. Who should succour them then but the great and rich? What have men wealth for but to do good with it? But these would take no cognizance of any such distressed cases; they had not so much sense of justice or compassion for the injured. Or if they did concern themselves in the cause, it was not to do right, but to protect them that did wrong. And "yet they prosper" still; God layeth not folly to them. Certainly, then, the things of this world are not the best things, for oftentimes the worst men have the most of them; yet we are not to think that because they prosper God allows of their practices. No; though sentence against their evil works be not executed speedily, it will be executed.

4. There was a general corruption of all orders and degrees of men among them; ver. 30, 31, "A wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land." The degeneracy of such a people, so privileged and advanced, was a wonderful thing, and to be admired. How could they ever break through so many obli-at dusk, some follow the marginal rendering, "wolf of the deserts." Both translations are possible, and both describe well-known habits of the animal. Lions are no longer found in Syria, but wolves and leopards both are.

v. 8. The word translated "in the morning" is obscure; the Syriac has "they were lascivious," and Ewald gives a similar explanation.

v. 15 The Chaldeans were a mighty nation and of very ancient origin, and among them was current a language very different from that of the Hebrews. The discoveries made in regard to the languages spoken in Babylonia show that while the Jews might soon understand one of them, there was another at least so peculiar as to require protracted study. It is important to know this fact, because it confirms the view that the Chaldeans were of Cushite origin, as we infer from Gen. x. 6—12.

v. 19. "When ye shall say" is equivalent to "when the Hebrews gations? It was a horrible thing, and to be detested, and the consequences of it dreaded. To frighten ourselves from sin, let us call it a horrible thing. Why what was the matter? In short this: 1st. The leaders misled the people, the prophets prophesy falsely, counterfeited a commission from heaven, when they were factors for hell. Religion is never more dangerously attacked than under colour and pretence of Divine revelation. But why did not the priests, who had power in their hands for that purpose, restrain these false prophets? Alas! instead of doing that they made use of them as the tools of their ambition and tyranny; they "bear rule by their means," they supported themselves in their grandeur and wealth, their laziness and luxury, their impositions and oppressions, by the help of the false prophets and their interest in the people. Thus they were in a combination against every thing that was good, and strengthened one another's hands in evil. 2nd. The people were well enough pleased to be so misled; They are my people, saith God, and should have stood up for me, and borne their testimony against the wickedness of their priests and prophets, but they love to have it so. If the priests and prophets will let them alone in their sins, they will give them no disturbance in theirs. They love to be ridden with a loose rein, and like those rulers very well that will not restrain their lusts, and those teachers that will not reprove them.

Thirdly. He shews them how fatal the consequences of this would certainly be. Let them consider,

1. What the reckoning would be for their wickedness; ver. 29, "Shall not I visit for these things," as before, ver. 9. Sometimes mercy rejoiceth against judgment; "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" Here judgment is reasoning against mercy, "Shall I not visit?" We are sure Infinite Wisdom knows how to accommodate the matter between them. The manner of the expression is very emphatical, and speaks, 1st. The certainty and necessity of God's judgments; "Shall not my soul be avenged?" Yes, without doubt vengeance will come, it must come, if the sinner repents not. 2nd. The justice and equity of God's judgments. He appeals to the sinner's own conscience. Do not they deserve to be punished that have been guilty of such abominations? Shall he not be avenged on such a nation, such a wicked, provoking nation as this?

2. What the direct tendency of their wickedness was; "What will ye do in the end thereof?" That is, 1st. What a pitch of wickedness will you come to at last! "What will you do?" What will ye not do that is base and wicked? What will this grow to? You will certainly grow worse and worse, till you have filled up the measure of your iniquity. 2nd. What a pit of destruction will you come to at last! When things are brought to such a pass as this, as nothing can be expected from you but a deluge of sin, so nothing can be expected from God but a deluge of wrath, and what will ye do when that comes? Note, Those that walk in ill ways would do well to consider the tendency of them both to greater sin and utter ruin. An end will come, the end of a wicked life will come, when it will be all called over again, and without doubt will be bitterness in the latter end.

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter, as before, we have, I. A prophecy of the invading of the land of Judah and the besieging of Jerusalem by the Chaldean army, ver. 1—6; with the spoils they should make of the country, ver. 9; and the terror which all should be seized with on that occasion, ver. 22—26. II. An account of those sins of Judah and Jerusalem which provoked God to bring this desolating judgment upon them. Their oppression, ver. 7; their contempt of the word of God, ver. 10—12; their worldliness, ver. 13; the treachery of their prophets, ver. 14; their impudence in sin, ver. 15; their obstinacy against reproofs, ver. 18, 19; which made their sacrifices unacceptable to him, ver. 20; and for which he gave them up to ruin, ver. 21; but tried them first, ver. 27; and then rejected them as irreclaimable, ver. 28—30. III. Good counsel given them in the midst of all this, but in vain, ver. 8, 16, 17.

O YE children of Benjamin, gather yourselves
To flee out of the midst of Jerusalem
And blow the trumpet in Tekoa,
And set up a sign of fire in Beth-haccerem
For evil appeareth out of the north,
And great destruction.
2 I have likened the daughter of Zion
To a comely and delicate woman
3 The shepherds with their flocks shall come unto her;
They shall pitch their tents against her round about;
They shall feed every one in his place.
4 Prepare ye war against her;
Arise, and let us go up at noon.
Woe unto us! for the day goeth away,
For the shadows of the evening are stretched out.
5 Arise, and let us go by night,
And let us destroy her palaces.
6 For thus hath the LORD of hosts said,
Hew ye down trees,
And cast a mount against Jerusalem:
This is the city to be visited;
She is wholly oppression in the midst of her.
7 As a fountain casteth out her waters,
So she casteth out her wickedness:
Violence and spoil is heard in her;
Before me continually is grief and wounds.
8 Be thou instructed, O Jerusalem,
Lest my soul depart from thee;
Lest I make thee desolate, a land not inhabited

Here is, First. Judgment threatened against Judah and Jerusalem. That city, that country, were at this time secure, and under no apprehension of danger; they saw no cloud gathering, but every thing looked safe and serene. But the prophet tells them they should shortly be invaded by a foreign power; an army should be brought against them from the north, which should lay all waste, and should cause not only a general consternation, but a general desolation. It is here foretold,

1. That the alarm of this should be loud and terrible. This is represented, ver. 1. The children of Benjamin, in which tribe part of Jerusalem lay, are here called to shift for their own safety in the country; for the city, to which it was first thought advisable for them to flee, ch. iv. 5, 6, would soon be made too hot for them, and they would find it the wisest course to flee out of the midst of it. It is common in public frights for people to think any place safer than that where they are; and therefore those in the city are for shifting into the country, in hopes there to escape out of danger; and those in the country are for shifting into the city, in hopes there to make head against the danger; but it is all in vain when evil pursueth sinners with commission. They are told to send the alarm into the country, and to do what they could for their own safety. "Blow the trumpet in Tekoa," a city which lay twelve miles north from Jerusalem. Let them be stirred up to stand upon their guard. "Set up a sign of fire," that is, kindle the beacons, "in Beth-haccerem," the 'house of the vineyard,' which lay on a hill between Jerusalem and Tekoa. Prepare to make a vigorous resistance, for the "evil appeareth out of the north." This may be taken ironically. Betake yourselves to the best methods you can think of for your own preservation, but all shall be in vain; for when you have done your best it will be a great destruction, for it is in vain to contend with God's judgments.

2. That the attempt upon them should be bold and formidable, and such as they should be a very unequal match for. 1st. See what the daughter of Zion is, on whom the assault is made. She is likened to a comely and delicate woman, ver. 2, bred up in everything that is nice and soft, that will not set so much as the "sole of her foot to the ground for tenderness and delicacy," Deu. xxviii. 56, nor suffer the winds to blow upon her; and being not accustomed to hardship, she will be the less able either to resist the enemy,—for those that make war must endure hardness,—or to bear the destruction with that patience that is necessary to make it any thing tolerable. The more we indulge ourselves in the pleasures of this life the more we disfit ourselves for the troubles of this life. 2nd. See what the daughter of Babylon is, by whom the assault is made. The generals and their armies are compared to shepherds and their flocks, ver. 3; in such numbers and in such order did they come; the soldiers following their leaders as the sheep their shepherds. The daughter of Zion dwelt at home, so some read it, expecting to be courted with love, but was invaded with fury. This comparing of the enemies to shepherds inclines me to embrace another reading which some give of ver. 2. The daughter of Zion is like a comely pasture-ground, and a delicate land, which invites the shall say." The Lord is the speaker, and he tells Jeremiah what he is to say when the people ask the reason of their calamities. For serving foreign gods in their own land, they shall serve foreigners abroad.

v. 24. There is now really but one rainy season in Palestine, but it includes the early rains of the autumn and winter and the later rains of March and April. The weeks of harvest vary with the locality, commencing in May in the Jordan valley, and continuing in less favoured situations until June.

v. 27. Upon this verse Dr. Kitto has the following note:—"There is no intimation in Scripture that Hebrews kept singing-birds in cages, although it might be hazardous from the mere silence of Scripture to say that they did not. That nothing of the kind is here intended is evident from the fact that the cage is described as 'full,' which would not be the case if the birds were kept to amuse by their singing. From this it is possible that the cage was one in which birds intended for food were kept to be fattened, or what we shepherds to bring their flocks thither to graze; and as the shepherds easily make themselves masters of an open field that—as was usual then in some parts—lies common, owned by none, pitch their tents in it, and their flocks presently eat it bare, so shall the Chaldean army easily break in upon the land of Judah, force for themselves a free quarter where they please, and in a little time devour all. For the farther illustration of this he shews,

First. How God shall commission them to make this destruction even of the holy land and the holy city, that were his peculiar. It is he that saith, ver. 4, "Prepare ye war against her;" for he is the Lord of hosts, that hath all hosts at his command, and he hath said, ver. 6, "Hew ye down trees, and cast a mount against Jerusalem," in order to the attacking of it. The Chaldeans have great power against Judah and Jerusalem, and yet they have no power but what is given them from above. God has marked out Jerusalem for destruction; he hath said, "This is the city to be visited," visited in wrath, visited by the Divine justice, and this is the time of her visitation. Those that are careless and secure in sinful ways, the day is coming when they will be visited.

Secondly. How they shall animate themselves and one another to execute that commission. God's counsels being against Jerusalem, which cannot be altered or disannulled, the councils of war which the enemies held are made to agree with his counsels. God having said, "Prepare war against her," their determinations are made subservient to his; and notwithstanding the distance of place, and the many difficulties that lie in the way, it is soon resolved, nemine contradicente,—'unanimously,' "Arise, and let us go." Note, It is good to see how the counsel and decree of God is pursued and executed in the devices and designs of men, even theirs that know him not, Isa. x. 6, 7. In this campaign, 1*st.* They resolve to be very expeditious. They have no sooner resolved upon it, but they address themselves to it. It shall never be said they left any thing to be done towards it to morrow which they could do to day. "Arise, let us go up at noon," though it be in the heat of the day; nay, ver. 5, "Arise, let us go by night," though it be in the dark; nothing shall hinder them, they are resolved to lose no time. They are described as men in care to make dispatch; ver. 4, "Woe unto us, for the day goes away," and we are not going on with our work. "The shadows of the evening are stretched out," and we sit still, and slip the opportunity. O that we were thus eager in our spiritual work and warfare! thus afraid of losing time, or an opportunity in taking the kingdom of heaven by violence. It is folly to trifle when we have an eternal salvation to work out, and the enemies of that salvation to fight against. 2*nd.* They doubt not but to be very successful. "Let us go up" and let us destroy her palaces, and make ourselves masters of the wealth that is in them. It was not that they might fulfil God's counsels, but that they might fill their own treasures, that they were thus eager, yet God thereby served his own purposes.

Secondly. The cause of this judgment assigned. It is all for their wickedness, they have brought it upon themselves; they must bear it, for they must bear the blame of it. They are thus oppressed, because they have been oppressors; they have dealt hardly with one another, each in their turns, as they have had power and advantage, and now the enemy shall come and deal hardly with them all. This sin of oppression, and violence, and wrong doing, is here charged upon them, 1. As a national sin, ver. 6; therefore this city is to be visited. It is time to make inquisition, for "she is wholly oppression in the midst of her." All orders and degrees of men, from the prince on the throne to the meanest master of a shop, were oppressive to those that were under them. Look which way you will, and there were causes for complaints of this kind. 2. As a sin that was become in a manner natural to them, ver. 7. She casts out wickedness, in all the instances of malice and mischievousness, "as a fountain casteth out her waters." so plentifully and constantly; the streams are bitter and poisonous like the fountain. The waters out of the fountain will not be restrained, but will find or force their way; nor will they be checked by laws or conscience in their violent proceedings. This is fitly applied to the corrupt heart of man in his natural state; that casts out wickedness, one evil imagination or other, as a fountain casts out her waters, naturally and easily; it is always flowing and yet always full. 3. As that which was become a constant practice with them; "violence and spoil is heard in her." The cry of it is come up before God as that of Sodom: "Before me continually is grief and wounds." The complaint of those that find themselves aggrieved, being unjustly wounded in their bodies or spirits, in their estates or reputation. Note, He that is the common Parent of mankind regards and resents, and sooner or later will revenge, the mischiefs and wrongs that men do to one another.

Thirdly. The counsel given them how to prevent this judgment. Fair warning is given now upon the whole matter; "Be thou instructed, O Jerusalem," ver. 8; receive the instruction given thee both by the law of God and by his prophets; be wise at length for thyself. They knew very well what they had been instructed to do, nothing remained but to do it; for till then they cannot be said to be instructed. The reason for this counsel is taken from the inevitable ruin they run upon, if they refused to comply with the instructions given them. "Lest my soul depart," or be disjointed from thee. This intimates what a tender affection and concern God had had for them; his very soul had been joined to them, and nothing but sin could disjoin it. Note, 1. The God of mercy is loath to depart even from a provoking people, and is earnest with them, by true repentance and reformation, to prevent things coming to that extremity. 2. Their case is very miserable from whom God's soul is disjoined. It intimates the loss, not only of their outward blessings, but of those comforts and favours which are the more immediate and peculiar tokens of his love and presence. Compare this with that dreadful word, Heb. x. 38, "If any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him." 3. Those whom God forsakes are certainly undone. When God's soul departs from Jerusalem, she soon becomes desolate and uninhabited, Mat. xxiii. 38.

9 Thus saith the LORD of hosts,
They shall throughly glean the remnant of Israel as a vine:
Turn back thine hand as a grapegatherer into the baskets.
10 To whom shall I speak,
And give warning, that they may hear?
Behold, their ear is uncircumcised,
And they cannot hearken:
Behold, the word of the LORD is unto them a reproach;
They have no delight in it.
11 Therefore I am full of the fury of the LORD;
I am weary with holding in:
I will pour it out upon the children abroad,
And upon the assembly of young men together:
For even the husband with the wife shall be taken,
The aged with him that is full of days.
12 And their houses shall be turned unto others,
With their fields and wives together:
For I will stretch out my hand
Upon the inhabitants of the land, saith the LORD.
13 For from the least of them even unto the greatest of them
Every one is given to covetousness;
And from the prophet even unto the priest
Every one dealeth falsely.
14 They have healed also the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly,
Saying, Peace, peace;
When there is no peace.
15 Were they ashamed when they had committed abomination?
Nay, they were not at all ashamed,
Neither could they blush:
Therefore they shall fall among them that fall:
At the time that I visit them they shall be cast down, saith the LORD.
16 Thus saith the LORD,
Stand ye in the ways, and see,
And ask for the old paths,
Where is the good way, and walk therein,
And ye shall find rest for your souls.
But they said, We will not walk therein.
17 Also I set watchmen over you,
Saying, Hearken to the sound of the trumpet.
But they said, We will not hearken.

GRAPE-GATHERERS AND BASKETS.

The heads of this paragraph are the very same with those of the last; for precept must be upon precept, and line upon line.

First. The ruin of Judah and Jerusalem is here threatened. We had before the haste which the Chaldean army made to the war, ver. 4, 5. Now here we have the havoc made by the war. How lamentable are the desolations here described! The enemy shall so long quarter among them, and be so insatiable in their thirst after blood and treasure, that they shall seize all they can meet with, and what escapes them one time shall fall into their hands another; ver. 9, "They shall thoroughly glean the remnant of Israel as a vine." As the grape-gatherer, that is resolved to leave none behind, still turns back his hand into the baskets to put more in, till he has gathered all, so shall they be picked up by the enemy, though dispersed, though hid, and none of them shall escape their eye and hand. Perhaps this people, being given to covetousness, ver. 13, had not observed the law of God, which forbade them to "glean all their grapes," Lev. x. 19, and now they themselves shall be in like manner thoroughly gleaned, and shall either fall by the sword, or go into captivity. This is explained, ver. 11, 12, where God's fury and his hand are said to be poured out and stretched out, in the fury and by the hand of the Chaldeans; for even wicked men are often made use of as God's hand, Ps. xvii. 14; and in their anger we may see God angry. Now see on whom the fury is poured out in full vials. Upon the children abroad or in the streets where they are playing, Zec. viii. 5, or whither they run out innocently to look about them; the sword of the merciless Chaldeans shall not spare them, ch. ix. 21. The children perish in the calamity which the fathers' sins have procured. The execution shall likewise reach the assembly of young men, their merry meetings, their clubs which they keep up to strengthen one another's hands in wickedness, they shall be cut off together. Nor shall those only fall into the enemies' hands that meet for lewdness, ch. v. 7, but "even the husband with the wife shall be taken," these two in bed together, and neither left, but both taken prisoners. And as they have no compassion for the weak but fair sex, so they have none for the decrepid but venerable age. The old with the full of days, whose deaths can contribute no more to their safety than their lives to their service, that are not in a capacity to do them either good or harm, yet they shall be either cut off or carried off. Their houses shall then be turned to others, ver. 12, the conquerors shall dwell in their habitations, use their goods, and live upon their call a pen; and it was thus understood by the Targum, which renders 'a house or place of fattening.' It may, however, signify a cage in which birds taken by snares or hawking were put till it was full; and the Seventy, by rendering it 'a snare,' seem to understand that it was a kind of decoy, in which birds were put to ensnare others, until, with those already in it and those thus taken, it became full. One of these two last senses seems favoured by the context, and by the manner in which the illustration is applied. The word rendered 'cage' is the same as the 'basket' of Amos viii. 1, 2; and in fact the cages used in the East are a sort of baskets, usually made from the mid-rib of the palm-leaf." The idea that the cage is really a snare or trap, made of wicker-work, seems to be the correct one.

vi. 1. The "children of Benjamin" here are the residents of Jerusalem. Tekoa was twelve Roman miles south of Jerusalem and six from Bethlehem. It stood upon a hill near the so-called "wil-stores. Their fields and wives shall fall together into their hands, as was threatened, Deu. xxviii. 28, 30, &c. For God "stretcheth out his hand upon the inhabitants of the land," and none can go out of the reach of it. Now as to this denunciation of God's wrath, 1. The prophet justifies himself in preaching thus terribly, for herein he dealt faithfully; ver. 11, "And I am full of the fury of the Lord," full of the thoughts and apprehensions of it, and am carried out with a powerful impulse, by the spirit of prophecy, to speak of it thus vehemently. He took no delight in threatening, nor was it any pleasure to him with such sermons as these to make those about him uneasy; but he could not contain himself, he was "weary with holding in." He suppressed it as long as he could, as long as he durst, but he was so "full of power by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts," that he must speak, whether they will hear or whether they will forbear. Note, When ministers preach the terrors of the Lord according to the Scripture, we have no reason to be displeased at them; for they are but messengers, and must deliver their message, pleasing or unpleasing. 2. He condemns the false prophets, who preached plausibly, for therein they flattered people and dealt unfaithfully; ver. 13, 14, "The priest and the prophet," that should be their watchmen and monitors, have dealt falsely, have not been true to their trust, nor told the people their faults, and the dangers they were in. They should have been their physicians, but murdered their patients by letting them have their wills, and giving them every thing they had a mind to, and flattering them into an opinion that they were in no danger; ver. 14, "They have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly," or 'according to the cure of some slight hurt;' skinning over the wound, and never searching it to the bottom; applying lenitives only when there was need of corrosives; soothing people in their sins, and giving them opiates to make them easy for the present, while the disease was preying upon the vitals. They said, "Peace, peace," all shall be well; if there were some thinking people among them, that were awake, and apprehensive of danger, they soon stopped their mouths with their priestly and prophetical authority, boldly averring that neither church nor state was in any danger, when there is no peace, because they go on in their idolatries and daring impieties. Note, Those are to be reckoned our false friends, that is, our worst and most dangerous enemies, that flatter us in a sinful way.

Secondly. The sin of Judah and Jerusalem is here discovered which provoked God to bring this ruin upon them, and justified him in it

1. They would by no means bear to be told of their faults, nor of the danger they were in. God bids the prophet give them warning of the judgment coming, ver. 9; but, saith he, "To whom shall I speak and give warning?" I cannot find out any that will so much as give me a patient hearing; I may give warning long enough, but here is nobody that will take warning. I cannot speak that they may hear, cannot speak to any purpose, or with any hope of success; for their ear is uncircumcised, it is carnal and fleshly, indisposed to receive the voice of God, so that they cannot hearken. They have, as it were, a thick skin grown over the organs of hearing, so that Divine things might to as much purpose be spoken to a stone as to them. Nay, they are not only deaf to it, but prejudiced against it; therefore they cannot hear, because they are resolved they will not. "The word of the Lord is unto them a reproach." Both the reproofs and the threatenings of the word are so; they reckon themselves wronged and affronted by both, and resent the prophet's plain dealing with them as they would the most causeless slander and calumny. This was kicking against the pricks, Acts ix. 5, as the lawyers against the word of Christ, Lu. xi. 45, "Thus saying thou reproachest us also." Note, Those reproofs that are counted reproaches, and hated as such, will certainly be turned into the heaviest woes. When it is here said, "They have no delight in the word," more is implied than is expressed; they have an antipathy to it, their hearts rise at it; it exasperates them, and enrages their corruptions, and they are ready to fly in the face, and pull out the eyes of their reprovers. And how can those expect that the word of the Lord should speak any comfort to them who have no delight in it, but would rather be anywhere than within hearing of it?

2. They were inordinately set upon the world, and wholly carried away by the love of it; ver. 13, "From the least of them even to the greatest," old and young, rich and poor, high and low, those of all ranks, professions, and employments, every one is given to covetousness, greedy of filthy lucre, all for what they can get, per fas per nefas,—'right or wrong,' and this made them oppressive and violent, ver. 6, 7; for of that evil, as well as others, the love of money is the bitter root. Nay, and this hardened their hearts against the word of God and his prophets; they were the covetous Pharisees that derided Christ, Lu. xvi. 14.

3. They were become impudent in sin, and past shame. After such a high charge of flagrant crimes proved upon them, it was very proper to ask, ver. 15, "Were they ashamed when they had committed" all these "abominations," which are such a reproach to their reason and religion? Did they blush at the conviction, and acknowledge that confusion of face belonged to them? If so, there is some hopes of them yet. But, alas! there did not appear so much as this colour of virtue among them; their hearts were so hardened, that "they were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush," they had so brazened their faces. They even gloried in their wickedness, and openly confronted the convictions that should have humbled them, and brought them to repentance. They resolved to face it out against God himself, and not to own their guilt. Some refer it to the priests and prophets, that had healed the people slightly, and told them they should have peace, and yet were not ashamed of their treachery and falsehood, no, not when the event disproved them, and gave them the lie. Those that are shameless are graceless, and their case hopeless. But they that will not submit to a penitential shame, nor take that to themselves as their due, shall not escape an utter ruin; for so it follows, "therefore they shall fall among them that fall," they shall have their portion with those that are quite undone; and when God visits the nation in wrath they shall be sure to be cast down, and be made to tremble, because they would not blush. Note, Those that sin, and cannot blush for it, it is ill with them now, and will be worse with them shortly. At first they hardened themselves and would not blush, afterwards they were so hardened that they could not. Quod unum habebant in malis bonum perdant, peccandi verecundiam,—'They have lost the only good property which once blended itself with many bad ones, that is, shame for having done amiss.'—Senec. de Vit. Beat.

Thirdly. They are put in mind of the good counsel which had been often given them, but in vain. They had a great deal said to them to little purpose,

1. By way of advice concerning their duty, ver. 16. God had been used to say to them, "Stand in the ways, and see." That is, 1st. He would have them to consider, not to proceed rashly, but do as travellers in the road, who are in care to find the right way, which will bring them to their journey's end, and therefore pause, and inquire for it. If they have any reason to think they have missed their way they are not easy till they have got satisfaction. O that men would be thus wise for their souls, and would ponder the path of their feet, as those that believe lawful and unlawful are of no less consequence to us than the right way and the wrong is to a traveller. 2nd. He would have them to consult antiquity, the observations and experiences of those that went before them; "Ask for the old paths;" "Enquire of the former age," Job viii. 8; "Ask thy father, thy elders," Deu. xxxii. 7, and thou wilt find that the way of godliness and righteousness hath always been the way that God hath owned and blessed, and in which men have prospered. "Ask for the old paths," that is, the paths prescribed by the law of God, the written word, that true standard of antiquity. Ask for the paths that the patriarchs travelled in before you, Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob; and, as you hope to inherit the promises made to them, tread in their steps. "Ask for the old paths, where is the good way?" We must not be guided purely by antiquity, as if the plea of prescription and long usage were alone sufficient to justify our path; no, there is an "old way, which wicked men have trodden," Job xxii. 15. But when we ask for the old paths, it is only in order to find out the good way, the highway of the upright. Note, The way of religion and godliness is a good old way, the way that all the saints in all ages have walked in. 3rd. He would have them to resolve to act according to the result of these inquiries; When you have found out which is the good way, walk therein; practise accordingly, keep close to that way, proceed and persevere in it. Some make this counsel to be given them with reference to the struggles that were between the true and false prophets, between those that said they should have peace and those that told them trouble was at the door. They pretended they knew not which to believe; "Stand in the way," saith God, and see, and inquire which of these two agrees with the written word, and the usual methods of God's providence, which of these directs you to the good way, and do accordingly. 4th. He assures them that if they do thus it will secure the welfare and satisfaction of their own souls; "Walk in the good old way," and you will find that your walking in that way will be easy and pleasant; you will enjoy both your God and yourselves; and the way will lead you to true rest. Though it cost you some pains to walk in that way, you will find an abundant recompence at your journey's end. 5th. He laments it, that this good counsel, which was so rational in itself, and so proper for them, could not find acceptance; "But they said, We will not walk therein." Not only we will not be at the pains to inquire which is the good way, the good old way; but when it is told us, and we have nothing to say to the contrary, but that it is the right way, yet we will not deny ourselves and our own humours so far as to walk in it. Thus multitudes are ruined for ever by downright wilfulness.

2. By way of admonition concerning their danger. Because they would not be ruled by fair reasoning, God takes another method with them; by lesser judgments he threatens greater, and sends his prophets to give them this explication of them, and to frighten them with an apprehension of the danger they were in; ver. 17, "Also I set watchmen over you." God's ministers are watchmen, and it is a great mercy to have them set over us in the Lord. Now observe here, 1st. The fair warning given by these watchmen. This was the burden of their song, they cried again and again, "Hearken to the sound of the trumpet." God in his providence sounds the trumpet, Zec. viii. 14. The watchmen hear it themselves, and are affected with it, ch. iv. 19; and they are to call upon others to hearken to it too, to hear the Lord's controversy, to observe the voice of providence, to improve it, and answer the intentions of it. 2nd. This fair warning slighted. "But they said, We will not hearken;" we will not hear, we will not heed, we will not believe; the prophets may as well save themselves and us the trouble. The reason why sinners perish is because they "do not hearken to the sound of the trumpet;" and the reason why they do not is because they will not; and they have no reason to give why they will not but because they will not, that is, they are herein most unreasonable. One may easier deal with ten men's reasons than one man's will.

18 Therefore hear, ye nations, and know, O congregation,
What is among them
19 Hear, O earth:
Behold, I will bring evil upon this people,
Even the fruit of their thoughts,
Because they have not hearkened unto my words,
Nor to my law, but rejected it.
20 To what purpose cometh there to me incense from Sheba,
And the sweet cane from a far country?
Your burnt offerings are not acceptable,
Nor your sacrifices sweet unto me.
21 Therefore thus saith the LORD,
Behold, I will lay stumblingblocks before this people,
And the fathers and the sons together shall fall upon them,
The neighbour and his friend shall perish.
22 Thus saith the LORD,
Behold, a people cometh from the north country,
And a great nation shall be raised from the sides of the earth.
23 They shall lay hold on bow and spear;
They are cruel, and have no mercy;
Their voice roareth like the sea;
And they ride upon horses,
Set in array as men for war
Against thee, O daughter of Zion
24 We have heard the fame thereof:
Our hands wax feeble:
Anguish hath taken hold of us,
And pain, as of a woman in travail.
25 Go not forth into the field, nor walk by the way;
For the sword of the enemy and fear is on every side.
26 O daughter of my people, gird thee with sackcloth,
And wallow thyself in ashes:
Make thee mourning, as for an only son, derness of Tekoa." The site is known, and its ancient ruins still exist, as well as a village called Tekua. Beth-haccerem lay nearer Jerusalem, and may have been the Castle of Herodium, or Frank Mountain.

vi. 6. The cutting down of trees and the casting up of a mount or mound are preparations for a siege by the attacking enemy.

vi. 9. Hereupon Dr. Henderson remarks that as vintagers "cease not to return with their baskets while any grapes remain to be reaped, so the Babylonians were repeatedly to come and carry away the inhabitants into captivity." The baskets meant are of wicker-work.

vi. 14. The word for "daughter of" here is left out of several manuscripts and editions, but it is not important, as the meaning is the same.

vi. 16. The traveller was not to strike out a new course for himself, nor to rely upon his own sagacity, but to observe and ask for the Most bitter lamentation:

For the spoiler shall suddenly come upon us.
27 I have set thee for a tower and a fortress among my people,
That thou mayest know and try their way.
28 They are all grievous revolters, walking with slanders:
They are brass and iron; they are all corrupters.
29 The bellows are burned,
The lead is consumed of the fire;
The founder melteth in vain:
For the wicked are not plucked away.
30 Reprobate silver shall men call them,
Because the LORD hath rejected them.

Here, First. God appeals to all the neighbours, nay, to the whole world, concerning the equity of his proceedings against Judah and Jerusalem; ver. 18, 19, "Hear, ye nations, and know," particularly, "O congregation" of the mighty, the great men of the nations, that take cognizance of the affairs of the states about you, and make remarks upon them. Observe now what is doing among them of Judah and Jerusalem; you hear of the desolations brought upon them, the earth rings of it, trembles under it; you all wonder that I should "bring evil upon this people," that are in covenant with me, that profess relation to me, that have worshipped me, and been highly favoured by me; you are ready to ask, "Wherefore has the Lord done thus to this land?" Deu. xxix. 24. Know then, 1. That it is the natural product of their devices. The evil brought upon them is the fruit of their thoughts. They thought to strengthen themselves by their alliance with foreigners, and by that very thing they weakened and diminished themselves; they betrayed and exposed themselves. 2. That it is the just punishment of their disobedience and rebellion. God doth but execute upon them the curse of the law for their violation of the commands of it. It is because "they have not hearkened to my words, nor to my law," nor regarded a word I have said to them, but rejected it all. They should never have been ruined thus by the judgments of God's hand, but that they refused to be ruled by the judgments of his mouth. Therefore you cannot say they have any wrong done them.

Secondly. God rejects their plea, by which they insisted upon their external services as sufficient to atone for all their sins. Alas, it is a frivolous plea; ver. 20, "To what purpose comes there to me incense, and sweet cane," to be burnt for a perfume on the golden altar, though it was the best of the kind, and far-fetched? What care I for your burnt offerings and your sacrifices? They not only cannot profit God, so no sacrifice doth, Ps. l. 9, but they do not please him, for so none doth but the sacrifice of the upright; that of the wicked an abomination to him. Sacrifice and incense were appointed to excite their repentance, and to direct them to a Mediator, and assist their faith in him; and where this good use was made of them they were acceptable, God had respect to them, and to those that offered them. But when they were offered with an opinion that thereby they made God their debtor, and purchased a license to go on in sin, they were so far from being pleasing to God, that they were a provocation to him.

Thirdly. He foretells the desolation that was now coming upon them. 1. God designs their ruin, because they hate to be reformed; ver. 21, "I will lay stumblingblocks before this people;" occasions of falling, not into sin, but into trouble. Those whom God has marked for destruction he perplexeth and embarrasseth their counsels, and obstructs and retards all the methods they take for their own safety. The parties of the enemy which they met with, wherever they went, were stumblingblocks to them, in every corner they stumbled upon them, and were dashed to pieces by them. "The fathers and the sons together shall fall upon them;" neither the fathers with their wisdom, nor the sons with their strength and courage, shall escape them, or get over them. The sons that sinned with their fathers fall with them. Even "the neighbour and his friend shall perish," and not be able to help either themselves or one another. 2. He will make use of the Chaldeans as instruments of it; for whatever work God has to do he will find out proper instruments for the doing of it. This is a people fetched "from the north, from the sides of the earth." Babylon itself lay a great way off, northwards; and some of the countries that were subject to the king of Babylon, out of which his army was levied, lay much farther. These must be employed in this service, ver. 22, 23. For, 1st. It is a people very numerous, a great nation, which will make their invasion the more formidable. 2nd. It is a warlike people. "They lay hold on bow and spear;" and at this time know how to use them, for they are used to them; "they ride upon horses," and therefore they march the more swiftly, and in battle press the harder. No nation had yet brought into the field a better cavalry than the Chaldeans. 3rd. It is a barbarous people. They "are cruel, and have no mercy," being greedy of prey and flushed with victory. They take a pride in frightening all about them, "their voice roars like the sea." And lastly, they have a particular design upon Judah and Jerusalem, in hopes greatly to enrich themselves with the spoil of that famous country. They are "set in array against thee, O daughter of Zion." The sins of God's professing people make them an easy prey to those that are God's enemies as well as theirs.

Fourthly. He describes the very great consternation which Judah and Jerusalem should be in upon the approach of this formidable enemy, ver. 24—26. 1. They own themselves in a fright upon the first intelligence brought them of the approach of the enemy. When "we have but heard the fame thereof, our hands wax feeble," and we have no heart to make any resistance; "anguish has taken hold of us," and we are in an extremity of pain presently, like that of "a woman in travail." Note, Sense of guilt quite dispirits men upon the approach of any threatening trouble. What can they hope to do for themselves that have made God their enemy? 2. They confine themselves by consent to their houses, not daring to shew their heads abroad; for, though they could not but expect that the sword of the enemy would at last find them out there, yet they would rather die tamely and sneakingly there than run any venture either by fight or flight to help themselves. Thus they say one to another, "Go not forth into the field," no, not to fetch in your provision thence; "nor walk by the way," dare not to go to church or market, it is at your peril if you do, for the sword of the enemy and the fear of it is on every side; the highways are unoccupied, as in Jael's time, Jud. v. 7. Let this mind us when we travel the roads in safety, and there is none to make us afraid, to bless God for our share in the public tranquillity. 3. The prophet calls upon them sadly to lament the desolations that were coming upon them. He was himself the lamenting prophet, and calls upon his people to join with him in his lamentations. "O daughter of my people," hear thy God calling thee to weeping and mourning, and answer his call. Do not only put on sackcloth for a day, but gird it on for thy constant wear. Do not only put ashes on thy head, but "wallow thyself in ashes." Put thyself into close mourning, and use all the tokens of bitter lamentation, not forced, and for show only, but with the greatest sincerity, as parents mourn for an only son, and think themselves comfortless because they are childless. Thus do thou lament for "the spoiler that shall suddenly come upon us." Though he is not come yet, he is coming; the decree is gone forth, let us therefore meet the execution of it with an agreeable sadness. As saints may rejoice in hope of God's mercies, though they see them only in the promise, so sinners must mourn for fear of God's judgments, though they see them only in the threatenings.

Fifthly. He constitutes the prophet a judge over this people that now stand upon their trial; as ch. i. 10, "I have set thee over the nations," so here, "I have set thee for a tower," or as a sentinel or a watchman upon a tower, among my people, as an inspector of their actions, "that thou mayest know and try their way," ver. 27. Not that God needed any to inform him concerning them; on the contrary, the prophet knew little of them in comparison, but by the spirit of prophecy. But thus God appeals to the prophet himself, and his own observation concerning their character, that he might be fully satisfied in the equity of God's proceedings against them, and with the more assurance give them warning of the judgments coming. God set him for a tower conspicuous to all, and attacked by many, but made him a fortress, a strong tower, gave him courage to stem the tide, and bear the shock of their displeasure. They that will be faithful reprovers have need to be firm as fortresses. Now in trying their way he will find two things:

1. That they are wretchedly debauched; ver. 28, "They are all grievous revolters," 'revolters of revolters,' so the word is, the worst of revolters, as a servant of servants is the meanest servant. They have a revolting heart, have deeply revolted, and revolt more and more. They have seemed to start fair, but they revolt and start back. They walk with slanders, they make nothing of belying and backbiting one another; nay, they make a perfect trade of it, it is their constant course. And they govern themselves by the slanders they hear, hating those that they hear ill spoken of, though never so unjustly. They are brass and iron, base metals, and there is nothing in them that is valuable. They were as silver and gold, but they are degenerated. Nay, as they are all revolters, so "they are all corrupters," not only debauched themselves, but industrious to debauch others; to corrupt them as they themselves are corrupt; nay, to make them seven times more the children of hell than themselves. It is often so, sinners soon become tempters.

2. That they would never be reclaimed and reformed. It was in vain to think of reducing them, for various methods had been tried with them, and all to no purpose, ver. 29, 30. He compares them to ore that was supposed to have some good metal in it, and was therefore put into the furnace by the refiner, who used all his art, and took abundance of pains about it, but it proved all dross, nothing of any value could be extracted out of it. God by his prophets and by his providences had used the most proper means to refine this people, and to purify them from their wickedness; but it was all in vain. By the continual preaching of the word, and a series of afflictions, they had been kept in a constant fire, but all to no purpose. "The bellows" have been still kept so near the fire to blow it, that they "are burnt" with the heat of it, or they are quite worn out with long use, and thrown into the fire as good for nothing. The prophets have preached their throats sore with crying aloud against the sins of Israel, and yet they are not convinced and humbled. "The lead," which was then used in refining silver, as quicksilver is now, "is consumed of the fire," and has not done its work; for "the founder melteth in vain," his labour is lost, for "the wicked are not plucked away." No care is taken to separate between the precious and the vile, to purge out the old leaven, to cast out of communion those who, being corrupt themselves, are in danger of infecting others. Or, 'their wickednesses are removed,' so some read it; they are still as bad as ever, and nothing will prevail to part between them and their sins; they will not be brought off from their idolatries and immoralities by all they have heard, and all they have felt, of the wrath of God against them. And therefore that doom is passed upon them; ver. 30, "Reprobate silver shall they be called," useless and worthless. They glitter as if they had some silver in them, but there is nothing of real virtue or goodness to be found among them; and for this reason "the Lord has rejected them." He will no more own them as his people, nor look for any good from them; he will "take them away like dross," Ps. cxix. 119, and prepare a consuming fire for those that would not be purified by a refining fire. By this it appears, 1st. That God hath no pleasure in the death and ruin of sinners, for he tries all ways and methods with them to prevent their destruction, and qualify them for salvation. Both his ordinances and his providences have a tendency this way, to part between them and their sins, and yet with many it is all lost labour: "We have piped unto you, and you have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and you have not wept." Therefore, 2nd. God will be justified in the death of sinners, and all the blame will lie upon themselves. He did not reject them till he had used all proper means to reduce them; did not cast them off so long as there was any hopes of them, nor abandon them as dross till it appeared they were reprobate silver.

CHAPTER VII.

The prophet having in God's name reproved the people for their sins, and given them warning of the judgments of God that were coming upon them, in this chapter prosecutes the same intention for their humiliation and awakening. I. He shews them the invalidity of the plea they so much relied on, that they had the temple of God among them, and constantly attended the service of it, and endeavours to take them off from their confidence in their external privileges and performances, ver. 1—11. II. He minds them of the desolations of Shiloh; and foretells that such should be the desolations of Jerusalem, ver. 12—16. III. He represents to the prophet their abominable idolatries, for which he was thus incensed against them, ver. 17—20. IV. He sets before the people that fundamental maxim of religion, that to obey is better than sacrifice, 1 Sam. xv. 22, and that God would not accept the sacrifices of those that obstinately persisted in disobedience, ver. 21—28. V. He threatens to lay the land utterly waste for their idolatry and impiety, and to multiply their slain as they had multiplied their sin, ver. 29—34.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Stand in the gate of the LORD'S house, and proclaim there this word, and say,
Hear the word of the LORD, all ye of Judah,
That enter in at these gates to worship the LORD.
3 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, old beaten paths, not refusing to be instructed by others. This was the only safe course, and the Jews had rejected it.

vi. 20. It is apparent from other texts that the Jews obtained incense, or frankincense, and the sweet cane from abroad. Arabia is here meant by Sheba, but there is no reason to think that the frankincense-tree grew in Arabia. The probability is the fragrant ingredient was obtained from the East Indies, and then traded in by the Arabian merchants. Even now Dr. Tristram observes that it is obtained in a similar manner. The sweet cane, or calamus, is not the sugar-cane and sweet to the taste, but an aromatic or sweet-smelling cane. It was most likely an Indian product, and obtained in the same way as the frankincense, through Arabia. That it came from "a far country" is a sufficient indication that it was imported from a foreign land.

vi. 22, 23. The north country is the country of the Babylonian or Chaldean invaders. The term "sides of the earth," or "coasts of Amend your ways and your doings,

And I will cause you to dwell in this place.
4 Trust ye not in lying words, saying,
The temple of the LORD, The temple of the LORD,
The temple of the LORD, are these.
5 For if ye throughly amend your ways and your doings;
If ye throughly execute judgment between a man and his neighbour;
6 If ye oppress not the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow,
And shed not innocent blood in this place,
Neither walk after other gods to your hurt:
7 Then will I cause you to dwell in this place,
In the land that I gave to your fathers, for ever and ever.
8 Behold, ye trust in lying words, that cannot profit.
9 Will ye steal, murder, and commit adultery,
And swear falsely, and burn incense unto Baal,
And walk after other gods whom ye know not;
10 And come and stand before me in this house,
Which is called by my name,
And say, We are delivered to do all these abominations?
11 Is this house, which is called by my name,
Become a den of robbers in your eyes?
Behold, even I have seen it, saith the LORD.
12 But go ye now unto my place which was in Shiloh,

VILLAGE OF SHILOAH.

Where I set my name at the first,
And see what I did to it for the wickedness of my people Israel.
13 And now, because ye have done all these works, saith the LORD,
And I spake unto you,
Rising up early and speaking, but ye heard not;
And I called you, but ye answered not;
14 Therefore will I do unto this house, which is called by my name,
Wherein ye trust,
And unto the place which I gave to you and to your fathers,
As I have done to Shiloh.
15 And I will cast you out of my sight,
As I have cast out all your brethren,
Even the whole seed of Ephraim.

These verses begin another sermon, which is continued in this and the two following chapters, much to the same effect with those before,—to reason them to repentance. Observe,

First. The orders given to the prophet to preach this sermon; for he had not only a general commission, but particular directions and instructions for every message he delivered. This was "a word that came to Jeremiah from the Lord," ver. 1. We are not told when this sermon was to be preached, but we are told, 1. Where it must be preached, "in the gate of the Lord's house," through which they entered into the outer court, or the court of the people. It would affront the priests, and expose the prophet to their rage, to have such a message as this delivered under their noses, and within their precincts, but the prophet must not fear the face of man, he cannot be faithful to his God if he do. 2. To whom it must be preached, to the men "of Judah that enter in at these gates to worship the Lord." Probably it was at one of the three feasts, when all the males from all parts of the country were to appear before the Lord in the courts of his house, and not to appear empty; then he had many together to preach to, and that was the most seasonable time to admonish them not to trust to their privileges. Note, 1st. Even those that do profess religion have need to be preached to, as well as those that are without. 2nd. It is desirable to have opportunity of preaching to many together. Wisdom chooseth to cry in the chief place of concourse, and, as Jeremiah here, in the opening of the gates, the temple gates. 3rd. When we are going to worship God, we have need to be admonished to worship him in the spirit, and to have no confidence in the flesh, Phil. iii. 3.

Secondly. The contents and scope of the sermon itself. It is delivered in the name of "the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel," who commands the world, but covenants with his people. As creatures, we are bound to regard the Lord of hosts; as Christians, the God of Israel. What he said to them he saith to us, and it is much the same with that which John Baptist said to those whom he baptized, Mat. iii. 8, 9, "Bring forth fruits meet for repentance; and think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father." The prophet here tells them,

1. What were the true words of God which they might trust to. In short, they might depend upon it, that if they would repent and reform their lives, and return to God in a way of duty, he would restore and confirm their peace, would redress their grievances, and return to them in a way of mercy; ver. 3, "Amend your ways and your doings." This implies that there had been much amiss in their ways and doings, many faults and errors. But it is a great instance of the favour of God to them, that he gives them liberty to amend, shews them where and how they must mend, and promiseth to accept them upon their amendment; "I will cause you to dwell" quietly and peaceably "in this place," and a stop shall be put to that which threatens your expulsion. Reformation is the only way, and a sure way, to prevent ruin. He explains himself, ver. 5—7, and tells them particularly,

1st. What the amendment was which he expected from them. They must thoroughly amend; in making good they must make good their ways and doings; they must reform with resolution, and it must be a universal, constant, persevering reformation, not partial but certire, not hypocritical but sincere, not wavering but constant. They must make the tree good, and so make the fruit good; must amend their hearts and thoughts, and so amend their ways and doings. In particular, First. They must be honest and just in all their dealings. They that had power in their hands must "throughly execute judgment between a man and his neighbour," without partiality, and according as the merits of the cause appeared. They must not either in judgment or in contract oppress the stranger, the fatherless, or the widow, nor countenance or protect those that did oppress, nor refuse to do them right when they sought for it. They must not shed innocent blood, and with it defile this place, and the land wherein they dwelt. Secondly. They must keep close to the worship of the true God only; "Neither walk after other gods." Do not hanker after them, nor hearken to those that would draw you into communion with idolaters, for it is and will be to your own hurt. Be not only so just to your God, but so wise for yourselves, as not to throw away your adorations upon those that are not able to help you, and thereby provoke him who is able to destroy you. Well, this is all that God insists upon.

2nd. He tells them what the establishment is which upon this amendment they may expect from him, ver. 7. Set about such a work of reformation as this with all speed, go through with it, and abide by it, "and I will cause you to dwell in this place," this temple; it shall continue your place of resort and refuge, the place of your comfortable meeting with God and one another, and you shall dwell "in the land that I gave to your fathers for ever and ever," and shall never be turned out either from God's house or your own. It is promised that they shall still enjoy their civil and sacred privileges, that they shall have a comfortable enjoyment of them; "I will cause you to dwell here," and those dwell at ease whom God gives a settlement to; they shall enjoy it by covenant, by virtue of the grant made of it to their fathers, not by providence but promise. They shall continue in the enjoyment of it without eviction or molestation; they shall not be disturbed, much less dispossessed for ever and ever. Nothing but sin could throw them out. An everlasting inheritance in the heavenly Canaan is hereby secured to all that live in godliness and honesty. And the vulgar Latin reads a farther privilege here, ver. 3, 7; Habitabo vobiscum, —'I will dwell with you in this place;' and we should find Canaan itself but an uncomfortable place to dwell in, if God did not dwell with us there.

2. What were the lying words of their own hearts which they must not trust to. He cautions them against this self-deceit, ver. 4, "Trust ye not in lying words;" you are told in what way, and upon what terms, you may be easy, safe, and happy; now do not flatter yourselves with an opinion that you may be so on any other terms, or in any other way. Yet he chargeth them with this self-deceit, arising from a self-conceit, ver. 8; Behold, it is plain you do trust in lying words, notwithstanding what is said to you; you trust in words that cannot profit, you rely upon a plea that will stand you in no stead. They that slight the words of truth which would profit them take shelter in words of falsehood that cannot profit them. Now these lying words were, "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these." These buildings, the courts, the holy place, and the holy of holies, are the temple of the Lord, built by his appointment, to his glory; here he resides, here he is worshipped, here we meet three times a year to pay our homage to him as our King, in his palace. This they thought was security enough to them to keep God and his favours from leaving them, God and his judgments from breaking in upon them. When the prophets told them how sinful they were, and how miserable they were likely to be still, they appealed to the temple; How can we be either so or so, as long as we have that holy, happy place among us? The prophet repeats it because they repeated it upon all occasions. It was the cant of the times, it was in their mouths upon all occasions. If they heard any awakening sermon, if any startling piece of news was brought upon them, they lulled themselves asleep again with this, We cannot but do well, for we have the temple of the Lord among us. Note, The privileges of a form of godliness are oftentimes the pride and confidence of those that are strangers and enemies to the power of it. It is common for those that are farthest from God to boast themselves most of their being near to the church. They are "haughty because of the holy mountain," Zep. iii. 11, as if God's mercy were so tied to them that they might defy his justice. Now, to convince them what a frivolous plea this was, and what little stead it would stand them in,

1st. He shews them the gross absurdity of it in itself. If they knew anything either of the temple of the Lord or of the Lord of the temple, they must think that to plead that, either in excuse of their sin against God, or in arrest of God's judgment against them, was the most ridiculous, unreasonable thing that could be.

First. God is a holy God, but this plea made him the patron of sin, of the worst of sins, which even the light of nature condemns, ver. 9, 10. What, saith he, "will ye steal, murder, and commit adultery," be guilty of the vilest the earth" (Jer. l. 41) may mean "upon the borders of the known world;" and hence Dr. Henderson explains it "the remotest regions of the earth, i.e., as known to the ancients." On verse 23 the same writer says, "The Chaldean soldiery appear in some respects to have resembled the Cossacks of modern times, especially in the use of the lance on horseback. They fight principally in small bodies, with which they attack the enemy on all sides, but principally on the flanks and in the rear, rushing upon them at full speed with a dreadful hurrah and with levelled lances." The cruelty of the Babylonian soldiers was very great, and the proof of this is found not only in foreign records, but on their own monuments discovered in modern times.

vi. 27. Instead of "I have set thee for a tower and a fortress" some ancient and many modern translators put "I have set thee a prover and a trier of my people," or words of similar import. That this is much more in harmony with the context is apparent, for all immoralities, and which the common interest, as well as the common sense of mankind witness against? "Will you swear falsely," a crime which all nations who, with the belief of a God, have had a veneration for an oath, have always had a horror of? Will "you burn incense to Baal," a dunghill deity, that sets up as rival with the great Jehovah, and, not content with that, "will you walk after other gods" too, "whom ye know not," and by all these crimes put a daring affront upon God, both as the Lord of hosts, and the God of Israel? will you exchange a God, whose power and goodness you have had such a long experience of for gods whose ability and willingness to help you you know nothing of? And when you have thus done the worst you can against God, will you brazen your faces so far as to come and "stand before him in this house which is called by his name," and in which his name is called upon; stand before him as servants waiting his commands, as supplicants expecting his favour; will you act in open rebellion against him, and yet herd yourself among his subjects, among the best of them? By this it should seem, you think, that either he doth not discover or doth not dislike your wicked practices, either of which to imagine is to put the highest indignity possible upon him. It is as if you should say, "We are delivered to do all these abominations." If they had not the front to say this, totidem verbis,—'in so many words,' yet their actions spoke it aloud. They could not but own that God, even their own God, had many a time delivered them, and been a present help to them, when otherwise they must have perished. He, in delivering them, designed to reduce them to himself, and by his goodness to lead them to repentance, but they resolved to persist in their abominations notwithstanding; as soon as they were delivered, (as of old in the days of the judges,) "they did evil again in the sight of the Lord," which was in effect to say, in direct contradiction to the true intent and meaning of the providences which had been concerning them, that God had delivered them to put them again into a capacity of rebelling against him, by sacrificing the more profusely to their idols. Note, Those who continue in sin, because grace has abounded, or that grace may abound, do in effect make Christ the minister of sin. Some take it thus: You present yourselves before God with your sacrifices and sin offerings, and then say, "We are delivered," that is, we are discharged from our guilt, now it shall do us no hurt; when all this is but to blind the world, and stop the mouth of conscience, that you may the more easily to yourselves, and the more plausibly before others, "do all these abominations."

Secondly. His temple was a holy place, but this plea made it a protection to the most unholy persons. "Is this house which is called by my name," and is a standing sign of God's kingdom, set up among men in opposition to the kingdom of sin and Satan,—is this "become a den of robbers in your eyes?" Do you think it was built to be not only a rendezvous of, but a refuge and shelter to, the vilest of malefactors? No, though the horns of the altar were a sanctuary to him that slew a man at unawares, yet not to a wilful murderer, not to one that doth aught presumptuously, Ex. xxi. 14; 1 Kin. ii. 29. Those that think to excuse themselves in unchristian practices with the Christian name, and sin the more boldly and securely because there is a sin offering provided, do, in effect, make God's house of prayer a den of thieves; as the priests in Christ's time, Mat. xxi. 13. But could they thus impose upon God? No, "Behold, I have seen it, saith the Lord," have seen the real iniquity through the counterfeit and dissembled piety. Note, Though men may deceive one another with the shows of devotion, yet they cannot deceive God.

2nd. He shews them the insufficiency of this plea, adjudged long since in the case of Shiloh.

First. It is certain Shiloh was ruined, though it had God's sanctuary in it, when by its wickedness it profaned that sanctuary; ver. 12, "Go ye now to my place which was in Shiloh." It is probable the ruins of that once flourishing city were yet remaining; however, they might read the history of it, which ought to affect them as if they saw the place. There God set his name at the first; there the tabernacle was set up when Israel first took possession of Canaan, Jos. xviii. 1, and thither the tribes went up. But those that attended the service of the tabernacle there corrupted both themselves and others, and from them arose the wickedness of his people Israel. That fountain was poisoned, and sent forth malignant streams. And what came of it? Go, "see what God did to it." Was it protected by its having the tabernacle in it? No, God forsook it, Ps. lxxviii. 60, sent his ark into captivity, cut off the house of Eli that presided there; and it is very probable the city was quite destroyed, for we never read any more of it but as a monument of Divine vengeance upon holy places, when they harbour wicked people. Note, God's judgments upon others that have really revolted from God, while they have kept up a profession of nearness to him, should be a warning to us not to trust in lying words. It is good to consult precedents, and make use of them: Remember Lot's wife; remember Shiloh and the seven churches of Asia, and know that the ark and candlestick are movable things, Rev. ii. 5; Mat. xxi. 43.

Secondly. It is as certain that Shiloh's fate will be Jerusalem's doom if a speedy and sincere repentance prevent it not. 1*st.* Jerusalem was now as sinful as ever Shiloh was; that is proved by the unerring testimony of God himself against them, ver. 13, "Ye have done all these works," you cannot deny it. And they continued obstinate in their sin; that is proved by the testimony of God's messengers, by whom he spake unto them to return and repent, "rising up early and speaking," as one in care, as one in earnest, as one that would lose no time in dealing with them, nay, that should take the fittest opportunity for speaking to them early in the morning, when, if ever, they were sober, and had their thoughts free and clear. But it was all in vain: God spake, but they heard not, that is, they heeded not, they never minded; he called them, but they answered not; they would not come at his call. Note, What God hath spoken to us greatly aggravates what we have done against him. 2*nd.* Jerusalem shall shortly be as miserable as ever Shiloh was; "Therefore I will do unto this house as I did to Shiloh," ruin it and lay it waste, ver. 14. Those that tread in the steps of the wickedness of those that went before them must expect to fall by the like judgments, for all these things "happened to them for ensamples." The temple at Jerusalem, though never so strongly built, if wickedness was found in it, would be as unable to keep its ground, and as easily conquered as even the tabernacle in Shiloh was, when God's day of vengeance was come. This house, saith God, is called by my name, and therefore you may think I should protect it; it is the house in which you trust, and you think it will protect you. This land is the place, this city the place, which I gave to you and your fathers, and therefore you are secure of the continuance of it, and think nothing can turn you out of it. But the men of Shiloh thus flattered themselves, and did but deceive themselves. He quotes another precedent, ver. 15, namely, the ruin of the kingdom of the ten tribes, who were the seed of Abraham, and had the covenant of circumcision, and possessed the land which God gave to them and their fathers, and yet their idolatries threw them out, and extirpated them; and can you think but that the same evil courses should be as fatal to you? Doubtless they will be so, for God is uniform, and of a piece with himself in his judicial proceedings. It is a rule of justice, ut parium par sit ratio,—'in similar cases the same judgment should proceed.' 'You have corrupted yourselves as your brethren the seed of Ephraim did, and are become their brethren in iniquity, and therefore I will cast you out of my sight, as I have cast them.' The interpretation here given of the judgment makes it a terrible one indeed: the casting of them out of their land signified God's casting them out of his sight, as if he would never look upon them, never look after them, more. Wherever we are cast, it is well enough if we be kept in the love of God; but if we are thrown out of his favour our case is miserable, though we dwell in our own land. This threatening that God would make this house like Shiloh we shall meet with again, and find Jeremiah indicted for it, ch. xxvi. 6.

16 Therefore pray not thou for this people,
Neither lift up cry nor prayer for them,
Neither make intercession to me:
For I will not hear thee.
17 Seest thou not what they do in the cities of Judah
And in the streets of Jerusalem?
18 The children gather wood,
And the fathers kindle the fire,
And the women knead their dough,
To make cakes to the queen of heaven,
And to pour out drink offerings unto other gods,
That they may provoke me to anger.
19 Do they provoke me to anger? saith the LORD:
Do they not provoke themselves to the confusion of their own faces?
20 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, mine anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place,
Upon man, and upon beast,
And upon the trees of the field,
And upon the fruit of the ground;
And it shall burn, and shall not be quenched.

God had shewed them in the foregoing verses, that the temple, and the service of it, of which they boasted, and in which they trusted, should not avail to prevent the judgment threatened. But there was another thing which might stand them in some stead, and which yet they had no value for, and that was the prophet's intercession for them. His prayers would do them more good than their own pleas. Now here that support is taken from them; and their case is sad indeed that have lost their interest in the prayers of God's ministers and people.

First. God here forbids the prophet to pray for them, ver. 16. The decree is gone forth, their ruin is resolved on, therefore, "pray not thou for this people," that is, pray not for the preventing of this judgment threatened; they have sinned unto death, and therefore pray not for their life, but for the life of their souls, 1 Jno. v. 16. See here, 1. That God's prophets are praying men. Jeremiah foretold the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem, and yet prayed for their preservation; not knowing that the decree was absolute, and it is the will of God that we "pray for the peace of Jerusalem." Even when we threaten sinners with damnation, we must pray for their salvation, that they may turn and live. Jeremiah was hated, and persecuted, and reproached by the children of his people, and yet he prayed for them; for it becomes us to render good for evil. 2. That God's praying prophets have a great interest in heaven, how little soever they have on earth. When God was determined to destroy this people, he bespeaks the prophet not to pray for them, because he would not have his prayers to lie, as prophet's prayers seldom did, unanswered. God said to Moses, "Let me alone," Ex. xxxii. 10. 3. It is an ill omen to a people when God restrains the spirits of his ministers and people from praying for them, and gives them to see their case so desperate, that they have no heart to speak a good word for them. 4. Those that will not regard good ministers' preaching cannot expect any benefit by their praying. If you will not hear us when we speak from God to you, God will not hear us when we speak to him for you.

Secondly. He gives him a reason for this prohibition. Praying breath is too precious a thing to be lost and thrown away upon a people hardened in sin, and marked for ruin.

1. They are resolved to persist in their rebellion against God, and will not be turned back by the prophet's preaching. For this he appeals to the prophet himself, and his own inspection and observation; ver. 17, "Seest thou not what they do" openly and publicly, without either shame or fear, "in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem?" This intimates, both that the sin was evident, and could not be denied, and that the sinners were impudent, and would not be reclaimed. They committed their wickedness even in the prophet's presence, and under his eye; he saw what they did, and yet they did it, which was an affront to his office, and to him whose officer he was, and bade defiance to both. Now observe,

1st. What the sin is with which they are here charged. It is idolatry, ver. 18. Their idolatrous respects are paid to the queen of heaven, the moon, either in an image, or in the original, or both. They worshipped it probably under the name of Ashtaroth, or some other of their goddesses; being in love with the brightness in which they saw the moon walk, and thinking themselves indebted to her for her benign influences, or fearing her malignant ones, Job xxxi. 26. The worshipping of the moon was much in use among the heathen nations, ch. xliv. 17, 19. Some read it, the frame or workmanship of heaven; the whole celestial globe, with all its ornaments and powers, was the object of their adoration. They worshipped the host of heaven, Acts vii. 42. The homage they should have paid to their Prince, they paid to the statues that beautified the frontispiece of his palace; worshipped the creatures instead of him that made them, the servants instead of him that commands them, and the gifts instead of him that gave them. With the queen of heaven they worshipped other gods, images of things not only in heaven above, but in earth beneath, and in the waters under the earth; for those that forsake the true God wander endlessly after false ones. To these deities of their own making they offer cakes for meat-offerings, and pour out drink-offerings, as if they had their meat and drink from them, and were obliged to make to them their acknowledgments. And see how busy they are, and how every hand is employed in the service of these idols, according as they used to be employed in their domestic the language proceeds on the basis of a refiner's work, and that to the end of the chapter.

vi. 29. That bellows were used by the Egyptians and may therefore have been known in Palestine, we have evidence in Sir J. G. Wilkinson's work. The bellows "consisted of a leathern bag secured and fitted into a frame, from which a long pipe extended for carrying the wind to the fire. They were worked by the feet, the operator standing upon them with one under each foot, and pressing them alternately, while he pulled up each exhausted skin with a string he held in his hand." Lead, as mentioned here, was anciently used instead of quicksilver by refiners of gold and silver. The idea is that the bellows get scorched, the lead is consumed, and the refiner labours in vain, for, after all, the wicked, or the dross, remains unseparated from the mass. Hence, as in verse 30, "reprobate silver," or, rather, "refuse silver" shall men call the people.

vii. 1. This chapter commences a new prophecy, which seems to services. "The children" were sent to "gather wood, the fathers kindled the fire" to heat the oven, being of the poorer sort, that could not afford to keep servants to do it, yet they would rather do it themselves than it should be undone; "the women kneaded the dough" with their own hands, for perhaps, though they had servants to do it, yet they took a pride in shewing their zeal for their idols by doing it themselves. Let us be instructed, even by this bad example, in the service of our God. First. Let us honour him with our substance, as those that have our subsistence from him, and eat and drink to the glory of him from whom we have our meat and drink. Secondly. Let us not decline the hardest services, nor disdain to stoop to the meanest, by which God may be honoured; for none shall kindle a fire on God's altar for nought. Let us think it an honour to be employed in any work for God. Thirdly. Let us bring up our children in the acts of devotion; let them, as they are capable, be employed in doing something towards the keeping up of religious exercises.

2nd. What is the direct tendency of this sin: it is "that they may provoke me to anger;" they cannot design any thing else in it. But, (ver. 19,) "Do they provoke me to anger?" Is it because I am hard to be pleased, or easily provoked? or am I to bear the blame of the resentment? No; it is their own doing; they may thank themselves, and they alone shall bear it. 'Is it against God that they provoke him to wrath?' Is he the worse for it? Doth it do him any real damage? No; "Is it not against themselves, to the confusion of their own faces?" It is malice against God, but it is impotent malice, it cannot hurt him; nay, it is foolish malice, it will hurt themselves. They shew their spite against God, but they do the spite to themselves. Now, canst thou think any other but that such a people should be abandoned as are thus desperately set upon their own ruin?

2. God is resolved to proceed in his judgments against them, and will not be turned back by the prophet's prayer; ver. 20, "Thus saith the Lord God," and what he saith he will not unsay, nor can all the world gainsay; hear it therefore, and tremble; "Behold, my anger and fury shall be poured out upon this place," as the flood of waters was upon the old world, or the shower of fire and brimstone upon Sodom; since they will anger me, let them see what comes of it. They shall soon find, 1st. That there is no escaping this deluge of fire, either by flying from it or fencing against it; it should be poured out on this place, though it be a holy place, the Lord's house. It shall reach both man and beast, like the plagues of Egypt; and, like some of them, shall destroy "the trees of the field, and the fruit of the ground," which they had designed and prepared for Baal, and of which they had made cakes to the queen of heaven. 2nd. There is no extinguishing it; "It shall burn, and shall not be quenched." Prayers and tears shall then avail nothing, "when his wrath is kindled but a little;" much more when it is kindled to such a degree that there shall be no quenching of it. God's wrath is that fire unquenchable which eternity itself will not see the period of; "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire!"

21 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Put your burnt offerings unto your sacrifices,
And eat flesh.
22 For I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them
In the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt,
Concerning burnt offerings or sacrifices:
23 But this thing commanded I them, saying,
Obey my voice,
And I will be your God,
And ye shall be my people:
And walk ye in all the ways that I have commanded you,
That it may be well unto you.
24 But they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear,
But walked in the counsels and in the imagination of their evil heart,
And went backward, and not forward
25 Since the day that your fathers came forth out of the land of Egypt
Unto this day
I have even sent unto you all my servants the prophets,
Daily rising up early and sending them:
26 Yet they hearkened not unto me, nor inclined their ear,
But hardened their neck:
They did worse than their fathers.
27 Therefore thou shalt speak all these words unto them;
But they will not hearken to thee:
Thou shalt also call unto them;
But they will not answer thee.
28 But thou shalt say unto them,
This is a nation that obeyeth not the voice of the LORD their God,
Nor receiveth correction:
Truth is perished, and is cut off from their mouth

God, having shewed the people that the temple would not protect them while they polluted it with their wickedness, here shews them that their sacrifices would not atone for them, nor be accepted, while they went on in disobedience. See with what contempt he here speaks of their ceremonial services; ver. 21, "Put your burnt offerings to your sacrifices;" go on in them as long as you please; add one sort of sacrifice to another; turn your burnt offerings, which were to be wholly burnt, to the honour of God, into peace offerings, which the offerer himself had a considerable share of, that you may eat flesh, for that is all the good you are likely to have from your sacrifices,—a good meal's meat or two,—but expect not any other benefit by them while you live at this loose rate. 'Keep your sacrifices to yourselves,' so some understand it; let them be served up at your own tables, for they are no way acceptable at God's altars. For the opening of this,

First. He shews them that obedience was the only thing he required of them, ver. 22, 23. He appeals to the original contract, by which they were first formed into a people, when they were brought out of Egypt. God made them a kingdom of priests to himself, not that he might be regaled with their sacrifices, as the devils, whom the heathen worshipped, which are represented as eating with pleasure the fat of their sacrifices, and drinking the wine of their drink offerings, Deu. xxxii. 38. No, "Will God eat the flesh of bulls?" Ps. l. 13. "I spake not to your fathers concerning burnt offerings or sacrifices," not of them at first. The precepts of the moral law were given before the ceremonial institutions; and those came afterwards as trials of their obedience, and assistances to their repentance and faith. The Levitical law begins thus, "If any man of you will bring an offering," he must do so and so, Lev. i. 2; ii. 1, as if it were intended rather to regulate sacrifice than to require it. But that which God commanded, which he bound them to by his supreme authority, and which he insisted upon as the condition of the covenant, was, "Obey my voice:" see Ex. xv. 26, where this was the statute and the ordinance by which God proved them; "Hearken diligently to the voice of the Lord thy God." And upon these terms they shall be God's peculiar people; Ex. xiv. 5, "If ye will obey my voice indeed." Make conscience of the duties of natural religion, observe positive institutions from a principle of obedience. And then, "I will be your God, and ye shall be my people," which speaks the greatest honour, happiness, and satisfaction that any of the children of men are capable of. Let your conversation be regular, and in every thing study to comply with the will and word of God; walk within the bounds that I have set you, and "in all the ways that I have commanded you," and then you may assure yourselves "it shall be well with you." The demand here is very reasonable, that we should be directed by Infinite Wisdom to that which is fit; that he that made us should command us, and that he should give us law who gives us our being, and all the supports of it. And the promise is very encouraging; let God's will be your rule, and his favour shall be your felicity.

Secondly. He shews them that disobedience was the only thing for which he had a quarrel with them. "He would not reprove them for their sacrifices," for the omission of them, they had been continually before him, Ps. l. 8; with them they hoped to bribe God, and purchase a license to go on in sin. That, therefore, which God had all along laid to their charge was, breaking his commandments in the course of their conversation, while they observed them in some instances in the course of their devotion, ver. 24, 25, &c.

1. They set up their own will in competition with the will of God. "They hearkened not" to God, and to his law, they never heeded that; it was to them as if it had never been given, or were of no force; they "inclined not their ear" to attend to it, much less their hearts to comply with it. But they would have their own way,—would do as they had a mind, and not as they were bidden. Their own counsels were their guide, and not the dictates of Divine wisdom. That shall be lawful and good with them which they think so, though the word of God saith quite contrary. "The imagination of their evil heart," the appetites and passions of it, shall be a law to them, and they will walk in the way of it, and in the sight of their eyes.

2. If they began well, yet they did not proceed, but soon flew off. "They went backward," when they talked of making a captain, and returning to Egypt again, and would not go forward under God's conduct. They promised fair; "All that the Lord shall say unto us we will do;" and if they would but have kept in that good mind all had been well; but, instead of going on in the way of duty, they drew back into the way of sin, and were worse than ever.

3. When God sent to them, by word of mouth, to put them in mind of the written word, which was the business of the prophets, it was all one; still they were disobedient. God had servants of his among them in every age, since they came out of Egypt unto this day,—some or other to tell them of their faults, and put them in mind of their duty, whom he rose up early to send, as before, ver. 13, as men rise up early to call their servants to their work; but they were as deaf to the prophets as they were to the law; ver. 26, "Yet they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear." This had been their way and manner all along; they were of the same stubborn, refractory disposition with those that went before them. It had all along been the genius of the nation (and an evil genius it was) that continually haunted them till it ruined them at last.

4. Their practice and character was still the same; they are worse, and no better than their fathers. 1st. Jeremiah can himself witness against them, that they were disobedient, or he shall soon find it so; ver. 27, "Thou shalt speak all these words to them," shalt particularly charge them with disobedience and obstinacy. But even that will not work upon them: "They will not hearken to thee," nor heed thee; thou shalt go and "call to them" with all the plainness and earnestness imaginable, "but they will not answer thee;" they will either give thee no answer at all or not an obedient answer; they will not come at thy call. 2nd. He must therefore own that they deserved the character of a disobedient people, that were ripe for destruction, and must go to them and tell them so to their faces; ver. 28, "Say unto them, This is a nation that obeys not the voice of the Lord their God." They are notorious for their obstinacy; they sacrifice to the Lord as their God, but they will not be ruled by him as their God. They will not receive either the instruction of his word or the correction of his rod; they will not be reclaimed or reformed by either. Truth is perished among them; they cannot receive it; they will not submit to it, nor be governed by it; they will not speak truth; there is no believing a word they say, for it is cut off from their mouth, and lying comes in the room of it; they are false both to God and man.

29 Cut off thine hair, O Jerusalem, and cast it away,
And take up a lamentation on high places;
For the LORD hath rejected and forsaken the generation of his wrath.
30 For the children of Judah have done evil in my sight, saith the LORD:
They have set their abominations in the house
Which is called by my name, to pollute it.
31 And they have built the high places of Tophet,
Which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom,
To burn their sons and their daughters in the fire;
Which I commanded them not, neither came it into my heart.

have been given later than that which precedes it, perhaps in Jehoiakim's reign.

vii. 6. Upon the reference to the shedding of innocent blood in the Temple, Gill observes, "This does not so much respect the commission of murder by private persons as condemnation of innocent men to death by the judges, which is all one as shedding their blood."

vii. 9, 10. The sense is, "Will ye be wicked in life and idolatrous in practice, and yet conform to the outward rites of the true religion? Will ye say 'We are delivered,' in order that ye may do such abominable things?" They thought they were free to do whatever they liked.

vii. 12. The ruin of Shiloh alluded to here and in verse 14 is thought to have taken place when the Assyrians took the ten tribes into captivity. The position of Shiloh, identified in modern times at Seilun, was in the tribe of Ephraim, and north of Bethel.

32 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That it shall no more be called Tophet,
Nor the valley of the son of Hinnom,
But the valley of slaughter:
For they shall bury in Tophet, till there be no place.
33 And the carcases of this people shall be meat
For the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of the earth;
And none shall fray them away.
34 Then will I cause to cease from the cities of Judah,
And from the streets of Jerusalem,
The voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness,
The voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride:
For the land shall be desolate

Here is, First. A loud call to weeping and mourning. Jerusalem, that had been a joyous city, the joy of the whole earth, must now take up a lamentation on high places, ver. 29, the high places where they had served their idols, there must they now bemoan their misery. In token both of sorrow and slavery Jerusalem must now cut off her hair, and cast it away; the word is peculiar to the hair of the Nazarites, which was the badge and token of their dedication to God, and is called their crown. Jerusalem had been a city that was a Nazarite to God, but now must cut off her hair, must be profaned, degraded, and separated from God, as she had been separated to him. And it is time for those that have lost their holiness to lay aside their joy.

Secondly. Just cause given for this great lamentation.

1. The sin of Jerusalem appears here very heinous, nowhere worse, or more exceeding sinful. "The children of Judah," God's professing people, that "came forth out of the waters of Judah," Isa. xlviii. 1, have "done evil in my sight," under my eye, in my presence, they have affronted me to my face, which very much aggravates the affront. Or, they have done that which they know to be "evil in my sight," and in the highest degree offensive to me. Idolatry was the sin which was above all other sins evil in God's sight. Now here are two things charged upon them in their idolatry, which were very provoking:

1st. That they were very impudent in it towards God, and set him at defiance; ver. 30, "They have set their abominations," that is, their abominable idols, and the altars erected to them, in the house that is called by my name, in the very courts of the temple, to pollute it. Manasseh did so, 2 Kin. xxi. 1; xxiii. 12, as if they thought God would connive at it, or cared not though he was never so much displeased with it; or as if they would reconcile heaven and hell, God and Baal. The heart is the place which God has chosen to put his name there; if sin have the innermost and uppermost place there, we pollute the temple of the Lord, and therefore he resents nothing more than "setting up idols in the heart," Eze. xiv. 4.

2nd. That they were very barbarous in it towards their own children, ver. 31. They have particularly "built the high places of Tophet," where the image of Moloch was set up, "in the valley of the son of Hinnom," near adjoining to Jerusalem, and there "they burned their sons and their daughters in the fire," burned them alive, killed them, and killed them in the most cruel manner imaginable, to honour or appease those idols that were devils and not gods. This was sure the greatest instance that ever was of the power of Satan in the children of disobedience, and of the degeneracy and corruption of the human nature. One would willingly hope there were not many instances of such a barbarous idolatry, but it is amazing there should be any. That men could be so perfectly void of natural affection as to do a thing so inhuman as to burn little innocent children, and their own too; that they should be so perfectly void of natural religion as to think it lawful to do this; nay, to think it acceptable; surely it was in a way of righteous judgment, because they had changed the glory of God into the similitude of a beast, that God gave them up to such vile affections as changed them into worse than beasts. God saith of this it was "what he commanded them not, neither came it into his heart," which is not meant of his not commanding them thus to worship Moloch, (this he had expressly forbidden them,) but he had never commanded that his worshippers should be at such an expense, nor put such a force upon their natural affection, in honouring him. It never came into his heart to have children offered to him, yet they had forsaken his service for the service of such gods as, by commanding this, shewed themselves to be indeed enemies to mankind.

2. The destruction of Jerusalem appears here very terrible. That speaks misery enough in general, ver. 29, "The Lord hath rejected and forsaken the generation of his wrath." Sin makes those the generation of God's wrath that had been the generation of his love. And God will reject and quite forsake them who have thus by their impenitency made themselves "vessels of wrath fitted to destruction." He will disown them for his; Verily, I say unto you, I know you not; and he will give them up to the terrors of their own guilt, and leave them in those hands.

1st. Death shall triumph over them, ver. 32, 33. Sin reigns unto death, for that is the wages of it, the end of those things. Tophet, the valley adjoining to Jerusalem, "shall be called the valley of slaughter," for there multitudes shall be slain when, in their sallies out of the city, and their attempts to escape, they fall into the hands of the besiegers. Or, the valley of slaughtered ones, because thither the corpses of those that are slain shall be brought to be buried, all other places being full; and there they shall bury till there be no more place to make a grave. This speaks the multitude of those that shall die by the sword, pestilence, and famine. Death shall ride on prosperously with a dreadful pomp and power, conquering and to conquer. "The slain of the Lord shall be many." This valley of Tophet was a place where the citizens of Jerusalem walked to take the air; but it shall now be spoiled for that use, for it shall be so full of graves that there shall be no walking there, because of the danger of contracting a ceremonial pollution by the touch of a grave. There it was that they sacrificed some of their children, and dedicated others to Moloch, and there they should fall as victims to Divine justice. Tophet had formerly been the burying-place, or burning-place, of the dead bodies of the besiegers, when the Assyrian army was routed by an angel; and for this it was ordained of old, Isa. xxx. 33. But they having forgot this mercy, and made it the place of their sin, God will now turn it into a burying-place for the besieged. In allusion to this valley, hell is in the New Testament called Gehenna, the valley of Hinnom, for there were buried both the invading Assyrians and the revolting Jews; so hell is a receptacle after death both for infidels and hypocrites, the open enemies of God's church, and its treacherous friends. It is "the congregation of the dead;" it is prepared for the "generation of God's wrath." But so great shall that slaughter be that even the spacious valley of Tophet shall not be able to contain the slain; and at length there shall not be enough left alive to bury the dead, so that "the carcases of this people shall be meat" for the birds and beasts of prey, that shall feed upon them like carrion, and none shall have the concern or courage to frighten them away, as Rizpah did from the dead bodies of Saul's sons, 2 Sam. xxi. 10. This was according to the threatening in the law, and a branch of the curse, Deu. xxviii. 26, "Thy carcase shall be meat to the fowls and beasts, and no man shall fray them away." Thus do the law and the prophets agree, and the execution with both. The decent burying of the dead is a piece of humanity, in remembrance of what the dead body hath been, the tabernacle of a reasonable soul. Nay, it is a piece of divinity, in expectation of what the dead body shall be at the resurrection. The want of it has sometimes been an instance of the rage of men against God's witnesses, Rev. xi. 9. Here it is threatened as an instance of the wrath of God against his enemies, and it is an intimation that evil pursues sinners even after death.

2nd. Joy shall depart from them; ver. 34, "Then will I cause to cease the voice of mirth." God had called by his prophets, and by lesser judgments, to weeping and mourning, but they walked contrary to him, and would hear of nothing but joy and gladness, Isa. xxii. 12, 13. And what came of it? Now God called to lamentation, ver. 29, and he made his call effectual, leaving them neither cause nor heart for joy and gladness. They that will not weep shall weep; that will not, by the grace of God, be cured of their vain mirth shall, by the justice of God, be deprived of all mirth; for "when God judgeth, he will overcome." It is threatened here that there shall be nothing to rejoice in; there shall be none of the joy of weddings; no mirth, for there shall be no marriages. The comforts of life shall be abandoned, and all care to keep up mankind upon earth cast off; there shall be none of the voice of the bridegroom and the bride; no music, no nuptial songs; nor shall there be any more of the joy of harvest, for "the land shall be desolate," uncultivated, and unimproved. Both the cities of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem shall look thus melancholy; and when they thus look about them and see no cause to rejoice, no marvel if they retire into themselves, and find no heart to rejoice. Note, God can soon mar the mirth of the most jovial, and make it to cease, which is a reason why we should always rejoice with trembling; be merry and wise.

CHAPTER VIII.

The prophet proceeds in this chapter both to magnify and to justify the destruction that God was bringing upon this people; to shew how grievous it would be, and yet how righteous. I. He represents the judgments coming so very terrible, that death should appear so as most to be dreaded, and yet should be desired, ver. 1—3. II. He aggravates the wretched stupidity and wilfulness of this people, as that which brought this ruin upon them, ver. 4—12. III. He describes the great confusion and consternation that the whole land should be in upon the alarm of it, ver. 13—17. IV. The prophet is himself deeply affected with it, and lays it very much to heart, ver. 18—22.

AT that time, saith the LORD, they shall bring out
The bones of the kings of Judah, and the bones of his princes,
And the bones of the priests, and the bones of the prophets,
And the bones of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, out of their graves:
2 And they shall spread them before the sun, and the moon,
And all the host of heaven, whom they have loved,
And whom they have served, and after whom they have walked,
And whom they have sought, and whom they have worshipped:
They shall not be gathered, nor be buried;
They shall be for dung upon the face of the earth.
3 And death shall be chosen rather than life
By all the residue of them that remain of this evil family,
Which remain in all the places whither I have driven them,
Saith the LORD of hosts.

These verses might fitly have been joined to the close of the foregoing chapter, as giving a farther description of the dreadful desolation which the army of the Chaldeans should make in the land. It shall strangely alter the property of death itself, and for the worse too.

First. Death shall not now be, as it always used to be, the repose of the dead. When Job makes his court to the grave it is in hope of this, that "there he shall rest with kings and counsellors of the earth;" but now the ashes of the dead, even of kings and princes, shall be disturbed, and their bones scattered at the grave's mouth, Ps. cxli. 7. It was threatened in the close of the former chapter, that the slain should be unburied. That might be through neglect, and was not so strange; but here we find the graves of those that were buried industriously and maliciously opened by the victorious enemy; who, either for covetousness, in hopes to find treasure in the graves, or for spite to the nation, and in a rage against it, "brought out the bones of the kings of Judah, and the princes." The dignity of their sepulchres could not secure them; nay, did the more expose them to be rifled; but it was base and barbarous thus to trample upon royal dust. We will hope the bones of good Josiah were not disturbed, because he piously protected the bones of the man of God, when he burnt the bones of the idolatrous priests, 2 Kin. xxiii. 18. The bones of the priests and prophets too were digged up, and thrown about. Some think the false prophets, and the idol priests, God put this mark of ignominy upon them. But if they were God's prophets and his priests it is what the psalmist complains of, as the fruit of the outrage of the enemies, Ps. lxxix. 1, 2. Nay, those of the spiteful Chaldeans, that could not reach to violate the sepulchres of princes and priests, would rather play at small game than sit out; and therefore pulled the bones of the ordinary inhabitants of Jerusalem out of their graves. The barbarous nations were sometimes guilty of these absurd and inhuman triumphs over those they had conquered, and God permitted it here for a mark of his displeasure against the generation of his wrath, and for terror to those that survived. The bones being digged out of the graves were spread abroad upon the face of the earth in contempt, and to make the reproach the more spreading and lasting. They spread them to be dried, that they might carry them about in triumph, or might make fuel of them, or make

vii. 17, 18. The idolatries of Judah and Jerusalem were popular, and practised by men, women, and children. For "queen" there is another reading, which would suggest the idea of the stars generally, or the host of heaven. That by "queen of heaven" the moon is meant is almost certain, and it may be the same as Ashtoreth and Mylitta. The cakes offered to her are only mentioned by Jeremiah, but it has been conjectured that they were round and flat, and a combination of flour, honey, raisins, and other ingredients. Herodotus, however (Book ii., chap. 47), says that in Egypt the poor made cakes of flour in the form of swine, and after baking them offered them to the moon. Plato mentions cakes moistened with honey as among ancient offerings to the gods, and similar cakes are mentioned by Dionysius of Halicarnassus.

vii. 22, 23. This has been regarded as inconsistent with the facts of history, but without reason, for, as Mr. Henry says, the moral law actually came before the ceremonial law. Besides, it is quite a some superstitious use of them. They shall be spread before the sun; for they shall not be ashamed openly to avow the fact at noon-day; and before the moon and stars, even all the host of heaven, whom they have made idols of, ver. 2. From the mention of the sun, moon, and stars, which should be the unconcerned spectators of this tragedy, the prophet takes occasion to shew how they had idolised them, and paid those respects to them which they should have paid to God only; that it might be observed how little they got by worshipping the creature, for the creatures they worshipped, when they were in distress saw it but regarded it not, nor gave them any relief, but were rather pleased to see those abused in being vilified by whom they had been abused in being deified.

See how their respects to their idols are instanced in and enumerated, to shew how we ought to carry it towards our God. 1. They loved them; as amiable beings and bountiful benefactors they esteemed them, and delighted in them, and therefore did all that follows to them. 2. They served them, did all they could in honour of them, and thought nothing too much they could do; they conformed to all the laws of their superstition without disputing. 3. They walked after them, strove to imitate and resemble them, according to the characters and accounts of them they had received, which gave rise and countenance to much of the abominable wickedness of the heathen. 4. They sought them, and consulted them as oracles, appealed to them as judges, implored their favour, and prayed to them as their benefactors. 5. They worshipped them, gave them Divine honour, as having a sovereign dominion over them. Before these lights of heaven, whom they had courted, shall their dead bodies be cast, and left to putrefy, and to be as dung upon the face of the earth; and the sun's shining upon them will but make them the more noisome and offensive. Whatever we make a god of but the true God only it will stand us in no stead on the other side death and the grave, not for the body, much less for the soul.

Secondly. Death shall now be what it never used to be, the choice of the living. Not because there appears in it anything delightsome; on the contrary, death never appeared in more horrid frightful shapes than now, when they cannot promise themselves either a comfortable death or a human burial; and yet every thing in this world shall become so irksome, and all the prospects so black and dismal, that "death shall be chosen rather than life," ver. 3, not in a believing hope of happiness in the other life, but in an utter despair of any ease in this life. The nation is now reduced to a family, so small is the residue of those that remain in it; and it is an evil family, still as bad as ever, their hearts unhumbled, and their lusts unmortified. These remain alive, and that is all, in the many places whither they were driven by the judgments of God; some prisoners in the country of their enemies, others beggars in their neighbour's country, and others fugitives and vagabonds there, and in their own country. And though those that died died very miserably, yet those that survived, and were thus driven out, should live yet more miserably; so that they should choose death rather than life, and wish a thousand times they had fallen with them that fell by the sword. Let this cure us of the inordinate love of life, that the case may be such that it may become a burthen and terror, and we may be strongly tempted to choose strangling and death rather.

4 Moreover thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD;
Shall they fall, and not arise?
Shall he turn away, and not return?
5 Why then is this people of Jerusalem slidden back
By a perpetual backsliding?
They hold fast deceit,
They refuse to return.

But my people know not the judgment of the LORD.

And the law of the LORD is with us?
Lo, certainly in vain made he it;
The pen of the scribes is in vain.
9 The wise men are ashamed,
They are dismayed and taken:
Lo, they have rejected the word of the LORD;
And what wisdom is in them?

And their fields to them that shall inherit them:

Therefore shall they fall among them that fall:
In the time of their visitation they shall be cast down,

The prophet here is instructed to set before this people the folly of their impenitency, which was it that brought this ruin upon them. They are here represented as the most stupid, senseless people in the world, that would not be made wise by all the methods that Infinite Wisdom took to bring them to themselves and their right mind, and so to prevent the ruin that was coming upon them.

First. They would not attend to the dictates of reason; they would not act in the affairs of their souls with the same common prudence with which they acted in other things. Sinners would become saints if they would but shew themselves men; and religion would soon rule them, if right reason might. Observe it here; "Come, and let us reason together," saith the Lord; ver. 4, 5, "Shall men fall, and not arise?" If men happen to fall to the ground, to fall into the dirt, will they not get up again as fast as they can? They are not such fools as to lie still when they are down. Shall a man turn aside out of the right way? Yes, it is possible the most careful traveller may miss his way; but then as soon as he is aware of it will he not return? Yes, certainly, he will with all speed, and will thank him that shewed him his mistake. Thus men do in other things; "Why then is this people of Jerusalem slidden back by a perpetual backsliding?" Why do not they, when they are fallen into sin, hasten to get up again by repentance? Why do not they, when they see they have missed their way, correct their error and reform? No man in his wits will go on in a way that he knows will never bring him to his journey's end; "Why then is this people slidden back by a perpetual backsliding?" See the nature of sin: it is a backsliding, it is going back from the right way; not only into a bypath, but into a contrary path; back from the way that leads to life, to that which leads to utter destruction. And this backsliding, if Almighty grace do not interpose to prevent it, will be a perpetual backsliding; the sinner not only wanders endlessly, but proceeds endways towards ruin. The same subtlety of the tempter that brings men to sin holds them fast in it; and they contribute to their own captivity, "they hold fast deceit." Sin is a great cheat, and they hold it fast, they love it dearly, and resolve to stick to it, and baffle all the methods God takes to part between them and their sins. The excuses they make for their sins are deceits, and so are all their hopes of impunity, yet they hold fast these, and will not be undeceived, and therefore they refuse to return. Note, There is some deceit or other which those hold fast that go on wilfully in sinful ways; some lie in their right hand, by which they keep hold of their sins.

Secondly. They would not attend to the dictates of conscience, which is our reason reflecting upon ourselves and our own actions, ver. 6. Observe, 1. What expectations there were from them that they would bethink themselves; "I hearkened and heard." The prophet listened to see what effect his preaching had upon them; God himself listened, as one that desires not the death of sinners, that would have been glad to hear any thing that promised repentance, that would certainly have heard it, if there had been any thing said of that tendency, and would soon have answered it with comfort, as he did David when he said, "I will confess," Ps. xxxii. 5. God looks upon men, when they have done amiss, Job xxxiii. 27, to see what they will do next; he hearkens and hears. 2. How these expectations were disappointed; "They spake not aright," as I thought they would have done. They did not only not do right, but not so much as speak right; God could not get a good word from them, nothing on which to ground any favour to them, or hopes concerning them. There was none of them that spake aright, none that "repented him of his wickedness." Those that have sinned, then, and then only, speak aright when they speak of repenting, and it is sad when those that have made so much work for repentance do not say a word of repenting. God did not only not find any repenting of the national wickedness, and so helping to empty the measure of public guilt; but none repented of that particular wickedness which he knew himself guilty of. 1st. They did not so much as take the first step towards repentance; they did not so much as say, "What have I done?" There was no motion towards it, not the least sign or token of it. Note, True repentance begins in a serious and impartial inquiry into ourselves; what we have done, arising from a conviction that we have done amiss. 2nd. They were so far from repenting of their sins that they went on resolutely in their sins; "every one turned to his course," his wicked course, that course of sin which he had chosen and accustomed himself to, "as the horse rusheth into the battle," eager upon action, and scorning to be curbed. How the horse rusheth into the battle is elegantly described, Job xxxix. 21, &c., "He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted." Thus the daring sinner laughs at the threatenings of the word as bugbears, and runs violently upon the instruments of death and slaughter, and nothing will be restrained from him.

Thirdly. They would not attend to the dictates of providence, nor understand the voice of God in them, ver. 7. 1. It is an instance of their sottishness, that though they are God's people, and therefore should readily understand his mind upon every intimation of it, yet they "know not the judgment of the Lord," they apprehend not the meaning either of a mercy or of an affliction, not how to accommodate themselves to either, or answer God's intention in either. They know not how to improve the seasons of grace that God affords them when he sends them his prophets, nor how to make use of the rebukes they are under when his voice cries in the city. They discern not the signs of the times, Mat. xvi. 3, nor are aware how God is dealing with them. They know not that way of duty which God hath prescribed them, though it be written both in their hearts and in their books. 2. It is an aggravation of their sottishness, that there is so much sagacity in the inferior creatures. "The stork in the heaven knows her appointed times" of coming and continuing; so do other season-birds, the turtle and the swallow. These, by a natural instinct, change their quarters as the temper of the air alters; they come when the spring comes, and are gone we know not whither when the winter approacheth; probably into warmer climates, as some birds come with winter, and are gone when that is over.

Fourthly. They would not attend to the dictates of the written word. They say, "We are wise," but how can they say so? With what face can they pretend to any thing of wisdom, when they do not understand themselves so well as the brute creatures? Why, truly, they think they are wise, because the law of the Lord is with them, the book of the law, and the interpreters of it; and their neighbours, for the same reason, conclude they are wise, Deu. iv. 6. But their pretensions are groundless for all this; "Lo, certainly in vain made he it." Sure never any people had Bibles to so little purpose as they have. They had as good have been without the law, unless they had made a better use of it. God has indeed made it able to make men wise to salvation, but as to them it is

Hebrew idiom to say as here, "I did not command sacrifice but obedience," when the idea is that obedience was greatest. So, "I will have mercy and not sacrifice;" "Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life;" "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated." The habit of stating in an absolute form what was relative and comparative, is the simple explanation of such texts.

vii. 29. The words "O Jerusalem" are here added by our translators, because the city is personified as a woman who is exhorted to cut off her hair in token of mourning. There seems to be no allusion to the vow of the Nazarite, as some have thought.

vii. 30. The abominations of idolatry were actually set up in the Temple and its courts from time to time. It was so under Manasseh, as appears from texts like 2 Kings xxi. 4—8; xxiii. 4.

vii. 31. The "high places of Tophet" were the altars and other erections in honour of Moloch, whose worship was particularly con-made so in vain, for they are never the wiser for it; "The pen of the scribes," of those that first wrote the law, and of those that now write expositions of it, they are in vain. Both the favour of their God and the labour of their scribes is lost upon them; they receive the grace of God therein in vain. Note, There are many that enjoy abundance of the means of grace, that have great plenty of Bibles and ministers, but they have them in vain; they do not answer the end of their having them. But it might be said, They have some wise men among them, to whom the law and the pen of the scribes is not in vain. To this it is answered; ver. 9, "The wise men are ashamed," that is, they have reason to be so, that these have not made a better use of their wisdom, and lived more up to it. They are confounded and taken; all their wisdom has not served to keep them from those courses that tend to their ruin; they are taken in the same snares that others of their neighbours, who have not pretended to so much wisdom, are taken in, and filled with the same confusion. Those that have more knowledge than others, and yet do no better than others for their own souls, have reason to be ashamed. They talk of their wisdom, but "Lo, they have rejected the word of the Lord;" they would not be governed by it, would not follow the conduct of it, would not do what they knew, and then "what wisdom is in them?" None to any purpose; none that will be found to their praise at the great day, how much soever it is found to their pride now. The pretenders to wisdom, that said, "We are wise, and the law of the Lord is with us," were the priests and the false prophets; with them the prophet here deals plainly.

1. He threatens the judgments of God against them. Their families and estates shall be ruined, ver. 10. Their wives shall be given to others, when they are taken captives, and their fields shall be taken from them by the victorious enemy, and shall be given to those that shall inherit them; not only strip them for once, but take possession of them as their own, and acquire a property in them, which they shall transmit to their posterity. And, ver. 12, notwithstanding all their pretensions to wisdom and sanctity, "they shall fall among them that fall;" for if the blind lead the blind both shall fall together into the ditch. "In the time of their visitation," when the wickedness of the land comes to be inquired into, it will be found that they have contributed to it more than any, and therefore they shall be sure to be cast down, and cast out.

2. He gives a reason for these judgments, ver. 10—12, even the same account of their badness which we met with before, ch. vi. 13—15, where it was opened at large. 1st. They were greedy of the wealth of this world; which is bad enough in any, but worst in prophets and priests, who should be best acquainted with another world, and therefore should be most dead to this. But these, from the least to the greatest, were given to covetousness; the priests teach for hire, and the prophets divine for money, Mic. iii. 11. 2nd. They made no conscience of speaking truth, no, not when they spake as priests and prophets. Every one deals falsely, looks one way and rows another. There is no such thing as sincerity among them. 3rd. They flattered people in their sins, and so flattered them into destruction. They pretended to be the physicians of the state, but knew not how to apply proper remedies to its growing maladies; they healed them slightly, killed the patients with palliative cures; silencing their fears and complaints with, Peace, peace, all is well, and there is no danger, when the God of heaven was proceeding in his controversy with them, so that there could be no peace to them. 4th. When it was made to appear how basely they prevaricated, they were not at all ashamed of it, but rather gloried in it, ver. 12. They could not blush, so perfectly lost were they to all sense of virtue and honour; when they were convicted of the grossest forgeries, they would justify what they had done, and laugh at those whom they had imposed upon. Such as these were ripe for ruin.

13 I will surely consume them, saith the LORD:
There shall be no grapes on the vine,
Nor figs on the fig tree,
And the leaf shall fade, [from them.
And the things that I have given them shall pass away
14 Why do we sit still? [cities,
Assemble yourselves, and let us enter into the defenced
And let us be silent there:
For the LORD our God hath put us to silence,
And given us water of gall to drink,
Because we have sinned against the LORD.
15 We looked for peace, but no good came;
And for a time of health, and behold trouble!
16 The snorting of his horses was heard from Dan:
The whole land trembled at the sound of the neighing of his strong ones;
For they are come, and have devoured the land, and all that is in it;
The city, and those that dwell therein.
17 For, behold, I will send serpents, cockatrices, among you,
Which will not be charmed,
And they shall bite you, saith the LORD.
18 When I would comfort myself against sorrow,
My heart is faint in me.
19 Behold the voice of the cry of the daughter of my people
Because of them that dwell in a far country:
Is not the LORD in Zion?
Is not her king in her?
Why have they provoked me to anger with their graven
And with strange vanities? [images,
20 The harvest is past, the summer is ended,
And we are not saved.
21 For the hurt of the daughter of my people am I hurt;
I am black; astonishment hath taken hold on me.
22 Is there no balm in Gilead;
Is there no physician there?
Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?

BALM OF GILEAD.

In these verses we have,

First. God threatening the destruction of a sinful people. He hath borne long with them, but they are still more and more provoking, and therefore now their ruin is resolved on; "I will surely consume them," ver. 13. Consuming I will consume them, not only surely, but utterly consume them; will follow them with one judgment after another, till they are quite consumed. It is a consumption determined, Isa. x. 23.

1. They shall be quite stripped of all their comforts; ver. 13, "There shall be no grapes on the vine." Some understand it as speaking their sin. God came looking for grapes from this vineyard, seeking fruit upon this fig-tree, but he found none, as Isa. v. 2; Lu. xiii. 6; nay, they had not so much as leaves, Mat. xxi. 19. But it is rather to be understood of God's judgments upon them, and may be meant literally; the enemy shall seize the fruits of the earth, shall pluck the grapes and figs for themselves, and beat down the very leaves with them. Or, rather, figuratively; they shall be deprived of all their comforts, and shall have nothing left them wherewith to make glad their hearts. It is expounded in the last clause; "The things that I have given them shall pass away from them." Note, God's gifts are upon condition, and revokable upon the nonperformance of the condition. Mercies abused are forfeited, and it is just with God to take the forfeiture.

2. They shall be set upon by all manner of grievances, and surrounded with calamities; ver. 17, "I will send serpents among you," the Chaldean army, fiery serpents, flying serpents, cockatrices; these shall bite them with their venomous teeth, give them wounds that shall be mortal; and they shall not be charmed, as some serpents used to be, with music. These are serpents of another nature, that are not so wrought upon; or they are as the deaf adder, that stops her ear, and will not hear the voice of the charmer. The enemies are so intent upon making slaughter, that it will be to no purpose to speak them fair, or offer any thing to pacify them, or mollify them, or bring them to a better temper. No peace with God, therefore none with them.

Secondly. The people sinking into despair under the pressure of those calamities. They that were void of fear, when the trouble was at a distance, and set it at defiance, are void of hope now it breaks in upon them; and have no heart either to make head against it or bear up under it, ver. 14. They cannot think themselves safe in the open villages; "Why do we sit still" here? Let us assemble, and go in a body "into the defenced cities." Though they could expect no other but to be surely cut off there at last, yet not so soon as in the country, and therefore let us go "and be silent there;" let us attempt nothing, nor so much as make a complaint, for to what purpose? It is not a submissive, but a sullen silence that they here condemn themselves to. Those that are most jovial in their prosperity, commonly despond most and are most melancholy in trouble. Now observe what it is that sinks them.

1. They are sensible that God is angry with them. "The Lord our God has put us to silence," hath struck us with astonishment, and given us water of gall to drink, which is both bitter and stupifying, or intoxicating; Ps. lx. 3, "Thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment." We had better sit still than rise up and fall; better say nothing than say nothing to the purpose. To what purpose is it to contend with our fate, when God himself is become our enemy, and fights against us? Because we have sinned against the Lord, therefore we are brought to this plunge. This may be taken as the language, 1st. Of their indignation. They seem to quarrel with God, as if he had dealt hardly with them, in putting them to silence, not permitting them to speak for themselves, and then telling them it was because they had sinned against him. Thus men's foolishness perverts their way, and then their hearts fret against the Lord. Or, rather, 2nd. Of their convictions. At length they begin to see the hand of God lifted up against them, and stretched out in the calamities under which they are now groaning, and to own that they have provoked him to contend with them. Note, Sooner or later God will bring the most obstinate to acknowledge both his providence and his justice in all the troubles they are brought into; to see and say, both that it is his hand and that he is righteous.

2. They are sensible that the enemy is likely to be too hard for them, ver. 16. They are soon apprehensive that it is to no purpose to make head against such a mighty force; they and their people are quite dispirited; and when the courage of a nation is gone, their numbers will stand them in little stead. "The snorting of his horses was heard from Dan;" that is, the report of the nected with Tophet, or the valley of the son of Hinnom. The high places may have been especially fire-altars for the offering of human sacrifices. From this and various other places it would seem that children were the ordinary victims.

vii. 32. It has been thought that the term "valley of slaughter" implies that the slaughter would take place in the valley, but it is equally probable that the reference is to the burial there of those who had been slain in the fall of the city.

vii. 34. Bush and others note that in the East the wedding processions are accompanied by bands of singers and musicians.

viii. 1. It seems not to have been usual to lay the dead of important families in common graves filled up with earth, but in excavated sepulchres, or caverns and vaults, which were sometimes broken into and ransacked. This will excite no surprise when it is remembered that in times of peril riches were often secreted in the tombs. Among some pagan people it was also customary to bury formidable strength of their cavalry was soon carried all the nation over, and everybody trembled at the sound of the neighing of his steeds: "for they are come," and there is no opposing them; they "have devoured the land, and all that is in the city;" both town and country is laid waste before them; not only the wealth, but the inhabitants of both, "those that dwell therein." Note, When God appears against us, every thing else that is against us appears very formidable; whereas, if he be for us, every thing appears very despicable, Rom. viii. 31.

3. They are disappointed in their expectations of deliverance out of their troubles, as well as when their troubles came they were a surprise to them; and this double disappointment very much aggravated their calamity. 1st. The trouble came when they little expected it; ver. 15, "We looked for peace," the continuance of our peace, "but no good came," no good news from abroad; we looked for a time of health and prosperity to our nation, but behold trouble, the alarms of war; for, as it follows, ver. 16, the noise of the enemies' horses was heard from Dan. Their false prophets had cried, Peace, peace, to them, which made it the more terrible when the scene of war opened on a sudden. This complaint will occur again, ch. xiv. 19. 2nd. The deliverance did not come when they had long expected it; ver. 20, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended;" that is, there is a great deal of time gone. Harvest and summer are parts of the year, and when they are gone the year draws towards a conclusion, so the meaning is. One year passeth after another, one campaign after another, and yet our affairs are in as ill a posture as ever they were; no relief comes, nor is any thing done towards it; "We are not saved." Nay, there is a great deal of opportunity lost; the season of action is over and slipped, the summer and harvest are gone, and a cold and melancholy winter succeeds. Note, The salvation of God's church and people oftentimes goes on very slowly, and God keeps his people long in the expectation of it, for wise and holy ends. Nay, they stand in their own light, and put a bar in their own door, and are not saved, because they are not ready for salvation.

4. They are deceived in those things that were their confidence, and which they thought would have secured their peace to them; ver. 19, "The daughter of my people" cries, cries aloud, "because of them that dwell in a far country," because of the foreign enemy that invades them, that comes from a far country to take possession of ours; this occasions the cry. And what is the cry? It is this; "Is not the Lord in Zion? Is not her king in her?" These were the two things that they had all along buoyed up themselves with, and depended upon. 1st. That they had among them the temple of God, and the tokens of his special presence with them. The common cant was, "Is not the Lord in Zion?" What danger then need we fear? And they held by this when the trouble was breaking in upon them, Surely we shall do well enough, for have we not God among us? But when it grew to an extremity, it was an aggravation of their misery that they had thus flattered themselves. 2nd. That they had the throne of the house of David. As they had a temple, so they had a monarchy jure divino,—' by Divine right.' Is not Zion's king in her? And will not Zion's God protect Zion's king and his kingdom? Surely he will; but why does he not? What, say they, hath Zion neither a god nor a king to stand by her, and help her, that she is thus run down, and likely to be ruined? This outcry of theirs reflects upon God, as if his power and promise were broken or weakened; and therefore he returns an answer to it immediately; "Why have they provoked me to anger with their graven images?" They quarrel with God, as if he had dealt unkindly by them in forsaking them, whereas they, by their idolatry, had driven him from them; they have withdrawn from their allegiance to him, and so have thrown themselves out of his protection. They "fret themselves, and curse their king and their God," Isa. viii. 21, when it is their own sin that separates between them and God, Isa. lix. 2. They feared not the Lord, and then what can a king do for them? Hos. x. 3.

Thirdly. We have here the prophet himself bewailing the calamity and ruin of his people; for there were more of the lamentations of Jeremiah than those we find in the book that bears that title. Observe here,

1. How great his griefs were. He was an eyewitness of the desolations of his country, and saw those things which by the spirit of prophecy he had foreseen. In the foresight, much more in the sight of them, he cries out, "My heart is faint in me," I sink, I die away at the consideration of it; ver. 18, "When I would comfort myself against my sorrow," I do but labour in vain; nay, every attempt to alleviate the grief doth but aggravate it. It is our wisdom and duty, under mournful events, to do what we can to comfort ourselves against our sorrow, by suggesting to ourselves such considerations as are proper to allay the grief, and balance the grievance. But sometimes the sorrow is such, that the more it is repressed the more strongly it recoils. It may sometimes be the case of very good men, as of the prophet here, whose soul refused to be comforted, and fainted at the cordial, Ps. lxxvii. 2, 3. He tells, ver. 21, what was the matter; it is "for the hurt of the daughter of my people," that I am thus hurt; it is for their sin, and the miseries they have brought upon themselves by it; it is for this that "I am black," that I look black, that I go in black as mourners do, and that "astonishment hath taken hold on me," so that I know not what to do, nor which way to turn. Note, The miseries of our country ought to be very much the grief of our souls. A gracious spirit will be a public spirit, a tender spirit, a mourning spirit. It becomes us to lament the miseries of our fellow-creatures, much more to lay to heart the calamities of our country, and especially of the church of God, to grieve for the affliction of Joseph. Jeremiah had prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem, and though the truth of his prophecy was questioned, yet he did not rejoice in the proof of the truth of it, by the accomplishment of it, preferring the welfare of his country before his own reputation. If Jerusalem had repented and been spared, he would have been far from fretting as Jonah did. Jeremiah had many enemies in Judah and Jerusalem, that hated, and reproached, and persecuted him,—and in the judgments brought upon them, God reckoned with them for it, and pleaded his prophet's cause,—yet he was far from rejoicing in it; so truly did he forgive his enemies, and desire that God would forgive them.

2. How small his hopes were; ver. 22, "Is there no balm in Gilead?" No medicine proper for a sick and dying kingdom? "Is there no physician there?" No skilful, faithful hand to apply the medicine? He looks upon the case to be deplorable, and past relief. There is no balm in Gilead that can cure the disease of sin; no physician there that can restore the health of a nation quite overrun by such a foreign army as that of the Chaldeans. The desolations made are irreparable, and the disease is presently come to such a height, that there is no checking it. Or this verse may be understood as laying all the blame of the incurableness of their disease upon themselves; and so the question must be answered affirmatively; "Is there no balm in Gilead?" "No physician there?" Yes, certainly there is, God is able to help and heal them; there is a sufficiency in him to redress all their grievances. Gilead was a place in their own land, not far off. They had among themselves God's law and his prophets, with the help of which they might have been brought to repentance, and their ruin might have been prevented; they have princes and priests, whose business it was to reform the nation, and redress their grievances. What could have been done more than has been done for their recovery? Why then is not their health restored? Certainly it was not long of God, but of themselves; it was not for want of balm and a physician, but because they would not admit the application, nor submit to the methods of cure. The physician and physic were both ready, but the patient was wilful and irregular, would not be tied to rules, but must be humoured. Note, If sinners die of their wounds, their blood is upon their own heads. The blood of Christ is balm in Gilead, his Spirit is the physician there, both sufficient, all-sufficient, so that they might have been healed, but would not.

CHAPTER IX.

In this chapter the prophet goes on faithfully to reprove sin, and to threaten God's judgments for it, and yet bitterly to lament both, as one that neither rejoiced at iniquity, nor was glad at calamities. I. He here expresseth his great grief for the miseries of Judah and Jerusalem, and his detestation of their sins, which brought those miseries upon them, ver. 1—11. II. He justifies God in the greatness of the destruction brought upon them, ver. 9, 12—16. III. He calls upon others to bewail the woful case of Judah and Jerusalem, ver. 17—22. He shews them the folly and vanity of trusting in their own strength, or wisdom, or the privileges of their circumcision, or any thing but God only, ver. 23—26

OH that my head were waters,
And mine eyes a fountain of tears,
That I might weep day and night
For the slain of the daughter of my people!
2 Oh that I had in the wilderness a lodging place of wayfaring men;
That I might leave my people, and go from them!
For they be all adulterers,
An assembly of treacherous men
3 And they bend their tongues like their bow for lies:
But they are not valiant for the truth upon the earth;
For they proceed from evil to evil,
And they know not me, saith the LORD.
4 Take ye heed every one of his neighbour,
And trust ye not in any brother:
For every brother will utterly supplant,
And every neighbour will walk with slanders.
5 And they will deceive every one his neighbour,
And will not speak the truth:
They have taught their tongue to speak lies,
And weary themselves to commit iniquity.
6 Thine habitation is in the midst of deceit;
Through deceit they refuse to know me, saith the LORD
7 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts,
Behold, I will melt them, and try them;
For how shall I do for the daughter of my people?
8 Their tongue is as an arrow shot out;
It speaketh deceit:
One speaketh peaceably to his neighbour with his mouth,
But in heart he layeth his wait.
9 Shall I not visit them for these things? saith the LORD:
Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?
10 For the mountains will I take up a weeping and wailing,
And for the habitations of the wilderness a lamentation,
Because they are burned up, so that none can pass through them;
Neither can men hear the voice of the cattle;
Both the fowl of the heavens and the beast are fled;
They are gone.
11 And I will make Jerusalem heaps, and a den of dragons;
And I will make the cities of Judah desolate, without an inhabitant.

The prophet, being commissioned both to foretell the destruction coming upon Judah and Jerusalem and to point out the sin for which that destruction was brought upon them, here, as elsewhere, speaks of both very feelingly. What he said of both came from the heart, and therefore one would have thought it should have reached to the heart.

First. He abandons himself to sorrow, in consideration of the calamitous condition of his people, which he sadly laments, as one that preferred Jerusalem before his chief joy, and her grievances before his chief sorrows.

1. He laments the slaughter of the persons; the blood shed, and the lives lost; ver. 1, "Oh that my head were waters," quite melted and dissolved with grief, that so mine eyes might be "a fountain of tears," weeping abundance continually, and without intermission, still sending forth fresh floods of tears, as there still occur fresh occasions for them. The same word in Hebrew signifies both the eye and a fountain; as if in this land of sorrows our eyes were designed rather for weeping than seeing. Jeremiah wept much, and yet wished he could weep more, that he might affect a stupid people, and rouse them to a due sense of the hand of God gone out against them. Note, It becomes us, while we are here in this vale of tears, to conform to the temper precious objects along with the dead; hence the invaders of Judea, who were heathen, would break open the sepulchres and drag out their contents, as a matter of course, in search of plunder. In the Divine arrangements this unholy avarice would give a tongue to the dead bones of sinners, causing them to remind living sinners of a holy God, whose justice appeared in this posthumous disgrace. It would be a fine illustration of the folly and vanity of idol gods, for the sun, and moon, and all the host of heaven, i.e., of the stars, could not hide the shame of those who had loved and served them in life, and were now dishonoured in death.

viii. 6. The word for "course" is plural in ancient versions and in the ordinary Hebrew text. The Jews say it should be singular, but without good reason, because the Hebrews followed many evil courses, and in many ways ran into peril, like the horse in a battle.

viii. 7. The stork, turtle-dove, swallow, and crane are all migratory, and are very regular in observing their times of arrival and deof the climate, and to sow in tears: "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted" hereafter; but let them expect that, while they are here, the clouds will still return after the rain. While we find our hearts such fountains of sin, it is fit our eyes should be fountains of tears. But Jeremiah's grief here is upon the public account. He would "weep day and night," not so much for the death of his own near relations, but for "the slain of the daughter of his people;" the multitudes of his countrymen that fell by the sword of war. Note, When we hear of the numbers of the slain in great battles and sieges, we ought to be much affected with it, and not to make a light matter of it; yea, though they be not of the daughter of our people; for, whatever people they are of, they are of the same human nature with us; and there are so many precious lives lost, as dear to them as ours to us, and so many precious souls gone into eternity.

2. He laments the desolations of the country. This he brings in, ver. 10, (for passionate mourners do not use to be very methodical in their discourses,) Not only for the towns and cities, but "for the mountains will I take up a weeping and wailing;" not barren mountains, but the fruitful hills with which Judea abounded; "and for the habitations of the wilderness," or, rather the pastures of the plain, that used to be clothed with flocks, or covered over with corn; and a goodly sight it was. But now they are burnt up by the Chaldean army, which, according to the custom of war, destroyed the forage, and carried off all the cattle; so that none dares to pass through them, for fear of meeting with some parties of the enemy; none cares to pass through them, every thing looks so melancholy and frightful. None have any business to pass through them, for they hear not "the voice of the cattle" there as usual, the bleating of the sheep, and the lowing of the oxen, that grateful music to the owners. Nay, "both the fowl of the heavens and the beasts are fled;" either frightened away by the rude noises and terrible fires which the enemies make, or forced away because there is no subsistence for them. Note, God has many ways of turning a fruitful land into barrenness for the wickedness of them that dwell therein; and the havoc war makes in a country cannot but be for a lamentation to all tender spirits; for it is a tragedy which destroys the stage it is acted on.

Secondly. He abandons himself to solitude, in consideration of the scandalous character and carriage of his people. Though he dwells in Judah, where God is known, in Salem, where his tabernacle is, yet he is ready to cry out, "Woe is me, that I sojourn in Mesech," Ps. cxx. 5. While all his neighbours are fleeing to the defenced cities, and Jerusalem especially, in dread of the enemies' rage, ch. iv. 5, 6, he is contriving to retire into some desert, in detestation of his people's sin; ver. 2, "Oh that I had in the wilderness a lodging-place of wayfaring men;" such a lonely cottage to dwell in as they have in the deserts of Arabia, which are uninhabited, for travellers to repose themselves in, "that I might leave my people, and go from them;" not only because of the ill usage they gave him, he would rather venture himself among the wild beasts of the desert than among such treacherous people; but rather because his righteous soul was vexed from day to day, as Lot's was in Sodom, with the wickedness of their conversation, 2 Pet. ii. 7, 8. This doth not speak any intention or resolution he had thus to retire. God had cut him out work among them, which he must not quit for his own ease; we must not go out of the world, as bad as it is, before our time. If he could not reform them, he could bear a testimony against them; if he could not do good to many, yet he might to some; but it speaks a temptation he was in to leave them, and a threatening that they should be deprived of his ministry, and especially the holy indignation he had against their abominable wickedness, notwithstanding all the pains he had taken with them to reclaim them. It made him even weary of his life to see them dishonouring God as they did, and destroying themselves. Time was, when the place which God had chosen to put his name there was the desire and delight of good men. David in a wilderness longed to be again in the courts of God's house; but now Jeremiah, in the courts of God's house, (for there he was when he said this,) wisheth himself in a wilderness. Those have made themselves very miserable that have made God's people and ministers weary of them, and willing to get from them. Now, to justify his willingness to leave them, he shews,

1. What he himself had observed among them. He would not think of leaving them because they were poor and in distress, but because they were wicked.

1st. They were filthy; "They be all adulterers," that is, the generality of them, ch. v. 8. They all either practised this sin or connived at those that did. Lewdness and uncleanness was that crying sin of Sodom, at which righteous Lot was vexed in soul; and it is a sin that renders men loathsome in the eyes of God and all good men; it makes men an abomination.

2nd. They were false. This is the sin that is most enlarged upon here; they that had been unfaithful to their God were so to one another, and it was a part of their punishment, as well as their sin; for even those that love to cheat yet hate to be cheated. First. Go into their solemn meetings, either for the exercises of religion or the administration of justice, or for commerce, either to church, court, or exchange, and they are an "assembly of treacherous men;" they are so by consent, they strengthen one another's hands in doing any thing that is perfidious. There they will cheat deliberately and industriously, with design, with a malicious design, for "they bend their tongues like their bow for lies," with a great deal of craft; their tongues are fitted for lying, as a bow that is bent is for shooting, and are as constantly used for that purpose. Their tongue turns as naturally to a lie as the bow to the string; "but they are not valiant for the truth upon the earth." Their tongues are like a bow strung, with which they might do good service, if they would use that art and resolution which they are so much masters of in the cause of truth; but they will not do so. They appear not in defence of the truth of God, which were delivered to them by the prophets; but even those that could not deny them to be truths yet were content to see them run down. In the administration of justice they have not courage to stand by an honest cause, that has truth on its side, if greatness and power be on the other side. Those that will be faithful to the truth must be valiant for it, and not be daunted by the opposition given to it, nor fear the face of man. "They are not valiant for the truth in the land," the land which has truth for the glory of it. Truth is fallen in the land, and they dare not lend a hand to help it up, Isa. lix. 14, 15. We must answer another day not only for our enmity in opposing truth, but our cowardice in defending it. Secondly. Go into their families, and you will find they will cheat their own brethren; "every brother will utterly supplant," they will trip up one another's heels if they can, for they lie at catch to seek all advantages against those they hope to make a hand of. Jacob had his name from supplanting; it is the word here used, they followed him in his name, but not in his true character, without guile. So very false are they, that you cannot trust in a brother, but must stand as much upon your guard as if you were dealing with a stranger, with a Canaanite, that has balances of deceit in his hand. Things are come to an ill pass indeed, when a man cannot put confidence in his own brother. Thirdly. Go into company, and observe both their commerce and their conversation, and you will find there is nothing of sincerity or common honesty among them; Nec hospes ab hospite tutus,—'The host and the guest are in danger from each other.' The best advice a wise man can give you is, "to take heed every one of his neighbour;" nay, of his friend, so some read it, of him whom he has befriended, and who pretends friendship to him. No man thinks himself bound either to be grateful or to be sincere. Take them in their converse, "and every neighbour will walk with slanders," they care not what ill they say one of another, though never so false. That way that the slander goes they will go; they will walk with it. They will walk about from house to house, carrying slanders along with them, all the ill-natured stories they can pick up or invent to make mischief. Take them in their trading and bargaining, "and they will deceive every one his neighbour," will say any thing, though they know it to be false, for their own advantage. Nay, they will lie for lying sake, to keep their tongues in use to it, for they "will not speak the truth," but will tell a deliberate lie, and laugh at it when they have done.

And that which aggravates the sin of this false and lying generation is, 1*st.* That they are ingenious to sin. "They have taught their tongues to speak lies;" implying that, through the reluctancies of natural conscience, they found it difficult to bring themselves to it. Their tongues would have spoken truth, but they taught them to speak lies, and by degrees have made themselves masters of the art of lying, and have got such a habit of it, that use has made it a second nature to them. They learned it when they were young, for "the wicked are estranged from the womb, speaking lies," Ps. lviii. 3; and now they are grown dexterous at it. 2*nd.* That they are industrious to sin; they "weary themselves to commit iniquity." They put a force upon their conscience to bring themselves to it, and tire out their convictions by offering them a continual violence; and they take a great deal of pains till they have even spent themselves in bringing about their malicious designs; they are wearied with their sinful pursuits, and yet not weary of them. The service of sin is a perfect drudgery; men run themselves out of breath in it, and put themselves to a great deal of toil to damn their own souls. 3*rd.* That they grow worse and worse; ver. 3, "They proceed from evil to evil," from one sin to another, from one degree of sin to another. They began with lesser sins, nemo repente fit turpissimus,—'no one reaches the height of vice at once;' they began with equivocating and bantering, but at last come to downright lying; and they are now proceeding to greater sins yet, for "they know not me, saith the Lord." And where men have no knowledge of God, or no consideration of what they have known of him, what good can be expected from them? Men's ignorance of God is the cause of all their ill carriage one towards another.

2. The prophet shews what God had informed him of their wickedness, and what he had determined against them.

1st. God had marked their sin. He could tell the prophet, (and he speaks of it with compassion,) what sort of people they were that he had to deal with; "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest," Rev. ii. 13. So here, ver. 6, "Thine habitation is in the midst of deceit," that is, All about thee are addicted to it, therefore stand upon thy guard. If all men are liars, it concerns us to beware of men, and be wise as serpents. They are deceitful men, therefore there is little hopes of thy doing any good among them; for, make things never so plain, they have some trick or other wherewith to shuffle off their convictions. This charge is enlarged upon, ver. 8: their tongue was a bow bent, ver. 3, plotting and preparing mischief; here it is "an arrow shot out," putting in execution what they had projected. It is as 'a slaying arrow,' so some readings of the original have it. Their tongue has been to many an instrument of death. They speak peaceably to their neighbours, against whom they are at the same time lying in wait; as Joab kissed Abner when he was about to kill him; and Cain, that he might not be suspected of any ill design, talked with his brother freely and familiarly. Note, Fair words, when they are not attended with good intentions, are despicable; but when they are intended as a cloak and cover for wicked intentions they are abominable; and while they did all this injury to one another they put a great contempt upon God; Not only they know not me, but, ver. 6, through deceit, through the delusions of the false prophets, they refuse to know me; they are so cheated into a good opinion of their own ways, the ways of their own heart, that they desire not the knowledge of God's ways. Or, they are so wedded to this sinful course they are in, and so betwitched with that, and the gains of that, that they will by no means admit the knowledge of God, because that would be a check upon them in their sins. This is the ruin of sinners, they might be taught the good knowledge of the Lord, and they will not learn it; and where no knowledge of God is what good can be expected? Hos. iv. 1.

2nd. He had marked them for ruin, ver. 7, 9, 11. Those that will not know God as their lawgiver, shall be made to know him as their judge. God determines here to bring his judgments upon them, for the refining of some, and the ruining of the rest. First. Some shall be refined, ver. 7, because they are thus corrupt; "Behold, I will melt them, and try them," will bring them into trouble, and see what that will do to bring them to repentance; whether the furnace of affliction will purify them from their dross, and whether when they are melted, they will be new cast into a better mould. He will make trial of lesser afflictions, before he brings upon them utter destruction, for he desires not the death of sinners. They shall not be rejected as reprobate silver, till the founder has melted in vain, ch. vi. 29, 30. "For how shall I do for the daughter of my people?" He speaks as one consulting with himself what to do with them that might be for the best; and as one that could not find in his heart to cast them off, and give them up to ruin, till he had first tried all means likely to bring them to repentance. Or, how else shall I do for them? They are grown so very corrupt, that there is no other way with them but to put them into the furnace; what other course can I take with them? Isa. v. 4, 5. It is "the daughter of my people," and I must do something to vindicate my own honour, which will be reflected upon if I connive at their wickedness. I must do something to reduce and reform them. A parent corrects his own children because they are his own. Note, When God afflicts his people, it is with a gracious design to mollify and reduce them; it is but when need is, and when he knows it is the best method he can use. Secondly. The rest shall be ruined; ver. 9, "Shall I not visit for these things?" Fraud and falsehood are sins which God hates, and which he will reckon for; "Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this," that is so universally corrupt, and by their impudence in sin even dares and defies Divine vengeance? The sentence is passed, the decree is gone forth; ver. 11, "I will make Jerusalem heaps" of rubbish, and lay it in such ruins that it shall be fit for nothing but to be "a den of dragons;" and the cities of Judah shall be a desolation. God makes them so, for he gives the enemy warrant and power to do it; but why is the holy city made a heap? The answer is ready, because it was become an unholy one.

12 Who is the wise man, that may understand this?
And who is he to whom the mouth of the LORD hath spoken, that he may declare it,
For what the land perisheth
And is burned up like a wilderness, that none passeth through?

parture. In Palestine the storks arrive in immense numbers about the 24th of March, and after scouring the whole region most of them depart. The turtle-doves arrive early in April. For "swallow" here we should read "crane," and for "crane" "swift," or "swallow," as our translators have reversed the order of the names. In Palestine the swift is more regular in its migrations than the swallow, which occurs there all the year round. The crane comes in about the same time as the stork, but apparently a few days later.

viii. 14. For water of "gall" the margin has "poison," which is more correct, as poisoned water is intended, but what poison is uncertain.

viii. 16. In this verse all the verbs are better translated in the present tense. "The snorting of his horses is heard from Dan," &c.

viii. 17. The charming of serpents is an ancient practice, frequently mentioned in Scripture. The name of "cockatrices" here is

13 And the LORD saith,
Because they have forsaken my law
Which I set before them,
And have not obeyed my voice,
Neither walked therein;
14 But have walked after the imagination of their own heart,
And after Baalim, which their fathers taught them:

Behold, I will feed them, even this people, with worm-
And give them water of gall to drink. [wood,
16 I will scatter them also among the heathen,
Whom neither they nor their fathers have known:
And I will send a sword after them,
Till I have consumed them.

Consider ye, and call for the mourning women, that they may come;
And send for cunning women, that they may come·

MOURNING WOMEN.

18 And let them make haste, and take up a wailing for us,
That our eyes may run down with tears,
And our eyelids gush out with waters.
19 For a voice of wailing is heard out of Zion,
How are we spoiled! we are greatly confounded,
Because we have forsaken the land,
Because our dwellings have cast us out.
20 Yet hear the word of the LORD, O ye women,
And let your ear receive the word of his mouth,
And teach your daughters wailing,
And every one her neighbour lamentation
21 For death is come up into our windows,
And is entered into our palaces,
To cut off the children from without,
And the young men from the streets.
22 Speak, Thus saith the LORD, [open field,
Even the carcases of men shall fall as dung upon the
And as the handful after the harvestman, and none shall

Two things the prophet designs in these verses, with reference to the approaching destruction of Judah and Jerusalem: 1. To convince people of the justice of God in it; that they had by sin brought it upon themselves, and that therefore they had no reason to quarrel with God, who did them no wrong at all, but a great deal of reason to fall out with their sins, which did them all this mischief. 2. To affect people with the greatness of the desolation that was coming, and the miserable effects of it; that by a terrible prospect of it they might be awakened to repentance and reformation, which was the only way to prevent it, or at least mitigate their own share in it. This being designed,

First. He calls for the thinking men, by them to shew people the equity of God's proceedings, though they seemed harsh and severe; ver. 12, Who, where is the wise man or the prophet, "to whom the mouth of the Lord hath spoken?" You boast of your wisdom, and of the prophets you have among you; produce me any one that has but the free use of human reason, or any acquaintance with Divine revelation, and he will soon understand this himself, and it will be so clear to him that he will be ready to declare it to others, that there is a just ground of God's controversy with this people. Do these wise men inquire "for what the land perisheth?" What is the matter, that such a change is made with this land? It used to be a land that God cared for, and he had his eyes upon it for good, Deu. xi. 12. But it is now a land that he has forsaken, and that his face is against. It used to flourish as the garden of the Lord, and to be replenished with inhabitants, but now it is burnt up like a wilderness, that none passeth through it, much less cares to settle in it. It was supposed long ago that it would be asked, when it came to this, "Wherefore has the Lord done thus unto this land? What means the heat of this great anger?" Deu. xxix. 24. To which question God here gives a full answer, before which all flesh must be silent. He produceth out of the record,

1. The indictment preferred and proved against them, upon which they had been found guilty, ver. 13, 14. It is charged upon them, and it cannot be denied, 1st. That they have revolted from their allegiance to their rightful Sovereign; therefore God has forsaken their land, and justly, because they have forsaken his law, which he had so plainly, so fully, so frequently, set before them, and had not observed his orders, nor obeyed his voice, nor walked in the ways that he had appointed. Here their wickedness began, in the omission of their duty to their God and a contempt of his authority. But it did not end there. It is farther charged upon them, 2nd. That they have entered themselves into the service of pretenders and usurpers; have not only withdrawn themselves from their obedience to their prince, but have taken up arms against him. For, First. They have acted according to the dictates of their own lusts; have set up their own will, the wills of the flesh, and the carnal mind, in competition with, and contradiction to, the will of God; they "have walked after the imagination of their own heart;" they would do as they pleased, whatever God and conscience said to the contrary. Secondly. They have worshipped the creatures of their own fancy, the work of their own hands, according to the tradition received from their fathers. "They have walked after Baalim;" the word is plural. They had many Baals, Baal-peor, and Baal-berith, the Baal of this place, and the Baal of the other place; for they had lords many, "which their fathers taught them" to worship, but which the God of their fathers had again and again forbidden. This was it for which the land perished. The King of kings never makes war thus upon his own subjects but when they treacherously depart from him, and rebel against him, and it is become necessary, by this means, to chastise their rebellion and reduce them to their allegiance; and they themselves shall at length acknowledge that he is just in all that is brought upon them.

2. The judgment given upon this indictment, the sentence upon the convicted rebels, which must now be executed; for it was righteous, and nothing could be moved in arrest of it. The Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, hath said it, ver. 15, 16, and who can reverse it? 1st. That all their comforts at home shall be poisoned and embittered to them; "I will feed this people with wormwood," or, rather, with wolf's-bane, for it signifies an herb that is not wholesome, as wormwood is, though it be bitter; but some herb that is both nauseous and noxious. And I will give them water of gall, or juice of hemlock, or some other herb that is poisonous, to drink. Every thing about them, till it comes to their very meat and drink, shall be a terror and torment to them; God will curse their blessings, Mal. ii. 2. 2nd. That their dispersion abroad shall be their destruction; ver. 16, "I will scatter them among the heathen." They were corrupted and debauched by their intimacy with the heathen, with whom they mingled themselves, and learned their works; and now they shall lose themselves there where they lost their virtue, among the heathen; that is, they had violated the laws of that truth which is the bond and cement of society and commerce, and addicted themselves to deceit and lying, and therefore are justly crumbled to dust, and scattered "among the heathen." They set up gods which "neither they nor their fathers had known," strange gods, new gods, Deu. xxxii. 17, and now God will put them among neighbours which "neither they nor their fathers have known," that they can claim no acquaintance with, and therefore can expect no favour from. And yet, though they are scattered so as that they will not know where to find one another, God will know where to find them all out, Ps. xxi. 8, with that evil which still pursues impenitent sinners; "I will send a sword after them," some killing judgment or other, "till I have consumed them;" for when God judgeth he will overcome, when he pursues he will overtake. And now we see for what the land perisheth; all this desolation is the desert of their deeds, and the performance of God's words.

Secondly. He calls for the mourning women, and engageth them, with the arts they have to affect people, and move their passion, to lament these sad calamities, that were come or coming upon them, that the nation might be alarmed to prepare for them. The Lords of hosts himself saith, "Call for the mourning women, that they may come," ver. 17. The scope of this is to shew how very woful and lamentable the condition of this people was likely to be.

1. Here is work for the counterfeit mourners; "Send for cunning women," that know how to compose mournful ditties, or at least to sing them in mournful tunes and accents, and therefore are made use of at funerals, to supply the want of true mourners. Let these "take up a wailing for us," ver. 18. The deaths and funerals were so many, that people have wept for them till they have no more power to weep; as those, 1 Sam. xxx. 4. Let them, therefore, do it now whose trade it is; or, rather, it intimates the extreme sottishness and stupidity of the people, that laid not to heart the judgments they were under, nor, even when there was so much blood shed, could find in their hearts to shed a tear; "They cry not when God bindeth them," Job xxxvi. 13. God sent in his mourning prophets to them to call them to weeping and mourning, but his word in their mouths did not work upon their faith; rather, therefore, than they shall go laughing to their ruin, let the mourning women come, and by humouring the thing try to work upon their fancy, that their eyes may at length run down with tears, and their eyelids gush out with waters. First or last, sinners must be weepers.

2. Here is work for the real mourners.

1st. There is that which is a lamentation. The present scene is very tragical; ver. 19, "A voice of wailing is heard out of Zion." Some make this to be the song of the mourning women; it is rather an echo to it, returned by those whose affections were moved by their wailings. In Zion the voice of joy and praise used to be heard, while the people kept close to God; but sin has altered the note, it is now the voice of lamentation. It should seem to be the voice of those who fled from all parts of the country to the castle of Zion for protection. Instead of rejoicing that they were got safe thither, they lamented wrong, as no fabulous serpent is intended, but some venomous species which could not be charmed. Dr. Tristram thinks it may be the great yellow viper.

viii. 19. We should not adopt the rendering, "because of them that dwell in a far country," nor that of the margin, "because of the country of them that are far off." The sense really is, "from a land that is far off," to which the exiles are followed in imagination by the prophet.

viii. 20. This may not refer to any particular harvest and summer, but to the fact that opportunities had passed unimproved.
